And as fast as the old legends seem to be settling away into a rigid remoteness, and to become inexplicable, a warm touch of good sense—a delicate, vitalizing insight—makes them all as human and familiar as this soft breath of spring makes the brown old earth again green and blooming. Of course it was this perception of the essential and spiritual significance of the mythological story that made it tolerable to the educated Greeks. And yet I laugh very often when I hear a tough old religious dogmatist of the nineteenth century asking how it is conceivable that Plato and Socrates, and the Athenian society of which we have such glimpses in Landor's "Pericles and Aspasia," should not have protested against the religion that exalted such a monstrous Lothario as Zeus into their Supreme Being. I laugh because it is no more extraordinary to me than that educated men of this time and country should make the sweet and simple Gospel of Christ such an elaborate metaphysical system as they do. There is my good friend Melanchthon—one of the most fervent of preachers, and one of the best of human beings—who says to me whenever we talk upon these subjects,

"Oh, Bachelor, Bachelor, all you want is a dogma!"

Melanchthon's brain is spun all over with the subtile cobwebs of schoolmen's theories and what seem to me laughable puerilities. Yet he turns to me with such real earnestness and tender sympathy, and exclaims, "Oh, dear friend, if your brains were only full of cobwebs, how happy I should be!"

As I see it, Melanchthon has no right to ask with wonder how a refined Greek could have failed to protest against the representation of Zeus as the King of Heaven, because he, twenty centuries later, makes the King of Heaven a cruel despot. Why should an American who actually preaches that the Supreme Being is a tyrant wonder that an Athenian heard him represented as a debauchee without protest? "Ah, if you had only a dogma!" sighs my good Melanchthon. And Jesus himself, had he a dogma? I ask him in turn.

But I was saying that the educated Greek had, perhaps, another view—an explanation or interpretation of the popular legend of Zeus. And it is that which modern scholars suggest, and which removes the wonder that so many feel at the acquiescence of those refined people in the bald forms of the traditions. How if Zeus were to them but a name for light and warmth, and the story as told only the imaginative form in which the functions of light and warmth were clothed by the poetic and filial heart of man? How if every old legend that seems gross in the telling were touched by the same test, and the grossness utterly dissipated, leaving only universal grace and truth and beauty? How if the whole cycle of mythological legend were repeated every year and every day in our own American and modern experience? And it really is so, or we could not really understand the old story, and we should not care for it. It really is so; and that is what I meant when I said to Zenobia that Amphion was in that very room.

His name, indeed, is by no means Amphion, and he has certainly never seen a lyre, and would not know what to do with it if he had. I am by no means sure that he has any definite conception of Mercury; and when Medicus said, as he slipped in the slide and threw the picture upon the screen, "Mercury giving the lyre to Amphion," I am afraid that it was, in truth, wholly Greek to my friend. For his name is—and I believe you know him, dear Joel—Tubb; not Amphion Tubb, but James Tubb. He can not play upon any musical instrument whatsoever. Yet he daily plays the walls of Thebes into their place, and he draws order from chaos. If you could live with him for a day—as I have, for I have traveled with him—you would see how. He went home, for instance, from that delightful birthday party, and the next morning Mrs. Tubb had a severe headache; and baby Tubb was in the most belligerent frame of mind; and Tommy Tubb's shoe-strings broke as he was tying them; and Dorothy Tubb's stocking revealed a hole in the heel just as she was hurrying down to breakfast (which was not ready), that she might get to school in time to avoid being so late as to lose all chance at the prize work-basket upon which her little heart was set; and Baruch Tubb fell down stairs, battering his head upon each step; and 'Miry, the cook, was cross and snapping at Lucy, the waiter; and Lucy the waiter was cross; and Dorothy, Tommy, and Lucy were all scolding sharply; and such a domestic hubbub and confusion could only be paralleled by the chaos of the heaps of stones from which the Theban wall was to be built.

And in the midst of the tumult Amphion arose with his lyre—I mean, James Tubb came smiling out of his room—and with a laugh and a cheery word, and a helpful hand and a sympathizing heart, he pacified the storm. He left the baby chuckling, and soothed poor little Baruch, and showed Tommy how to lengthen his string, and wrote a word of excuse for Dorothy, and moderated 'Miry and Lucy, and so silenced the discord. He might have stormed and snarled, and roared and boxed ears all round, and partially smothered the tempest, instead of clearing it away; but that is not Amphion's—I mean James Tubb's—method. His lyre is never out of tune, because his temper is so reasonable and so gentle; and the heaviest and most unmanageable stones of ill humor and perversity and sulkiness gradually obey the magic persuasion of his manliness and sweetness, and rise into harmony and order.

And so the statesman, dear Joel, who from the hates and jealousies and conflicting interests and ambitions of classes and sections and industries and races educes peace and co-operation, and confirms the concord and power of a great state—what is he but the Amphion of the old legend, who raises the Theban walls into place and proportion with his magic lyre?

And greater than all of them is the Amphion of the soul—the man who, standing amidst the chaos of his own prejudices and conceits and passions, surrounded by what seems a boundless and hopeless wilderness of his own obstinacy and weakness and temptation, gradually, by the magic of principle and resolution, playing the divinest melodies of heavenly law and purpose, compels the wild confusion of his soul into order, and raises tier by tier the shining walls of the city of God within him. This is the man—and how many and many of them there are!—who reveals the true meaning of the old legend, and shows us that Amphion is not the figure of a legendary fable, but our friend and neighbor of to-day. Believe me, my dear Joel, the whole series of tales hidden away in Lemprière, and so faintly and feebly told even in the noblest verse, are drawn from our own experience—from our own lives. I go into the schools, and see the poor boys cramming and struggling with their tasks, and I groan to think that the light which would startle them with its delightful radiance—the light which would show them that the legends of mythology are only the story of that particular school—does not shine upon the murky pages along which they toil. But we who are older, dear Joel, we are unpardonable if we do not enrich our lives with the consciousness that the noblest figures in poetry and legend are only portraits of our daily companions. Yours always,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CARPETS.

SMALL figures on light grounds prevail in low-priced carpets, and there is a return to ante-war prices. Very good American ingrains are sold for 85 cents or $1 a yard; excellent qualities are $1 25, and fine tapestry ingrain is $1 35. The designs imitate those of Brussels carpets. There are mottled figures in maroon, or in brown shaded to orange, or else dark rich Persian patterns for dining-rooms and basements; while for cozy chambers are clear white grounds with dark scrolls, or diamonds of silver on blue, or gray on cherry. Small houses, homes of young beginners, can be made very attractive with these pretty and inexpensive carpets. Each floor should be carpeted alike throughout, and to make it soft to the tread, as well as to preserve it, the ingrain should be laid over an anti-moth carpet, a patent arrangement of cotton wadding chemically prepared, and quilted between brown papers. Venetian carpets for halls and stairs accompany ingrains. These are not in the stereotyped stripes, but in mottled designs, like Brussels, and completed by a border. A yard wide, for halls, these cost from $1 to $1 50 a yard; three-quarters wide, for stairs, in patterns to match the hall carpet, they are $1 12; and five-eighths wide, 90 cents. A stair padding of flax linen and paper, made to soften noisy footfalls, and to prevent the carpet wearing on the edge of the step, is sold for 20 cents a step.

Three-ply carpets are in rich tapestry designs on light grounds; these carpets are in high favor with housewives, yet are objectionable because the third ply is distinct in itself, and is apt to wear off, leaving the two layers that are interwoven looking ragged: $1 50 buys the best quality.

Tapestry Brussels carpets are showy, but not serviceable; the colors are merely stamped on the upper side, and soon wear off, leaving bare an ugly gray surface; the designs, however, are exceedingly pretty—panels and scrolls on pearl and white grounds for parlors and chambers; mossy banks, strewn with roses, and mottled, irregular designs, with striped border, for halls and dining-rooms: $1 10 to $1 25 is the price. It is far better economy to add fifty cents more a yard, and buy five-framed body Brussels, with the design woven through the carpet, as very pretty but not new patterns can be bought for $1 75 a yard. There are daisy wreaths of white on pearl grounds, or pink rose-buds on white, for bedrooms, and rich Turkey colors for dining-rooms and halls. The finest qualities of body Brussels in new scroll patterns on black grounds are $2 25.

Merchants say that carpets with many colors, as in the Persian patterns, wear best. Light grounds do not fade or show soil as easily as darker ones. Borders round the room, a broad stripe of carpet matching the colors in the centre, are much used on fine carpets. A novel idea, to be more generally introduced in the fall, is carpets with black ground, enlivened with tracery of gilt and Egyptian red. These are exceedingly rich-looking. Dark olive grounds are also lighted up with gay Oriental colors. Fine Wilton carpets in these designs are beautiful for libraries and parlors. They cost from $2 50 to $3 50 a yard. The Bazar commends these elegant Wiltons to people of taste who can afford the outlay; body Brussels to people in comfortable circumstances, yet who do not care to renew their carpets often: and the pretty ingrains to those who have not much money to spend. Very showy velvet carpets are sold for $2 a yard; those with deeper pile are $2 50. Large panels and scrolls are seen on these and the French moquette carpets, and a striped border is invariably added. Moquettes are $4 50 a yard, and the border does not add to the expense. Nile green, sky blue, pearl, and even buff grounds are shown, with flowers framing pretty rural scenes, or with cupids and cherubs. American moquettes are said to be better than French, as the figures are woven through as in body Brussels. The softly tinted Axminster carpets, like the moquettes, are for elegant drawing-rooms and boudoirs: from $3 to $4 a yard. Turkish rugs of dark, quaint colors, and deep, soft pile, are imported for the centre of floors of inlaid woods. One very handsome rug, square, and all in one piece, measuring 9 feet 10 inches by 8 feet 9 inches, costs $90.

Dealers measure, make, cut, and lay carpets, charging 8 cents a yard for ingrains and three-ply; 10 cents for Brussels; 12½ cents for velvets and other heavy-pile carpets.

Bronzed, silver-plated, and gilt stair-rods are shown. They are round, in twisted rope patterns, or in plain hexagonal shapes, and are held by patent catches that are almost self-adjusting. Very handsome ones cost from $10 to $12 a dozen. Plain oval hollow rods of brass, for carpets five-eighths of a yard wide, are sold for $3 a dozen.

Oil-cloths for halls and dining-rooms are in rich Indian colors and Turkish designs, also the usual marbled patterns: they cost from $1 25 to $1 50 a square yard.

Floors of inlaid woods are, however, the first choice for dining-rooms, halls, smoking and billiard rooms, and are not as expensive as might be supposed. A simple but pretty design in oak and walnut is laid for $1 50 a square foot; an intricate octagonal figure in white holly, French walnut, and amaranth, on an oak ground, costs $2; and the most elaborate design shown, in which rose-wood and cedar are introduced, costs $2 75. These floors require to be kept well waxed, and the chairs used on them must have gutta-percha casters, that no noise may be made. Wainscoted walls and ceilings accompany such floors. These wood-hangings—strips of wood so thin that two hundred are cut of wood an inch thick, and then pasted on paper—cost about 50 per cent. more than the best varnished paper, and are far more durable. They are in large panels of oak or light butternut, with dark walnut mouldings.

CURTAINS.

A novel and pretty effect is given to lace curtains by the new lace lambrequins, that are lined with rose-color or blue, held by lace-covered cornices, and designed to match the lace curtains below. The plain lambrequin, of the favorite tamboured lace, costs $11 a window; lined, and with a lace cornice, $25; $100 furnishes a window with beautiful tamboured lace curtains, lambrequin, and side loops. For lower-priced curtains we commend the guipure laces. They are stronger and far prettier than Nottingham lace. The striped patterns are more effective than the blocks, as these break up a window too much. Two richly draped guipure curtains, to be drawn back on each side, are sold for $17—enough for a window. Plainer styles are furnished for $12 50 a window. Fine curtains of Swiss lace are $85. For very elegant houses a single drop-curtain of lace is used, with elaborate side draperies. These are objected to, however, as they must be used without shades, and do not darken the room sufficiently. A novelty in preparation is shades of French muslin dressed with isinglass, the centre decorated with embroidery and lace. These will admit plenty of light, yet shade the room almost as much as holland shades, and will cost about $5 a window. At present white holland shades, finished with two white tassels, are preferred to all others. With ordinary fixtures, in windows of average size, they cost $2 50 a window; with patent spring fixtures, $3 50. Curtains of dotted Swiss muslin, edged with fluted ruffles three or four inches wide, are still used for chambers and for country houses. These and Nottingham lace, with chintz lambrequins, are pretty for rooms fitted up with chintz furniture. For bay-windows, plain shades, either of white holland or lace, are fitted to the different apartments, next the window-pane. Lace curtains drape the arch, but these shut off the bay from the room, and are not so pretty as a simple lambrequin. Narrow cornices of gilt ebony, or rose-wood with gilt mouldings, have entirely superseded plain gilt. We have seen black-walnut cornices sold as low as $2 a window. When a pier-glass is used the frame of the mirror is extended to form cornices. For vestibule windows, tamboured lace, lined with a pale color and fluted, is very handsome. Narrow French guipures for vestibules are 50 cents a yard. Pretty draperies of Nottingham lace, attached to a walnut cornice, are placed above wash-stands to protect the wall: price $3.

FURNITURE.

Rich, massive-looking furniture, like that seen in French interiors of the last century, is now made for large drawing-rooms and salons. Immense wall-mirrors, reaching from the ceiling to the floor, and framed by great columns, take the place of mantels; pier-glasses are surmounted by cornices that branch over the windows and adorn the end of the room; ponderous cabinets of ebony and gilt and marquetry are on the sides; while the luxurious and thickly tufted seats strewn about are so covered with satin and velvet that the wood of which they are made is nowhere visible. Two colors are used for upholstering these grand rooms, and the new fancy is to introduce black as one color; for instance, the chairs and sofas are covered with turquoise blue, pearl gray, or Havana brown satin, tufted in rays springing from the centre, and bordered by a great puff of black velvet. These are very grand and very costly. Any wood visible about them is ebony or rose-wood with gilt tracings. Plainer parlors, for those who use Brussels carpets, have black-walnut furniture, upholstered with terry reps—not the inevitable green, but drab, cherry, or Louise blue in solid colors, or else in broché stripes, two shades of tan-color, for instance, with golden broché figures, on the lighter stripe. Order the suit, and have no two pieces alike. Have two sofas—one long enough for reclining, the other a little confidante for two—and choose four easy-chairs of various shapes and sizes, for people of different sizes, instead of the regulation two arm-chairs and four straight-backed uncomfortable ones. Distribute about the room light reception-chairs of lacquered wood, with seats of fine cane, and camp-stools embroidered by your own fingers. The curtains of tamboured lace have lambrequins matching the furniture reps; and the walnut mantel, now more stylish than marble, is upholstered also. The oval centre-table, upheld by a branching pedestal, is covered with blue or cherry velvet, or even billiard cloth, or else the beautiful tinted marble now used; or it may be of plain wood, with a table-cover matching the piano-cover, which is of the inexpensive new wool tapestry, in imitation of fine Aubusson, just introduced from Germany. The colors should harmonize with the broché reps. A low cabinet—half for books, half for the curiosities that once ornamented étagères—has a top of colored marble or of velvet matching the centre-table. Marquetry is falling into disuse except for bordering tables and cabinets, as it is so easily defaced. Gilt, too, is apt to tarnish and to chip off, as the ebony mouldings do. Black-walnut inlaid with French walnut stands the test of time better than any other furniture, and can be easily restored to its original beauty. An easel of walnut or ebonized wood with light gilt tracery is arranged to display the last new picture in its proper light. Tall, elegant easels cost from $10 to $80, but very pretty low ones are sold for $15 or $20. Pedestals for busts are solid columns of wood decorated with gilt and topped with marble or velvet to match other articles. A clock and vases of the gay-colored Pompadour porcelain, mounted in gilt, ornament drawing-room mantels. The pictures are hung by cords wrapped over wire and without tassels. Loose slip covers are of white linen or twilled cretonne bound with bright-colored braid. Some fanciful ones have box-pleated frills around the lower parts of chair and sofa covers. The material is 35 or 45 cents a yard. Upholsterers charge $2 for making a slip for an ordinary chair, $3 for an arm-chair, $4 for a sofa.

Fresh and cool looking cretonnes or cotton satines are used for upholstering all the rooms of summer residences out of town, and for chambers in the city, especially those occupied by the young people of the family. Black grounds are being introduced in cretonnes, but detract from their cool, airy look. Blue, pink, or white grounds, with Central Park landscapes in gray frescoings, are prettiest, or else those with antique Oriental figures of bright colors on a pale ground. Wall-paper is imported to match these patterns; the muslin curtains have chintz lambrequins, and the bed is draped to match. Light ash, oak, and butternut woods in imitation of bamboo are upholstered in this manner. White enameled suits with oak-colored mouldings in bamboo styles are admired for summer chambers: they cost $3 50.

The bedroom suits most generally desired are of black-walnut, waxed or not according as the buyer may prefer polished or dull surfaces. The handsomest have panels of French walnut, gilt tracings, and ebony mouldings. They cost from $500 to $1000. There are, however, plain black-walnut suits with one or two marble-top pieces, made as substantially as higher-priced suits, that are sold for $90. These furnish the chamber.

Bedsteads have high pointed heads, ornamented on the extreme top, with low side and foot boards. The bed is made so deep and full that when spread it rises in a great white puff almost to the top of the foot-board. Spring mattresses are jointed and hinged, that they may be easily moved. Over this is a mattress of South American curled hair, and many people use a light feather-bed on the mattress. Bolsters are cut three-sided, the head resting on an inclined plane. The upper side is four or five inches deep, sloping down to two inches below. They are tufted like mattresses. Pillows are large and square. The furnishing houses charge $19 for a pair of feather pillows and a bolster like that just described. Luxuriantly soft pillows of arctic down, in cases of thick white linen drilling, are $48 a pair. Plainest muslin slips are put on pillows for night use, but are covered during the day by shams, or single squares of linen, with an inch-wide hem, hem-stitched, and a rich cluster of needle-work in each corner. These, with a linen sheet, hem-stitched, and embroidered band at the top, to overlay the cover when the bed is turned down, cost $45. Large monograms are embroidered in the centre of pillow shams. Each letter costs from $1 to $2. Sham pillow-slips and bed-spreads of fine tamboured lace, to match lace lambrequins, are sold for $25 a set. They should be lined with pink or blue satin.

Libraries and dining-rooms are furnished with rich morocco, tan-colored or scarlet, studded with gilt, or else with rich cachemires in Turkish designs. Walnut, with ebony mouldings, is the most popular wood for libraries. Dining-rooms are often furnished with oak or light butternut "trimmed" with mouldings of a darker wood. Tall buffets have medallions in carved wood or bronze representing game or hunting scenes.

Hat-stands for halls have large mirrors at the back, with pegs for hats on each side, and drawers below for brushes. The chairs are of wood in Gothic shapes.

PERSONAL.

MISS EDITH ABELL, of Boston, has made a decided musical success in Milan. She has had flattering offers from various operatic managers, but prefers not to be in a hurry to accept. Italian authorities pronounce her voice a pure soprano.

—On the 16th ult. WILLIAM and MARY HOWITT celebrated in Rome their golden-wedding day.

—Mrs. MARTHA WALKER COOK, of Hoboken, a sister of the late ROBERT J. WALKER, is one of the best linguists in the country, delighting especially in Polish and Russian literature. She is the lady who a few years ago wrote in the Times a sharp criticism of "Owen Meredith" for plagiarizing from the Sclavic tongues.

—It is stated by a London correspondent that every day, when the weather permits, Queen VICTORIA visits the tomb of Prince ALBERT, and places near it a basket of fresh flowers, reads a chapter in the Bible, kneels, and offers a prayer that she may meet him in the world to come.

—Mr. ARTHUR J. PEABODY, one of the nephews and heirs of the late GEORGE PEABODY, and a gentleman of culture and refinement, is about to "lead to the hymeneal" Miss RUSSELL, of this city, who traces her relationship, through the BEDFORD family and the beautiful Lady RUSSELL whom COPLEY painted, to one of the oldest families in Scotland.

—Mr. RALPH WALDO EMERSON, in company with a few of the solid men of Boston—judges, lawyers, and merchants—is making a tour of the cities on the Pacific coast.

—Harvard University has probably a larger number of old graduates than any other college in the country. Among these are SAMUEL THATCHER, of the class of 1793, now ninety-seven years old; HORACE BINNEY, class of 1797, ninety-one years old; WILLARD HALL, aged ninety, and SAMUEL D. PARKER, aged eighty-nine, both of the class of 1799. Three of these four have been members of Congress. WILLIAM MINOT, of the class of 1802, and Hon. JAMES SAVAGE, are still living.

—A man who finds out things in New York, and writes about them to the Troy Times, says there are about four hundred practicing dentists in New York, and one-quarter of that number in Brooklyn (where the teeth are proportionably better). The PARMLYS are notable in the profession, the family consisting of ELEAZER, the oldest, and four brothers. ELEAZER is the richest toothist in the U. S.—worth a million—mostly made in real estate. Doctor E. J. DOWNING is also a "warm" practitioner—about $30,000 per annum. Doctors ATKINSON and JOHN ALLEN, DWINELLE, DODGE, and MAINE are among the $10,000 to $20,000 men; after whom come a crowd of industrious fillers, extractors, etc., etc., the German element being quite predominant. Of the four hundred in this city about thirty may be considered first-class, with large incomes. After these scramble along a goodly crowd who charge from $5 to $20 for filling a tooth, and who make from $3000 to $4000 a year.

—The clever editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal has shed a column of elaborate pen-work on Mr. P. GODWIN'S volume of essays, "Out of the Past." His idea is that Mr. G. "possesses the critical faculty in almost excessive measure, and demonstrates with quick, keen strokes the beauties of his subject, or unhesitatingly points out its hidden faults and blemishes; neither exulting in the one nor gloating over the other, but giving cool, well-weighed, dispassionate utterances on both. It is in historical sketches, however, that he is most happy and most entertaining. He seizes upon picturesque incidents, and groups around them a vivid series of facts that first gain our attention, and then fix in our memories a clear and lasting impression."

—Judge JOSEPH G. MASTEN, who died on the 14th ult. at Buffalo, was one of those rare men who won the regard and commanded the respect of all classes—young and old, rich and poor, learned and unlearned; a pure-hearted and kind-hearted, clear-headed and strong-brained man; an able lawyer, an able and just judge; a model of courtesy, patience, and forbearance on the bench; free from the faintest show of assumption or pretense, and softened by a gentleness and graciousness of manner which, with his fine presence and manly port, made him every where the peculiarly welcome guest. In the city of his residence and in Western New York no man has left, or could leave, a purer and nobler record.

—A peculiar person was Mrs. JUDITH RUST, who died a few days since in Ipswich, Massachusetts. She was married on Christmas-eve, 1799, and, although on good terms with her family; never afterward slept in her father's house. There were ninety persons at her wedding, yet she survived them all. She left sixty living descendants. From the night of her marriage to the day of her death she slept upon the same bedstead; and she had the honor of carrying the first umbrella ever carried in Rowley. In that respect she was historical.

—Miss MARY PARSONS, of Columbus, Ohio, is, during the present month, to become Princess DE LYNAR, the Prince having just come over from Germany to perfect the arrangement. He is on the staff of Kaiser WILLIAM. The lady has passed some time in Europe, and was much admired in court circles. At the banquet given the Emperor on his return to Berlin, he turned, while toasts were being given, to Prince DE LYNAR, and said: "I drink to your American fiancée."

—The widow of that old JOHN BROWN whose soul is still supposed to be peripatetic resides in Humboldt County, California, with a son and two daughters.

—Fifty years ago CHARLES MATHEWS, who is now playing at the Fifth Avenue Theatre, first appeared in London, as George Kattleton, in his own play of "The Humpbacked Lover." He was then about twenty. Although he has nearly scored seventy, he has the lithe, airy manner that made him so attractive before he had tallied thirty.

—The late President LINCOLN was somewhat astonished one day when inspecting the prison in Washington. A prisoner said to him, familiarly, "How are you, Mr. President? I'm glad to see you. I believe that you and I have been in every jail in the Union." Mr. LINCOLN replied that the jails at Springfield and Washington were the only ones he was ever in. "Very likely," responded the rogue; "but I've been in all the rest."

—There is probably but one man in America or Europe who has lost both legs and both arms in the military service. That very much damaged party is BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, a pensioner, who was a private in the Second Minnesota, was wounded twenty times, yet what there is left of him seems to be healthy.

—On Sunday the 9th ult. the Rev. Dr. TYNG reached the fiftieth year of his ministry. During that period there have been built under his care four large churches and six mission chapels. In the afternoon the body of the church was occupied by the fifteen hundred children of the mother church and its various mission schools.

—KOSSUTH, by way of recreation, is translating SHAKSPEARE into Hungarian. Physicians ordered him to rest, which he does by doing the above. Says he couldn't live six weeks without being kept at work.

—Miss DANA, the accomplished daughter of the editor of the Sun, is spoken of as the author of the cleverly written book notices in that journal.

—Mr. OLE BULL is bending his energies to the construction of a new piano with violin attachment, which he thinks will outsound any musical contrivance yet known on this planet. He is a great friend of ERICSSON, the inventor, who lives very modestly in a house down town, and only goes out when he thinks that such a manœuvre would be pleasant.

—Colonel W. H. CHEESBROUGH, who has been appointed secretary of legation to England, is a New Yorker, whose military career was commenced in our "Seventh." He is a gentleman of culture, of fine social experience, brave as any number of lions, and has a fine army record. He is said to have been particularly patient, kind, and jolly under adverse circumstances, and rode into a fight and moved under fire with the quiet self-possession of a veteran. This is told of him after the battle of Cross Keys, where he distinguished himself: FREMONT'S army was gathered upon the banks of the river, prevented from further pursuit of Stonewall JACKSON by the burned bridge, and the General himself was puzzled on observing bodies of men on the farther side dressed in the blue uniform of our army, and carrying the flag of the United States. In the presence of the General and his staff Colonel CHEESBROUGH rode across the ford to the opposite bank, made an inspection of his own, and, returning, reported—what we feared would be done in his own death—that the troops we had been speculating about were Confederates. There was no bravado whatever in this; it was only the careless disregard of his own safety in a soldierly man upon the performance of some duty.

—A son of Mrs. Ex-President TYLER is said to have distinguished himself as a Uhlan during the recent controversy between France and Germany. Handsome young fellow, brave, etc.—such as one reads of in nice novels.

—General J. MEREDITH READ (Albany gentleman), consul-general at Paris, is said to have made himself deservedly popular during the siege (he worried through the whole of it) by his liberality of purse and kindly words to the poor and suffering.

—In a recent number of the Bazar we gave the twenty-five leading Christian names used in England, showing that out of 100,000 persons nearly sixty-six per cent. bore the names of the twenty-five enumerated. Neither the English nor American people have one name of their own, as the Germans have "Hermann, and the French "Jacques," but have been content to name almost every body after the Virgin, or a saint or two, or some English king, or king's son or daughter. No English forename is distinctively of the people. Nothing so quaint as the adoption of the Old Testament names, in the way in which Connecticut has adopted them, has ever been popular among the English; they have liked no Roman names; have forgotten all British names; have, in fact, stuck to their usual text, that some big person must use a name before they can find the courage to do it. "Alice" seems as old as English history, "James" occurs in Doomsday-Book, "Robert" is Teutonic and very old, and "Mary," of course, is the pre-eminently Catholic name; but for the rest, every name seems to have derived its popularity either from some saint or some English king or prince. "Albert," for instance, is becoming fast a regular English name, while the popularity of "Arthur" dates not from Mr. TENNYSON'S legendary favorite, but from the Duke of Wellington. In the same way, "Florence" has become common for the admiration felt for FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE; and 1500 girls were registered in one year by the somewhat cumbrous name of "Alexandra." The most distinctive and perhaps the prettiest of new names is "Alma"—a name taken not for its meaning, but from the first battle of the Crimean war; though the list has possibly gained by the introduction of Mr. LONGFELLOW'S heroine, "Evangeline," and would gain decidedly could we popularize the subject of Mrs. RIDDELL'S exquisite sketch, "Beryl." There are a few names at once odd and pretty, which, though not among the twenty-five, are sufficiently common not to puzzle a farmer's wife—such as "Faith," "Hope," "Mercy," "Grace," and "Prudence;" but the great majority of English and American mothers never travel out of the narrow record of customary names.

THIS is a new and favorite style of using narrow white or colored braid for tidies, etc. Fig. 1, page 293, shows a tidy made of braid in reduced size, and Fig. 2, on this page, shows a full-sized section of the tidy. The tidy consists of seven of these figures, which are joined as shown by Fig. 1. The outer edge of the tidy is furnished with fringe three inches long, made of white twisted cotton. Transfer the design for each figure to paper as shown by Fig. 2, and then, following the lines of the design, stitch on the braid along the middle of the braid. The braid must not be sewed on in separate circles, but all together as far as possible. Fasten the ends carefully, and sew through the several layers of braid at the intersecting points. After completing the figures remove the paper from underneath them, and join them as shown by Fig. 1. Finally, knot strands of fringe to the outer edge of the tidy.

Pen-Wiper simulating a Dahlia, Figs. 1–3.

To make this pen-wiper cut two round pieces of card-board each two inches and four-fifths in diameter. Bind each of these pieces two-fifths of an inch wide with black cashmere. On one of these pieces sew five circles of leaves, as shown by Fig. 2. For each of these leaves take a thread of violet double zephyr worsted three inches and four-fifths long, double it, knot it at the middle, and double it again, as shown by the illustration. The leaves of the outer circle are made of the lightest shade of violet, and are sewed on first; the leaves of each succeeding circle are of a darker shade than those of the preceding one, and sewed on so that each succeeding circle covers the seam made by sewing on the preceding one (see Figs. 1 and 2). Cover the open space left in the middle of the card-board piece, and at the same time the seam made by sewing on the inner (darkest) circle of leaves, with a small ball of yellow double zephyr wool which has been trimmed off flat, in the middle of which are several knots of green floss silk. On the other piece of card-board sew a strip of black cashmere an inch and three-quarters wide, which is pinked and arranged in thick box-pleats, letting it project three-fifths of an inch beyond the edge of the card-board piece. In the hollow between each two box-pleats fasten the cashmere part once more with a long stitch. Cover the open space at the middle with a ball of black worsted two inches and two-fifths in diameter. Finally, paste the uncovered sides of the card-board parts on each other.

Point Lace and Embroidered Cravat.

THIS cravat, of which the illustration shows an end in full size, is worked on a strip of cambric two inches and a half wide. Make a narrow hem on the lengthwise edges, and ornament the ends with point lace and white embroidery. To make this cravat transfer the design to stiff linen, sew on the point lace braid, following the lines of the design, and work the lace stitches with fine linen thread as shown by the illustration. After completing the embroidery, remove it from the linen foundation, baste it on the linen cambric strip, and join it with this by means of button-hole stitches. Transfer the design for the white embroidery to the linen cambric, and work it with white embroidery cotton. Finally, cut away the surplus material under the point lace embroidery.

Corners of Guipure, Point Lace, and Venetian Borders for Handkerchiefs, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—This border is worked in guipure embroidery. To do this trace the outlines of the design drawn on the material with embroidery cotton, work the button-hole stitch bars as shown by the illustration, and work the outlines of the design figures in button-hole stitch. The wider parts of the design must be more heavily underlaid. For the button-hole stitch scallops on the outer edge of the design, and those which lie on the button-hole stitch bars, stretch scallops of thread, and cover these with close button-hole stitches, in doing which form small picots, as shown by the illustration. Finally, cut away the material under the design figures (see illustration).

Fig. 2.—This border is worked in Venetian embroidery on fine linen. Along the outer edge is point lace braid, which is edged with picot scallops. Work the various lace stitches between the figures of the design and the button-hole stitch bars with picots, as shown by the illustration.

Embroidery Design for Altar-Cloths, Surplices, etc.

See illustration on page 293.

THIS design is worked with embroidery cotton on lace covered with Swiss muslin. The narrow outlines of the design figures are worked in half-polka stitch, and the wide ones in satin stitch. Work the white four-leaved figures in satin stitch. For the berries in the middle of the flower work shaded eyelet-holes. Work the veins in the middle of the narrow leaves in ladder stitch, and the veins of the remaining leaves in satin and half-polka stitch. Work the scalloped outer edge of the border in button-hole stitch. Cut away the Swiss muslin between the design figures, and work wheels in the middle of the five-leaved figure (see illustration).

LIFE IN HOLLAND.

THE family meet in the morning-room for what may be called a very literal "break-fast." Mevrouw sits at the table, with her cherished china before her, and a steaming kettle on an open stove by her side on the floor. She gives to each a small cup of delicious tea, or not quite so good coffee, at choice; and this, with a single sandwich of thin-sliced buttered black bread, flanked by the halves of a little new white roll, must content the sharpest morning appetite till mid-day. All is over in five minutes; and a terrible discomfiture it is, on the first morning of trial, for him who has flattered his hungry soul by visions of kidneys or a juicy steak. But a good deal may be said in favor of this slender meal; for when reconciled to it by use, and thus gently stimulated after a good night of sleep, body and mind are in better condition for real hard work during the next three or four hours—the most important in the day—than when overburdened by a heavy breakfast: crede experto.

Fig. 3.—MANNER OF MAKING DAHLIA LEAF.

Fig. 1.—PEN-WIPER SIMULATING A DAHLIA.

Mevrouw at once proceeds with a most important operation—that of "washing up." She would no more intrust her precious china to the hands of a servant than would a young mother the cutting of her baby's eyelashes to the under nurse. It is even said, so general is the practice, that her most gracious M——y the Q——n of H——d performs the like anxious task. Washed and wiped, the china is carefully put away and locked up in the glass-sided cabinet for the admiration of beholders until the next meal; and thus these, as well as other valuable works of art stored in sight, are not kept merely for show, but, as surely is their proper function, are put to constant use. The gentlemen light up cigars, as a matter of course, and go to business.

The next family meeting is generally at twelve. Mevrouw, her china, and her kettle are there as before; but this time there is a more plentiful supply of bread-and-butter, and the black-bread sandwich is supplemented by others of thin-sliced dried meat. The meal, however, scarcely differs from the earlier one, except that there is a larger quantity eaten, and a second cup of tea or coffee may be had. In the summer months light Rhine wines make their appearance. "Wash up" as before, inevitable cigar, and separation.

These slight snacks, whets to appetite merely, lead up, in full accord with the famous principles of De Quincey, to dinner, the great, the preponderating meal, about which, as he almost sublimely says, "the whole day should centre;" and certainly a Dutch dinner is a tremendous fact. During one-half of the twenty-four hours it is impossible to be unconscious that you have not dined, and during the other not to be conscious that you have—the facts are too strong, appetite and repletion. Let us begin. Suppose the guests to be seated: there is one preliminary which seems odd to one accustomed to the audible and even sonorous grace before meat of our dear old rector. The hostess gives a peculiar glance round the table, says a few soft words, among which may be caught something like "prie;" instantly every body looks steadily down into the plate before him, and the discovery may be made that each guest is supposed to be offering his own silent grace before meat; and before the stranger, not being a Quaker, has time to recover his bewilderment a gentle rustle from the dress of the hostess, announcing that she has finished, is echoed by other rustles from all sides, and eyes look up with the transient gleam of evanishing piety.

Fish, flesh, and (not so commonly) fowl, and usually plainly cooked, are the staples. The Dutch are so particular about their fish being perfectly fresh that a good housewife is not satisfied unless she sees them actually alive either in the market or brought swimming in water-tanks to her door. The first herring of the season is held a dish of luxury, and one dollar is a common price for an early one. Mighty dishes of vegetables, boiled and afterward stewed in butter, appear as courses, and the quantity piled upon one's plate is at first embarrassing to the fleshly appetite. There are four or five varieties of the kidney-bean, all well worthy of commendation. These beans are salted in large earthern jars, or preserved by an ingenious plan, by baking, for winter use, and, fresh, salted, or preserved, they are brought upon the table throughout the year, when other green vegetables are not to be had; for without his great plateful of vegetable par se no Hollander holds himself to have properly dined. There are invariably two courses of solid meat, and the changes are rung upon beef, veal, ham; for mutton and lamb are scarcely ever eaten. Good mutton is not to be had in Holland. There is some peculiarity in the pastures or climate which makes mutton very rank and tallowy. The poor people eat it, of course, and so they do geese, which are by no means looked upon as a luxury; but a greater number by far of fat sheep than are consumed in Holland are shipped for the English, particularly the London, market.

The amenities of the table and its customs have their slight peculiarities. The pièce de résistance and other meat dishes are carved by the host into slices upon a plate, which is passed from guest to guest, who help themselves according to fancy, every gentleman having previously taken good care of his left-hand lady, his own peculiar charge. A stranger will soon be taught that she expects him to choose a slice to her liking, and, having helped himself and passed on the meat-plate, to make a tender inquiry about her selection of pickles, for he can not but notice that she has meanwhile been making a solemn and deliberate survey of the great variety upon the table; pickles she and every body invariably eats with meat, hot or cold—and no wonder, the quality being really superb. The great pride of a Dutch housewife, if it may not be said that preserves are a greater, is pickles, and both of them make a great show upon the dinner-table. One little custom prevails in helping a fair left-hand neighbor to wine—the gentleman must be careful to pour a few drops into his own glass first. Whether this be simply to give himself the benefit of any particles of dust or cork upon the top, or be actually the remains of the ancient custom of tasting to deny the presence of poison in the cup, the thing is always done to the last glass. Possibly it may even be the heathen custom of libation, which is certainly practiced by the lower classes in England; and in Holland the ceremony is gone through even with decanted wine.

The Dutch have solved the great eating-with-the-knife question in a very effectual manner by doing away with the temptation. Their native specimens of cutlery are so bad that in using them there can be no ever-recurring pleasure such as may be had in wielding a well-balanced, smooth, ivory-handled Rodgers, which answers to every turn of the wrist, and cuts so clean and true as to make one fancy even the toughest beefsteak negotiable into tidbits. The diner in Holland is expected to cut up his meat and other eatables all at once upon his plate, as well as he can manage with his wretched implement, which he then gladly deposits upon a glass holder by his side, and proceeds to eat away with the fork alone, held in his right hand. The stock of cutlery, bad as it is, can not be very large, for one knife and fork is all the allowance for each person during the whole dinner.

The various dishes of fresh fruit, or fruit preserved entire, such as peaches and apricots, are handed up in succession to the hostess first, who, having counted noses, cuts up into halves or quarters, according to the number of guests and the quantity of fruit upon the dish, which is then passed from hand to hand; so that, whether the supply be plentiful or scanty, each guest, if he choose, may have his fair portion. This seems to be a hospitable method; it certainly prohibits on the one hand the display of selfish dexterity sometimes made on a dish of fine peaches, when there are a dozen or more to partake, or, on the other hand, of the modest forbearance which leaves the peaches untouched and the longing soul unsatisfied.

Immediately after eating has ceased the cigar-box is taken round by the children, if any are present, and no lady dreams of objecting, nor is even consent asked. After some little time all retire to the drawing-room, where Mevrouw finds her tea equipage ready to her hand; and when the gentlemen have had their small cup they lounge off to business until nine o'clock.

The amusements and occupation of an evening at home in a family in easy circumstances, which is the sort of family whose daily life has been here described, are pretty nearly the same in all parts of the world of civilization, and those in Holland are no exception. A little music, needle-work, and reading, with pleasant chat and small games, not forgetting the preparation of lessons by the children, pass away the time until ten o'clock, when, after another "coffee-drinking," very similar to the early morning meal, the family retire to rest.

AN IDYL OF THE EARLY SPRING.

OH! clear and calm and open as
The forehead of a sleeping child,
And blue and cool and far away,
The April heaven o'er me smiled!
The violets from their low, green homes
Peeped up, and patterned by its hue;
"We will be like the sky," they said,
"Forever pure, forever blue!"

Dropped through the branches of the beech—
Unleaved and sear from wintry stress—
The fervid kisses of the sun
Recalled the earth to blessedness.
And, startled from her long, white trance,
Abashed and scantily clad she lay;
Meanwhile the robin's glancing breast
Gave life and gladness to the day.

And where the creeping winter-green
Its fruit in coral broidery weaves
I found the shy arbutus hid
Beneath the crisp and russet leaves.
The fair patrician of the woods!
Their daintiest treasure—pink and white!
As balmy as the myrtle flower
That sweetens the Italian night.

The vagrant brightness of the days
Had coaxed a freshness to the moss;
And many a brown and naked stretch
By maple blooms was blown across.
Like swarms of tiny winged things,
Clinging to branches bare and high,
Their tender scarlet clusters shone
Against the blueness of the sky.

There were mysterious gleams of white
Among the hollows, lying low,
Drooped over by dusk evergreens—
But I could laugh at April snow.
I knew its fostering mantle hid
The darlings of the coming May,
When constant Nature should fulfill
Her premonitions of to-day.

And sudden, silver sweet, I heard
A bluebird singing in the hedge;
Near by a venturous crocus sunned
Its purple on a mossy ledge.
Therefore I could no longer doubt—
So much was plain to eye and ear—
And, thrilled with sudden joy, I cried,
"The spring, the pleasant spring, is here!"

MORTMAIN.

I.

"—The touch of a vanish'd hand,
And the sound of a voice that is still!"

AT evening time, where the river Thames is broad and deep. Lapping its highest tide mark, the mighty black water was full to the brim with craft of all sort—brig, and bark, and brigantine, and cutter, and barge, and hoy; around them swarming in picturesque confusion a host of smaller insect-like fry; while down the middle channel moved with stately grace a long procession of outward-bound, each attended by its tiny, fiery tug.

The sun was low over dusky, wonderful London, and the dome of St. Paul's and the Abbey towers began to fade in deepening gloom. A wherry containing a seaman's chest, clamped and iron-bound, lay beneath a certain stately terrace, and the moody waterman who sat therein smoked his pipe in silence and waited.

Above, on the balustrade of the little landing-place, leaned two, who talked together. When, with the dear one's hand in ours, we stand gathering up all life's misery into those awful brief moments which are to return for us no more, hardly may we find words. For these two time was short and unspeakably precious, yet the stream of speech flowed sluggishly—a word or so, and then a deep, deep silence.

He spoke first—a shortish, thick-set young man, with fair northern face, stern lips, and a curly beard glorified with ruddy sunlight.

"Time's almost up, ain't it, Tilt?" he cried to the man in the wherry.

"Ten minutes more, mate," answered the waterman, veiling his eyes with discretion.

The terrace above them was deserted; no human being was in sight, save where, some stone's-throw distant, a City steamer poured forth her freight of tired, work-worn souls panting for rest and their diurnal whiff of fresh air. He put his arm round the girl's waist and looked into her face.

A slender, lithe figure was hers, and an abundance of raven hair wreathed a little well-set-on head; but not pretty—you said, plain even—till great sable-fringed gray eyes raised suddenly to yours, half defiantly, half coaxingly, were wont to give you the lie direct. A woman you would never take the trouble to turn your head to look at, or about whose country or calling you'd hazard a speculation, yet was she, when you got to know her, interesting after her own peculiar fashion. A strange nondescript little animal, inconsistent in thought, word, and deed, and yet, as I suppose, none the less fascinating for this last circumstance. Her hair was neatly tucked up under a very unremarkable bonnet, black in color, as was her whole dress, save where here and there glimmered a scarlet silken sash, which wee yellow hands toyed with nervously and incessantly.

"Well, Stella," says the lover, "ten minutes more, is't, and then—don't cry, pretty one, it's only for this once, remember, and then we say good-by to sea-going forever, and put into a snug little harbor of our own, all plain sailing and sunshine, where we needn't care a fig which way the wind blows. Lord! how I've always envied those old chaps who knock off after their good day's work and come to an anchor in the Old Kent Road, or some such sailor paradise, where they can rig up a mast and weather-cock in the back garden among the beans and cabbages, and haul down the flag and fire a gun at sunset!"

"How you talk, Dick!"—this half pettishly—"you wouldn't be happy in a place like that; and how could you fire a gun there, old stupid?"

"Well, may be not. I didn't go exactly for to mean what I said, but we'll have a mast, you mind, and every thing ship-shape, up the country when we two turn farmers."

She came a little closer to him, and the gray eyes looked into his.

"Dick, I can't part with you—I can not."

"Nonsense, my girl! what's the good of going on like that? It's the last time, as I've told you a dozen times over; won't that satisfy you? And remember, Stella, if I can't fetch you, I hold you to your promise of coming out to me with Tilt's wife; for you see," said he, cautiously lowering his voice, "I may have to cut and run for it at Auckland—there's no knowing."

"Ah, Dick, don't do any thing rash!"

"No danger; not if I can help it. Bless your little heart! I'm one of those who look before they leap, and if the skipper behaves himself I'll come back with him; but I misdoubt his cant, he's all jaw, he is; but what odds is it! every thing 'll be serene so long as you keep true to me. Stella," said the young sailor, with a certain huskiness in his deep bass voice, "I'm a rough sort of fellow to think of marrying you with your pretty lady ways, and little hands, and all that; but I'm a different sort of man since you loved me and I had your promise. Don't give me up, my darling; you'll kill me if you do. You're the only thing I have got in the world, remember."

She was gazing into the river, and answered inconsequentially:

"How awful the river looks, Dick!"

"Ay, it looks black enough, don't it? many a pretty fellow it's sucked down in its time, I reckon. How should you like me to be struggling about in it?" he asked, with abruptness.

"Dick—don't, don't! how cruel you are, Dick!" she went on, dreamily; but shuddering slightly, meanwhile, and still staring at the lapping wavelets. "A strange curiosity makes me ask, how near were you—when were you closest to drowning?"

"Hanged if I can remember, Stella—I've made a precious near shave of it several times. Last voyage but one—coming home it was, I recollect—I was doing a job of painting, and I'd got a board out made fast, and paint-pot, and every thing, when all of a sudden the rotten rope broke in the middle, and down went board, paint-pot, and all, leaving me dangling at the end I'd caught hold of, with an uncommonly unpleasant sort of idea that it might break off the next minute."

"Supposing it had—should you have been drowned?"

"Ay, my girl, of course I should!"

"But you're such a swimmer, Dick—such a strong, good swimmer!"

"Lord bless you, child, what do you suppose that would signify? You'd only tread the water a quarter of an hour longer. They couldn't have heard me call, and they wouldn't have missed me for an hour or so, I dare say."

"But you were saved, Dick!"

"Obviously, Stella; the rope did not break. But I'm a brute to talk to you like this, dear. I've been mercifully preserved more times than I'm afraid I ever call to mind. 'They that go down in ships,' you know— My darling, do you recollect teaching me that Psalm?"

"Did I teach it you, Dick? I'm glad I did that."

"You taught me all I know of good, Estelle."

"Dear old boy, you're better yourself, a good deal, than I am. I don't think I half believe what I teach you."

"Don't say so—don't tell me that!" cried he, catching her suddenly in his arms; "your goodness is the one thing I believe in; what else can keep you true to me when the great sea's between us? Oh, my God, Estelle, if I thought you could be false!"

"Dick, what's this new thought?" said Estelle, soothingly. "What can make you think I could be false to you?"

"Don't know, I'm sure; all women are false, as I suppose; and as for you, you're a born coquette, if there ever was one. But, in spite of every thing, it's me you'll care for, and me only, I know that. You may marry some one richer, and better looking, and fairer spoken, but your love is mine forever, remember. Look you, Estelle"—and he struck his clinched fist hard on the stone coping of the balustrade—"you may give your hand to another, but your heart shall be mine through all eternity. No, my girl, false to me you may be, but forget me you never shall. No, so help me Heaven, living or dead, you sha'n't forget the sound of Dick Tempest's voice—nor, by God, the touch of his hand!"

On her little tawny palm he laid that strong right hand of his, which an instant before was glowing with warm and passionate blood.

A cold, clammy, horror-inspiring touch!

One start of terrified amazement, and then, hiding her face on his shoulder, she gave way to a burst of hysterical sobs.

"My little pet, have I frightened her? Forgive me, Stella, forgive me; cheer up and smile once more at me before I go."

Ere he could tranquilize her, the patient waterman had pointed up the dusky river, and said:

"Time's mostly up, matey!"

"Smile once more for me before I go, Estelle—just this once."

She looked up at him and smiled—a sickly, wintry smile, but still a smile for all that.

He showered kisses on the upturned face.

"God keep you, darling! Good-by."

He jumped into the waiting boat, and they pushed off. Leaning on both arms, Estelle marked the lessening speck approach the side of one of the tall outward-bound, in whose blackness Dick and his chest were speedily absorbed. She could see no more, strain her eyes as she might, and she turned from the pier with a weary little sigh, when one on the terrace above confronted her.

"Ah, Miss Morris, out late this evening!"

"Is it late?" said she, fumbling hurriedly for her watch.

"Oh, by Jove! don't think I'm complaining, more especially since it procures me the pleasure of your company, for we may just as well walk home together, you know."

Estelle hesitated.

"Nonsense," cried he, with ever so little of good-humored patronage in his voice; "don't be so overscrupulous, Miss Morris. Where's the harm? Besides, look here: you'd better make yourself as agreeable as you can to me, or you'll have me informing mamma, when she comes home, how you left your infant charges, to wander alone, goodness knows why, in the hospital at eight o'clock at night."

Wander alone! He hadn't seen, then; and if he hadn't seen, he certainly didn't suspect.

Suspicion and ugly things of that sort rarely entered the mind of Herbert Freke she knew full well, and she glanced at the proposed companion of her walk with admiring appreciation of the frankness, for which her own nature furnished no equivalent. That there was more than this to admire in him, I think most women would have conceded who saw him as he was then, before care had drawn one line on the broad white forehead, or saddened the brightness of the bold blue eyes. And in those days he was in a measure conscious of his own good looks, the knowledge of their possession sitting lightly upon him, and giving a not ungraceful assurance to all he said or did, as if he took it for granted that the very sight of him was enough to create a favorable impression on your mind.

Now, in a limited space such as this, I can not see what possible use there is in muffling up a fact which another half-dozen lines will make patent to you.

Herbert Freke was in love with Estelle Morris.

Dear me! to think how cautious his pretty step-mother had been in her selection of the young lady who was to become an inmate of her house, and what an excessively judicious choice she fancied she had made in the little tawny girl, who dressed with such simple neatness, who never spoke but when she was spoken to, and who, though she had every accomplishment at her fingers' ends, never thought it too much trouble to perform the humblest services for her employers! A sailor's orphan she was, too—a fact which had weight with both herself and kind old Admiral Freke. Of a very absorbent nature was Miss Estelle Morris; and though made the depositary of many secrets, from that wonderful piece of ordnance, which the humane old admiral had invented for the painless conversion of Abyssinian and other refractory blacks to impalpable powder, down to the little misfortunes of Mrs. Freke's lady's-maid's cousin in the Guards, yet made she no return of confidence.

In her humility, she was wont to fancy that it couldn't the least interest Mrs. Freke to know of her engagement to Dick Tempest, any more than it would afford the admiral satisfaction to learn that his only son embraced every opportunity of writing letters in the school-room, of walking in Greenwich Park with his little sisters, and attending them, conjointly with their careful preceptress, in those donkey rides on Blackheath, which ranked among their favorite amusements.

Pray be good enough not to conjure up a vision of the artful, murderous little governess heroine of the period. Not of such was my poor Estelle. She did but do what came pleasantest to her. A poor, rudderless, cockle-shell of a boat, which stormy wind or balmy breeze wafted where it listed, and which you might scarcely blame for enjoying and making the most of each sunshiny port into which it drifted. As to Herbert Freke and how it was with him from a very early stage, she had known all about that well enough; in such matters women are marvelous good guessers. It was flattering, very, this undisguised admiration of his, and you must own it would have taken a strong-minded little governess to have resisted the dangerous pleasure of watching the development of first love.

For, as it happened, she was this young man's first love, who, though he had gone out and about and seen much of women and the world, had yet contrived to live to the age of twenty-seven without forming any serious attachment, and then Estelle Morris became the governess of his little half-sisters. She had not exactly encouraged him—there was no occasion for her to do so, perhaps; but often enough conscience and vanity had a tough little fight of it; and when the lists are held in a woman's heart, we all know which of the two is like to bite the dust. She was undoubtedly fascinating, and knew herself to be so, and it was as hard for her to abstain from the exercise of such diablerie as she possessed as for a witch to resist the temptation of riding on her broomstick. After all, as she thought, there wasn't so very much of naughtiness in it. What harm could it possibly do to poor Dick, safe on board the Ocean Queen, and puffing a peaceful pipe without troubling his head about her, if Herbert Freke did happen to walk home by her side?

So they strolled along, these two, under the grand old chestnut avenues—they planted them for lovers some time when the first Charles was king—and then passed through an iron gate to where Admiral Freke's great white house turned a sullen shoulder on its beautiful neighbor, the park, and stared with all its windows into a terraced, stucco-vased, red-geraniumed garden.

The little sisters had finished their tea long ago, their lessons were learned for the morrow, their Herz and Czerny duly practiced, and they had already begun to wonder at the absence of their governess.

Herbert assisted Miss Morris to keep them well amused till, the blessed hour of bed-time arriving, they filed off one by one, and left himself and Estelle to the undisturbed possession of the school-room.

It was very pleasant, doubtless; but there was something indisputably guilty in the hasty way Herbert jumped up directly the wheels of Admiral and Mrs. Freke's returning brougham were heard, and stepping through the glass door on the terrace outside, lit a cigar, and plunged into the darkness.

Mrs. Freke, three minutes later, crossing the hall in gorgeous attire, caught Estelle at the foot of the stairs with her candle, just going to bed—a dusky little figure, whose cheek she kissed with courtesy and something warmer.

II.

They were keeping Christmas at the white house on the hill. In spite of gloomy oaken staircases and dark paneled walls, it was a cheery old house, where they lit big fires and filled the rooms with merry kinsfolk, who made them ring with joyous laughter, and consumed the good things provided for them greatly to their own satisfaction and that of the jolly admiral, who loved nothing so well as to see himself surrounded by happy faces.

Estelle Morris was there. Where else, indeed, could the poor little lonesome creature be? Relations she had none, and no friends so kind as her kind employers.

And she was useful, too. Few were there who as well as she could arrange flowers for dinner-table or drawing-room, or so contrive that each guest should sit next the one he or she preferred, or so untiringly play when the young people got up a little dance on the spur of the moment. It was Estelle who laid the Times ready to Mr. Grantham's hand, and adjusted the candles for Mrs. Mangle's worsted-work. Also in those tea-cup tempests which prevail when young ladies are thrown into country-house communion with each other, how skillfully was she used to throw oil on the troubled waters! There was no one like Estelle.

Eagerly but surreptitiously had she during the past months scanned that corner of the newspaper which contains the shipping intelligence, and more than once she saw that Dick Tempest's vessel had been sighted by home-coming ships; still no one of these had brought her letter or loving word to freshen the memory of his trust in her; and though the flame of love wants but little, ever so little, of nourishment to keep it burning, it is not of asbestos, and, untrimmed, sooner or later it dies out.

It was impossible to take exception to Estelle's conduct; it was exemplary. She never flirted with the young men who were staying in the house; the harmless amusement of dancing even she steadily refused, save when required to make up a quadrille, or officiate as partner to some gawky hobbledehoy pertinaciously rejected by other young ladies.

She was demure, courteous, and quite impenetrable.

The Christmas festivities were to culminate in a grand ball, and in the necessary preparations Estelle had for many days found sufficient occupation for her hands, if not for her thoughts.

It was late in the day before the arrangements were completed; and long after Mrs. Freke and the other ladies had retired to dress and drink strong tea in one another's bedrooms, Estelle entered the drawing-rooms, and proceeded with light and skillful hand to give the finishing touches to the decorations.

She was very clever with her fingers, and it was a real pleasure to her to train the graceful creeping plants over the hanging baskets which decorated the sides of the rooms, to arrange with artist eye the fairy-like pink and white drapery which screened the windows, and then, as a final triumph, to set all of a blaze the innumerable wax-candles.

Poor little Estelle—poor little heart, which in this wax-lit, hot-house-flower atmosphere, experienced a veritable épanchement! How truly did her character enunciate itself in the effect produced on her by the meretricious beauty of the scene!

She forgot herself, her troubles, her perplexities, and seeing but the pretty, brilliant rooms, the mirrors, the flowers, in her eyes a magic palace, she became childishly exultant; she clapped her hands, she sang, she executed a rapid pirouette, till all of a sudden, catching sight of herself and her poor shabby little black frock in a gigantic looking-glass, she was so powerfully struck by the incongruity of her appearance, that she stopped short, threw herself on a couch, and burst into an agony of tears.

Another instant and Herbert Freke was by her side, who, having been smoking on the balcony, had been, I need scarcely say, a witness to the scene.

"Miss Morris—dear Estelle, what's the matter?" And he took the hands that were sheltering her face into his own. "Mayn't I have at least the right to comfort you?" he was beginning, tenderly, when, wrenching herself from his grasp, she broke from him ere another word could escape his lips, and, rushing impetuously from the room, left him planté là, confused, puzzled, and extremely uncomfortable.

Estelle threw herself on her bed and there wept passionately, till, becoming conscious that but the barest quarter of an hour remained for the purposes of the toilette, she arose, and swallowing, drying, and putting away her tears after the fashion of women, proceeded to make herself as fit to be seen as circumstances permitted.

Poor Estelle's was no exception to the usual governess wardrobe, which seldom contains much variety of evening dress. Such an occasion as the present had never presented itself before, and it was with many misgivings as to its propriety, and a deprecating sigh, that she drew from its box an old dress of her mother's, which she had modernized as far as was practicable. Her dressing was hurried over; scarce even a parting glance was bestowed on the narrow looking-glass ere she left the room, and yet among the knots of girls who were surveying each other's bravery, she heard, as she passed, a whisper that her toilet was "très chic," and "she looks as well as any of us."

She did indeed. Had she given carte blanche to Descou, no dress could have been more becoming to her than was the rich, old-fashioned white tabinet, besprinkled with apricot-colored bouquets.

In her profuse black hair she had twined a long chain of uncut coral—a sailor's gift. No ornament concealed her perfectly shaped shoulders and arms, her eyes were soft with repressed emotion, and her dark cheeks flushed with unwonted color.

Mrs. Freke, fair and stately, in ruby velvet and pearls, looked critically at her as she entered, smiled a pleased smile, and laid a kind hand on her arm.

"My dear child, I insist on your enjoying yourself to-night. No dancing with gouty old gentlemen or stupid boys. Remember, this is your first ball."

There was a grateful glitter in her eyes, but she made no reply. Dancing was one of those accomplishments which came naturally to Estelle, and though not a pretty girl, yet, having precisely those sort of looks which nine men out of ten admire, she soon found that she had no lack of partners.

It was toward the end of the evening; and half tired of pleasure, and quite wearied out with the unwonted exercise, Estelle leaned on the arm of Herbert Freke. Her steps had lost their elasticity; each dance had grown shorter and shorter; and they had contented themselves for some time with watching the exertions of their revolving companions, when Herbert exclaimed:

"How stifling this heat is; let's go and look for some cool refuge where you can rest. That you can't dance any more, I'm certain."

Many curtains, looking-glasses, and sofas had converted the school-room into a bower fit for beauty, and Freke, leading Estelle thither, deposited her in a large arm-chair beside the window, and took possession himself of a humbler seat close beside her.

It was a wild wintry night, and the bare branches of the chestnut-trees without creaked and moaned like souls in purgatory.

Estelle shivered, and Herbert took a great fur rug from a sofa and wrapped it round her.

"A wild night indeed; God save all at sea!" prayed Estelle, silently; and then, as if in answer to her unspoken words, Herbert said:

"Doesn't it blow tremendously? They say that for years there hasn't been such a gale known, or such a number of wrecks round the coast."

And drawing the heavy curtain from the window, he gazed curiously into the blackness beyond.

Estelle cowered at the howling blast which now made itself more distinctly heard, and, with an effort, she asked:

"Mr. Freke, the wind isn't as high as this all over the world, is it? You don't suppose it's such a dreadful night every where, do you?"

"Don't know, I'm sure," answered Herbert, whose scientific notions were, to say the least, dim. "Miss Morris, I didn't bring you here to talk about wrecks and horrors of that sort, but to finish a little conversation we commenced a few hours ago, which came to an abrupt termination, if you remember. Estelle, why did you rush away from me in that manner? You might have guessed—you did guess, didn't you, what it was I had to say to you? What's the good of many words? You know I love you, and I've tried for weeks to find an opportunity to tell you so; and now the time has come. Estelle, my darling, do you love me well enough to be my wife? answer me."

And so it was all within her grasp, all this warmth of luxury, this wealth—all this which to her sensuous nature was so dear. For a few brief moments she sat there with bent-down head, looking into her own heart—ah me! what a vacarme was there! Pride, remorse, woman's vanity, woman's pity, all grappling with one another, and the door barred on love, or the conflict had not been.

Draw the curtain, pass on—of every day are such battles.

"My darling, can't you answer? and I love you so much, Estelle! I am waiting for what you will say to me."

She raised her head suddenly, like a startled listening deer:

"Some one calls—whose voice is that? Surely not your mother's!"

"No one calls, Estelle; there is no one here but you and me." And he put his arm round her slender form. Estelle scarcely endeavored to disengage herself. "Estelle, you don't speak; but your silence tells me you are mine—my very own," said Herbert, taking a lover's first kiss from lips which were not unwilling.

As I have said, the evening was now far spent, and the lights burned low in that little room where these two sat alone—silent, from the very intensity of their happiness.

Another minute or two, and the girl had started wildly to her feet, her great eyes dilated, her lips and cheeks ghastly pale.

"Take your hand away from mine!" she screamed. "Oh, Heaven, take your hand away—it's icy cold, Herbert; it's clammy—it freezes—it kills me!"

She stood a few paces from him, her eyes fixed not on him, but on something beyond.

"Estelle," said Herbert, with bewilderment, "I'm not touching you. What's the matter—aren't you well?"

"How dare you say you aren't touching me! Your hands are so cold, they strike to my very heart like ice."

"You're dreaming, Estelle," said Herbert, with a suspicion of asperity in his tone, "no one touches you."

The strange look of horror which had come over Estelle's face gradually died away, leaving her still ashy pale. She drew close to where Herbert stood, and said, coaxingly, but with a forced smile:

"You're only joking, Herbert, aren't you? You had got hold of my hand, you know."

"I swear to you, Estelle," replied Freke, gravely, "that what I say is true—no one was touching you."

To her face came back once more that ghastly look of awe, and, uttering a shriek of terror, she threw herself into his arms.

"Save me—oh, Herbert, save me! Don't you hear it is he who calls me! His arms are round my neck—he's strangling me—have mercy, mercy! His hand's in mine—it's cold, deadly cold!" she screamed; and then sinking her voice to an awful whisper, which, till his dying day, will ring in Herbert Freke's ears, "O God, Herbert, it's wet!"

Those were the last words Estelle Morris ever spoke. She lay prone at Herbert's feet, rigid and insensible, and he lifted her from the ground and placed her on the sofa, from which she had gleamed at him in her strange, weird beauty.

What passed afterward he knew not—a hideous phantasmagoria of moving figures, and terror-stricken, death-paled faces; the convulsive screams of some great agony mingled with the outside storm; there was a sound of lamentation, and then a silence, as it seemed to him, of many days.

So they laid her in her grave, this ill-fated, mysterious orphan, and made greater lamentation over her than she perhaps altogether deserved.

There were no relations to be communicated with, or, at least if she did possess kinsfolk, she was so reticent with regard to them that the Frekes were ignorant of their existence, and among her papers there was no clew to render their discovery possible.

All-merciful time had begun to blunt the edge of Herbert Freke's sorrow, when he chanced upon an ill-printed colonial newspaper, directed in a rough and, it might be, sailor-like writing to "Miss Morris." The merest curiosity induced him to open it, and spell over its pages one by one. There was an account, comprised in half a dozen lines, of the swamping of a boat, in which some sailors had endeavored to escape from their ship—far out in New Zealand waters; he read it uninterestedly. How was he to know that in that same wild December night, in which death had torn Estelle Morris from his arms, the great sea had taken to her bosom a tawny-haired sailor whose name was Richard Tempest?

USEFUL RECIPES.

BREAD-AND-BUTTER PUDDING.—Make a batter of 5 eggs and a pint of milk; add a little salt before the eggs are put in. Have several slices of bread about as thick as for toasting, and spread butter thickly on them. Butter a pudding dish, and put in a layer of bread-and-butter, then raisins and currants, and another layer of bread-and-butter, until the dish is nearly three-quarters full. Flavor the batter with nutmeg; pour over, and bake till it seems firm and done. Eat with sauce.

BEEF PICKLE.—Weigh the beef, selecting nice tender pieces, and to every hundred-weight allow 7 pounds of salt, 2 ounces of saltpetre, 1½ pounds of brown sugar, and 4 gallons of water. In the bottom of the tub place the pieces you intend for "dried beef," then over them pack the other meat. Watch it carefully, and when you find that meat and seasoning seem well incorporated take out the drying pieces and hang up. To the liquor add a little more salt, and let the other pieces remain until wanted. The dried beef can be smoked as you do hams, if preferred; but it is more delicate when that is omitted.

ANOTHER RECIPE.—To 4 gallons of water add 4 ounces of saltpetre, 6 pounds of coarse salt, 1½ pounds of brown sugar, or 1 quart of molasses. Boil well together, skimming whenever any thing rises. Let it boil a few minutes, and then remove from the fire. Pack the pork or beef in the tub, but not too closely, and when the liquor is cold pour it over the meat. In summer the pickle should be poured off and boiled about every month, pouring it on the meat when cold.

NEWBOLD RECIPE FOR CURING HAMS.—To 18 or 20 pounds of meat put a tea-cupful of molasses, 1 ounce of saltpetre, 1 gallon of water, and salt enough to make the pickle bear an egg. Let the hams lie in this pickle six weeks, then hang them up five or six weeks before you smoke them. Smoke but little, and in March secure them well from flies. Keep through the summer by packing in coarse salt or charcoal.

ANOTHER RECIPE.—Cover a ham (a young one is preferable) with dry salt, letting it remain for twenty-four hours to draw off the blood; then wipe it perfectly dry. Mix well together 1 pound of brown sugar, ¼ of a pound of saltpetre, ½ a pint of coarse salt, 3 pints of fine salt, and 2 gallons of water. Place in an iron pot over the fire, stirring them constantly until they acquire a moderate degree of heat. In this pickle the ham must remain three weeks, frequently turning it. When it is taken out let it dry a day or so before smoking it. A fire from oak sawdust is the best; but only a wood fire should be used.

SAUSAGE.—To have it good only the very best pieces of meat should be used. Many think any thing will do, but then you can not have the best quality of sausage. To 25 pounds of finely cut meat add 1 gill of black pepper, ½ of a gill of red pepper, a scant half pint of fine table-salt. Mix all well together. If desired, a small quantity of thyme and summer-savory, finely cut, can be added.

SCRAPPLE.—It is very nice fried in slices of about half an inch in thickness, or mixed with potatoes (white)—about two-thirds potatoes and the remainder scrapple. Take all the useless parts from a pig's head; add the lungs, liver, and heart to the carefully cleaned meat; put into an iron pot over the fire with enough cold water to cover it. Let it cook rather slowly until the meat seems done. If the liquor seems too rich add more water, and remove the meat. Take off all the skin, and chop the rest not quite so fine as mince-meat. Put back in the liquor, and when it boils up again stir in corn meal until it is about as thick as mush. A little buckwheat is an improvement. When the meal is in add salt and pepper to the taste, a little thyme, sage, and summer-savory. Cook about half an hour, and pour into pans to mould it. Great care must be taken while it is cooking not to let it scorch, as the corn meal burns very easily.

The moist sugar at the bottom of molasses and sugar barrels is very nice for ginger cakes. It can be got at the grocer's for eight cents per pound, and can be used for dried apples, peaches, etc.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THERE are many good Christian people, living far away in the quietude of their honest country homes, who have an abiding impression that New York city is one great sink of iniquity—a vast whirlpool of vice, which swallows up all the innocent victims within its reach. Such might be the natural verdict of those who should read, believingly, some of the newspapers which go forth from this city filled with hideous records of real and imaginary crimes. "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" is their incredulous query. As New York contains more bad people than a city of half its size does, so also, we trust, it contains more good people; as more evil deeds originate here, so also more good and benevolent ones. We enjoy recording those acts of beneficence which centre here, and send their blessings far and wide. A most useful charity, yet one which has made but little noise in our great city, is the Strangers' Hospital, on the corner of Avenue D and Tenth Street, which has recently been opened for the reception of patients. The building, which has cost over $200,000, including the endowment, was the gift of one gentleman to the public. It is designed to afford a home in sickness for permanent as well as transient residents of the city who have not the means to obtain, either at home or in a hotel, the care and treatment they require, and who shrink from the ordinary public hospitals. Those living in the country who have serious diseases, demanding special skill for relief, can be admitted here. The accommodations for private patients are comfortable and commodious; the wards are spacious and well ventilated. The price of board, including medical attendance and medicine, is $7 a week for adults, and $3 for children—about half of the actual cost of the accommodations. One-half of the beds are, however, free for the reception of such worthy persons requiring hospital treatment as may be unable to pay the customary charges. People of ample means will only be admitted where the peculiarities or necessities of the case seem to require the skilled services of the medical board. The Strangers' Hospital can accommodate about 200 patients.

A very choice collection of pictures and other works of art, which has been made by a French nobleman during the last twenty years, was removed from Paris prior to the commencement of the siege, and sold in London recently for about £6000.

The Scientific American describes various advertised fuel-saving inventions: a boiler which saves 33 per cent. of fuel, a valve which saves 15 per cent., a governor which saves 10 per cent., a cut-off which saves 10 per cent., a grate that saves 20 per cent., a metal packing which saves 12 per cent., and a lubricator which saves 1 per cent—total, 101 per cent. And the suggestion is made that somebody invent an engine combining all improvements, which would, of course, run itself, and produce a balance of fuel for culinary purposes!

A jolly, joke-loving gentleman of Massachusetts, liberal in politics and religion, was riding in the cars not long since with the Catholic priest of his village, who had been active in the temperance movement. He addressed him something as follows: "Father ——, you are doing a pretty good work just now; I don't know but you are doing as much good as all the other clergymen in town." The priest quietly replied that he was doing what he could to improve his people. "I'll tell you what it is," continued the gentleman, "I've been thinking about attending your church, but was afraid it would cost too much to get all my sins pardoned." "Oh," said the priest, "we can manage your case; when we have a very large contract we make a liberal discount!" The jolly gentleman enjoys repeating this joke as much as he did hearing it in the first instance.

There are thirty Hebrew synagogues in New York city, to each of which are attached benevolent societies. Every society also supports pensioners who are unable to take care of themselves. The Hebrew Relief Society expends $5000 annually for the poor and sick. At the Mount Sinai Hospital last year 723 in-door and 1064 out-door patients received treatment. One hundred and sixty orphans are supported at the Hebrew Benevolent and Orphan Asylum, and also charity is freely dispensed outside. The Hebrew Benevolent Fuel Association has a thousand members, each of whom pays three dollars a year. They distributed last year one thousand half-tons of coal. There are numerous other societies among the Hebrews, both benevolent and educational, which are conducted in a liberal and systematic manner.

It is said that the spring style for gentlemen when passing a lady on the street is to raise the hat with the left hand. It is important to remember that while performing this ceremony the thumb and little finger are to be placed under the rim, and that the bow must be a little to the left side, and not quite so low as formerly. Gentlemen who find it hard to fall into new fashions gracefully should practice at home before a glass.

The Harvard Boat Club has offered the Atlanta Club of New York the use of its boat-house, and will arrange for a race on the Charles River course in the month of June.

The recent opening of the "Albert Hall," in London, was a really brilliant affair, in which some eight or nine thousand persons participated. This vast circular hall is suitable but for few purposes—such as choral music on a grand scale. But the original idea has been persistently carried out by Queen Victoria in its design and completion. After the great Exhibition of 1851 Prince Albert devised many schemes respecting that part of the town where it had been. Among other projects was that of a great hall of science and art; and when, after the death of the prince, a national memorial was proposed, this hall was included in the design. Public and private subscriptions and appropriations from Parliament have, after much difficulty, furnished the means to complete the Albert Hall.

Those who oppose coffee-drinking will be pleased to know that experiments have been recently carried on in India which prove that coffee pulp will yield, upon distillation, nine per cent. of its own weight of spirit equal in strength to Scotch whisky.

It is said that the elegant Villa Rossini, the gift of the city of Paris to the great composer, has been desecrated by the French themselves—the francs-tireurs. The room in which Rossini died had been left exactly as it was when he breathed his last; and Madame Rossini, careless of whatever damage might be inflicted on other parts of the house, earnestly desired to keep this chamber sacred from intrusion. She caused a request to this effect to be written on the door; yet the room was pillaged, and the furniture wantonly destroyed.

Silver grows plenty, according to a Toronto newspaper, which states that Silver Islet Mine, on the north shore of Lake Superior, has yielded one mass of nearly pure silver, weighing 21,000 pounds, and a great many fragments of lesser size are daily rewarding the miners. In short, the metal is so common that they no longer barrel the ore, but pile it in heaps to be shipped in bulk, as they would iron or lead.

France is bitter toward Germany. Among the German savans whose names the French Academy of Sciences has on its lists, and proposes to erase, are those of Liebig, Kohler, Kummer, Bunsen, Hofmann, Weber, Mayer, and Kirchoff; among botanists, Mohl, Braun, and Hofmeister; among biologists and physicians, Siebold, Virchow, Rokitansky. It is even proposed to strike the names of all Germans off the lists of the French medical societies.

A bill which has recently passed both Houses of the New York Legislature authorizes the laying of pipes under the streets of New York city to contain carbonic acid gas, to be used in extinguishing fires. The design is to lay pipes similar to the gas-pipes all over the city, thirty-six inches below the curb-stone, with reservoirs for holding the gas a mile and a half apart.

The numerous friends of the Western Female Seminary, Oxford, Ohio, will learn with deep regret of the disaster which has befallen this benevolent institution. The relentless flames, for the second time since its establishment, have destroyed the seminary building, which was erected chiefly by the donations of a generous Christian public. The origin of the fire is unknown. No lives were lost, though over a hundred and seventy-five young ladies were in the building when the flames burst out. Some were seriously injured in escaping, and many lost nearly all their clothing. No appeal need be made to those who know the history of this institution, and are able to extend a helping hand in its time of need. We understand that contributions may be sent to Philip Hinkle, Esq., Cincinnati, or to Miss Helen Peabody, Oxford, Ohio.

Once upon a time—and it was summer-time—Rev. H. W. Beecher and Dr. Chapin were traveling together upon the outside of a country stage-coach. At one of the stopping-places a countryman asked if they "could make room for him up there," which was cheerfully done. Mr. Beecher entered into conversation with him, and learning he had recently visited New York, asked if he stopped over Sunday, and went to meeting there. He said he did; went to hear a fellow preach, but didn't remember his name.

"Henry Ward Beecher?" suggested Dr. Chapin.

"Yes, that was his name," said the countryman.

"How did you like him?" said Dr. Chapin, slyly winking at Mr. B.

"Oh, very well," said he.

"Did you go to hear him again in the afternoon?" said Mr. B.

"No, I went up town to hear another big fellow."

"Dr. Chapin?" suggested Mr. B.

"Yes, that was the name."

"And which did you like the best?" said Mr. B., winking at Dr. C.

"Oh, thunder!" exclaimed the countryman, "Dr. Chapin can preach Beecher right out of his boots!"

The shout that went up from that coach amazed the countryman, who failed to recognize his jovial companions.

THE SONG OF THE SIRENS.

COME where the woods are wooing
With fragrant flowers and fair;
Come where the doves are cooing
Love notes on every air.

Come where the wave is strewing
With pink-lipped shells the shore;
Come where the tide is flowing
O'er golden-sanded floor.

Come where the sunlight straying
Mellows us as we swim;
Come where the waters playing
Dimple each rosy limb.

Come to us, come where never
North wind unkindly blows;
Come to us, come and ever
Here in our arms repose.

Cóme where no storms are breaking,
Come where no tempests rend;
Come where love knows no waking,
Come where love knows no end.

THE RIVAL SCHOOLS.

See Illustration on page 296.

GREEK has evidently met Greek in this encounter, so familiar to the dwellers on Fifth and Madison avenues, and great is the curiosity as to what will be the result of the coming tug of war. The blonde leader of one school, with her hair floating in the wind, and her lip superciliously curled, seems like a charger ready to rush on her adversary, and sweep away all before her. The brunette, equally scornful, with her head in air and arms crossed on her breast, is braced to withstand the shock. Their companions eagerly bend forward to witness the meeting, all but the little darling at the left, who has caught a glimpse of a well-known face in the club-house window, which makes her forget even so great an event as the meeting face to face of the rival schools. There is as much esprit de corps among school-girls as any other class of the community, and we may be sure that each side enjoys the opportunity to express by look and gesture the opinion that it has of the other, as they sweep up and down the crowded avenue.

THE LADDER OF LOVE.

See Illustration on page 297.

OUR series of pictures this week may almost be said to illustrate the rise and progress of the tender passion. The girls whom we saw in the last engraving coquettishly glancing at the young gentlemen in the club-house windows have emerged from the school-room, and are fairly launched in society. Some of them here have evidently escaped from the crowded ball-room, and, followed by their attendant cavaliers, taken refuge on the broad, cool staircase, where they are holding charming tête-à-têtes alone in the midst of a crowd. The couple at the bottom of the staircase seem extremely happy. We can imagine that matters are on an assured footing with them, and that this young girl will be the heroine of our next picture, which will show her to us receiving the finishing touches to her bridal costume. The swain above is not so well satisfied. He evidently does not like to be left in the lurch while his lady-love flirts over the baluster with the gentleman below. And as far as the eye can reach up the winding staircase the picture repeats itself of fair maidens in the spring-time of youth and loveliness, full of the enjoyment of those golden moments that come but once in life, and are so quickly sped.

JACKO & CO.

IT is a wintry afternoon. The flakes of snow flutter fitfully against my window; the cheerful crackling of the blazing hickory-fire responds to the wild roar of the gusty wind. Upon the top of the brass fender is perched a gray African parrot, whose sagacity has passed into a household proverb, and whose apropos responses are circulated through a large circle of admiring friends; for he is a character, is Jacko. Prudent, shrewd, and cunning, he seems to divine with that cold, clear eye of his in what humor you are, and to deport himself accordingly. He is arranging his soft gray feathers with his unmanageable-looking beak, which he uses so adroitly for all purposes of toilette or of eating. This species of parrot it is of which so many diverting anecdotes are related, and it is conceded to be the most intelligent of all the tribe. Indeed, he is so well known, with his iron gray armor over back, breast, and head, relieved by the bright scarlet tail, as to require no description. Nature has clothed him in hues harmonious with the light tone of African landscape, so that whether, as the learned ornithologists say, he builds his nest in the hollow of an old tree, or whether, as he himself gives me to understand, he lines with feathers and leaves a deep cavity in the soft rock of Liberia, the neutral tint of the main portion of his body would render him inconspicuous at a short distance. Upon his arrival at our house, five years ago, I inquired his name, and to my consternation he replied, in a coarse voice, "Jacko—whacko Jack!" and Jacko he has remained ever since. His articulation is entirely distinct, and he readily learns any sentence or phrase that pleases him, especially the emphatic utterances of our juvenile street populace, so that his moral education requires some care. It is singular to see how quickly these birds do contract a habit of swearing; and the history of Vert-Vert, as humorously told by Saxe, has its parallel in a bird that I knew, which was brought to a celebrated divine in this city, but unfortunately it had learned to swear so distinctly from the sailors on its voyage that, for the character of the house, poor Poll had to be dismissed, and now edifies a fit audience in the bar-room of a Water Street tavern.

Our Jacko drives horses, blesses, pities, coaxes, and admires himself by the hour, whistles several airs, imitates the notes of the canary, and makes the neighborhood resound with sonorous improvisations, which are funny to hear. He runs a scale perfectly, now and then making a false note, and stopping to correct it with scrupulous care. There are instances on record of parrots that have exhibited much greater powers of memory, as the bird for which a cardinal gave one hundred golden crowns. It repeated the Lord's Prayer and Apostles' Creed with great accuracy; but I believe there are none which have shown greater comprehension of what was said than does our Jacko, judging from the aptitude of his replies.

Just now I said to him, "I am writing about you, and telling what a wise bird you are." And, with such a cock of the eye as Sally Brass may have bestowed upon the ambiguous flatteries of Mr. Richard Swiveller, he replies, "Oh, la! dry up!" Indeed, very soon after his arrival he signalized himself in this manner. I was lying on the lounge, and Jacko had been creeping around his cage, eying me from different points with much curiosity, until, as though his sympathy could be no longer repressed, he inquired, with anxiety, "Feel bad?" And I have never been able to induce him to repeat this. On one occasion, when a friend was relating some rather doleful experiences, and when Jacko had borne the mournful cadence of her voice as long as a parrot's cheerful philosophy permitted, he broke out impatiently with, "Never say die! never say die!" and effectually ended the lugubrious conversation by a laugh, in which he heartily joined. In all this his articulation is so distinct that it is impossible to mistake his meaning. He has a way of fluffing out his gray feathers, and screaming out, "I'm a devil, I'm a devil! oh, I'm a debbil, debbil, debbil!" which is rather startling when heard for the first time. There is a cockatoo in Philadelphia which has created more alarm, however, than I presume any of the tribe ever did before. He is judged to be about eighty years old, and his intellectual powers have been highly cultivated by the various masters who have had him. At one time he was placed in the hands of the janitor of the Medical Hospital, and from his perch in the corner inspected every patient who was admitted through the lodge, expressing his opinion, pro or con, upon the sufferer's recovery. And report says that when he called out, "Oh, poor soul! he'll die—he'll die!" the result always justified his opinion. He is quite celebrated through the city, being able to repeat verses and sentences, to answer questions rationally (on dit), as well as to sing several songs; and he receives the visits of the most august members of bench and bar without becoming at all elated with his acknowledged popularity. There is really no limit to the age to which parrots may attain, if carefully used, short of a century. And I presume Jacko will be but a baby of a bird when our heads are laid under the grass.

The following interesting account of a remarkable African parrot is an extract from a letter to a gentleman from the sister of its owner: "As you wished me to write down whatever I could remember about my sister's wonderful parrot, I proceed to do so, only premising that I will tell you nothing but what I can vouch for having myself heard. Her laugh is quite extraordinary, and it is impossible to help joining in it one's self, more especially when in the midst of it she cries out, 'Don't make me laugh so; I shall die—I shall die!' and then continues laughing more violently than before. Her crying and sobbing are curious. And if you say, 'Poor Poll, what is the matter?' she says, 'So bad—so bad! got a bad cold!' and after crying for some time, will gradually cease, and making a noise like drawing a long breath, say, 'Better now,' and begin to laugh. The first time I ever heard her speak was one day when I was talking to the maid at the bottom of the stairs, and heard what I then considered to be a child call out, 'Payne [the maid's name], I'm not well—I'm not well!' And on my saying, 'What is the matter with that child?' she replied, 'It is only the parrot; she always does so when I leave her alone, to make me come back.' And so it proved; for on her going into the room the parrot stopped, and then began laughing quite in a jeering way.

"It is singular enough that whenever she is affronted in any way she begins to cry, and when pleased, to laugh. If any one happens to cough or sneeze, she says, 'What a bad cold!' One day, when the children were playing with her, the maid came into the room, and on repeating to her several things which the parrot had said, Poll looked up and said, quite plainly, 'No, I didn't.' Sometimes, when she is inclined to be mischievous, the maid threatens to beat her, and she says, 'No, you won't.' She calls the cat very plainly, saying, 'Puss! puss!' and then answers, 'Mew;' but the most amusing part is that whenever I want to make her call it, and to that purpose say 'Puss! puss!' myself, she always answers 'Mew,' till I begin mewing, and then she begins calling 'Puss' as quick as possible. She imitates every kind of noise, and barks so naturally that I have known her to set all the dogs on the parade at Hampton Court barking; and the consternation I have seen her cause in a party of cocks and hens by her crowing and clucking has been the most ludicrous thing possible. She sings just like a child, and I have more than once thought it was a human being; and it was ridiculous to hear her make what one would call a false note, and then say, 'Oh, la!' and burst out laughing at herself, beginning again in quite another key. She is very fond of singing 'Buy a Broom,' which she says quite plainly; but, in the same spirit as in calling the cat, if we say, with a view to make her repeat it, 'Buy a Broom,' she always says, 'Buy a Brush,' and then laughs as a child might do when mischievous. She often performs a kind of exercise which I do not know how to describe except by saying it is like the lance exercise. She puts her claw behind her, first on one side and then on the other, then in front and round over her head; and while doing so keeps saying, 'Come on! come on!' and when finished says, 'Bravo! beautiful!' and draws herself up. Before I was as well acquainted with her as I am now she would stare in my face for some time, and then say, 'How d'ye do, ma'am?' This she invariably does to strangers. One day I went into the room where she was, and said to her, 'Poll, where is Payne gone?' and, to my astonishment and almost dismay, she said, 'Down stairs.' I can not at this moment recollect any thing more that I can vouch for myself, and I do not choose to trust to what I am told; but, from what I have myself seen and heard, she has almost made me a believer in transmigration."

But these African birds, with all their intelligence, are not without rivals in some varieties of the green parrots, one of which kind was owned by Colonel O'Kelly. This remarkable bird would beat time always with its foot, turning round upon the perch while singing. It could sing perfectly about fifty different tunes, of every kind—"God Save the King," solemn psalms, and humorous or low ballads, of which it articulated every word as distinctly as a man could do, without ever making a mistake. If a by-stander sang any part of the song, it would pause and take up the song where the person had left off, without repeating what he had said. When moulting and unwilling to sing, it would answer all solicitations by turning its back, and repeatedly saying, "Poll's sick." And it was also a green bird of which Willoughby tells the following:

"A parrot belonging to King Henry VII., who then resided at Westminster, in his palace by the river Thames, had learned to talk many words from the passengers as they happened to take water. One day, sporting on its perch, the poor bird fell into the water, at the same time crying out, as loud as he could, 'A boat! twenty pounds for a boat!' A waterman who happened to be near, hearing the cry, made to the place where the parrot was floating, and taking him up, restored him to the king. As it seems the bird was a favorite, the man insisted that he ought to have a reward rather equal to his services than his trouble; and as the parrot had cried 'twenty pounds,' he said the king was bound in honor to grant it. The king at last agreed to leave it to the parrot's own determination, which the bird hearing, cried out, 'Give the knave a groat!'"

Permit me, after this favorable prelude, to introduce to your notice my little Papagio, who sits upon my shoulder investigating my hair for pins, which he draws forth, turns over with beak and claw, and, disgusted with their inedible nature, throws upon the floor. He comes from the dense forests of the Amazon, bringing his Spanish name with him, and has crossed half a continent, while his companion, Jacko, was sailing over half a world of waters to meet him in my library. He does not speak a word, and refuses decidedly to learn; but nevertheless he is the pet par excellence, he is so affectionate and confiding. Indeed, he evinced such a devotion that when we sent him away on one occasion he refused to eat for three days; at the end of which time we were obliged to bring him back again to save his life. He allows only one other person besides myself to touch him; but, being admitted to his confidence, we may do with him as we please. He will never tolerate any petting of Jacko in his presence, or any display of attention to any thing save his own small self. His plumage is extremely gay, even gaudy, if nature can violate good taste. Above a black beak he wears a coronet of brilliant blue, while head, face, and neck are covered with yellow feathers; the rest of the body is of a clear golden green, and the wing coverts are dark green, scarlet, blue, and purple. Such is his plumage in the full light; when in shadow the green fades into a dull olive; and one can readily imagine, in spite of the variety of hues, that, sitting among the foliage of the trees, he would be unnoticed, the yellow throat looking like a chance fleck of sunshine between the leaves, as Nature rarely clothes her children in colors inharmonious with their habitations.

All these parrots have a prodigious power of flight, like the pigeon rising high in the air, but there are few whose pinions are not clipped when they are caught; and our Papagio, with one maimed wing, can not fly at all. I have watched him when the pigeons were flashing by the window, as with exultant call he flung himself from my hand, only to fall headlong upon the floor. Poor little fellow! he is not the only creature in this wide world of ours that circumstance has placed with clipped pinions in far other positions than that which nature designed. Only imagine what his life would have been in his native woods! To awake amidst the rich luxuriant foliage of the tropics, with the sound of insect and bird around him; then with a flock of merry companions to fly through the dewy morning air to the shining brook, where, chattering and screaming, they plunge and bathe, dashing the water over each other, and shrieking with perfect delight. Then the hunt for breakfast among the flower-seeds, or away off to a chance field of grain; or, better yet, to a huge serpentine vine, where he could swing half a day, eating the seeds of the young grapes, and biting the succulent tendrils. Then the noon siesta in the hollow tree, crooning little murmurs of perfect content to the faithful Papagita, who nestles by his side. A long life of health, freedom, and joy! what compensation can my caresses or care make to my Papagio for this? But whether it be that he prefers security from guns, arrows, serpents, and monkeys to all these glorious privileges, or whether, as I half suspect, he does not think at all about it, he makes himself quite contented with the human companionship which is possible to him; and he goes to the table, sits upon the slop-bowl, eats his roll, sips his coffee, and uses his napkin with as much ease as if "to the manner born;" only he will occasionally forget himself so far as to take a promenade over the dishes, or climb to the top of the caster and unscrew the bottles; but these are mere eccentricities of genius, and not his usual deportment.

If Nature ever formed a creature, out of her especial grace, to be a household pet, responding with intense and discriminating love to every kindness, and continually entertaining and amusing its owner, these parrots are the beings. So diverse in their individual characteristics, so like a human soul in embryo, with their passions, jealousies, loves, and curiosity, that he who has not one already will never regret immediately making himself the possessor of one. Dr. Brown, whose pathetic story of "Rab and his Friends" has won him a hearing, says "that no house unblessed by the presence of young children should be without a pet;" and as a laughable resource in weary hours, when the mind refuses even the lightest entertainment, there is nothing so amusing as these birds. And let me in particular recommend the gray African parrot. It is more intelligent and docile, and has no unpleasant cries to startle the nerves of those about it. Procure one of these, give him a large wire cage near a window, and also a stationary stand, where he may stretch his wide wings without danger from the bars; and be patient and kind with him, repeating to him at first simple but strongly intoned phrases, and you will soon have a pet to your heart's desire. Their food should be plain, and consist of hickory-nuts, apples, and bread soaked in coffee, as a staple. This I vary with celery, mush, and boiled rice, and any fruit in season; now and then, as a rare bonne bouche, an inch or two of beef, of which they are extremely fond. A small pine stick should be put into the cage for them to pick at and tear to pieces. Above all things, do not strike your bird, for what you gain in apparent sullen submission you will lose in his intelligence and affection. Let him feel that you are his friend and protector, and then all will progress well. Remember always that even in these lower forms of life the very best educator and civilizer is affection, and place yourself en rapport with your bird as much as possible, so as to establish a confidence on his part toward you. Trust my word, you, who from any cause are confined to the limit of two or three rooms and a monotonous routine of life, will find both body and mind invigorated by the amusement and entertaining occupation with which these feathered mimics will provide you.

OBLIGATIONS.

"OWE no man any thing, but to love one another," says the Bible; and it would be well for us if we all lived up to this precept, as to many others; for where there is real love there is no question of obligations. If perfect love casts out fear, so does it cast out pride, and abolish all need of independence. For love is a mutuality, an interchange, a reduplication, which destroys the sharp angles of one's individuality; so that to accept any thing from the beloved, paying back with trust and gratitude and quenchless affection, is not to accept a gratuity, not to lower one's pride for the sake of pelf, as is the case where one lays one's self under an obligation to a person not loved for the sake of the gain to be got thereby. We will set aside, then, all question of obligation where there is love; else we should get into a hopeless maze, and children would feel they were debtors to their parents for the long years of care and support—so they are, truly, but debtors only in love, not in kind; wives would be bound in obligation to their husbands for their food and raiment, unless they too had a banker or a portion; and all friendship would resolve itself into a debtor-and-creditor account, where nothing would be given for nothing, and where the ledger would be strictly balanced, and the floating margin rigorously curtailed. But outside this sweet world of love, where there can be no oppressive obligation, and where all the debt to be paid is one of affection, there is nothing much more valuable to teach our young people than sturdy independence, and difficulty rather than facility in accepting favors. Almost all our great men have been distinguished by their power of self-help, and the indifference they showed to climbing the social ladder by means of their friends' backs and their friends' purses. This is not saying that no great man has been born well set on the way by natural and inherited advantages, but it means simply self-made greatness. Neither is it saying that all socially successful persons have been so distinguished. We wish we could say this. But, unfortunately for the honor of human nature, many a social success which has lasted for a life-time, and looked very well, too, when not examined too near, has been obtained by exactly contrary means; and the want of obstructive pride against flaunting in borrowed plumes and chinking another man's money is one of the most surprising characteristics of this kind of success. Pride! Such people do not understand the meaning of the word in its nobler acceptation; in its baser sense—yes, they have learned it there from alpha to omega! Worse, indeed, than many a fault which falls under the lash of the law and the ferule of Mrs. Grundy is this miserable meanness which will accept favors from any one, which will lay itself under obligations to its whole society, if by so doing an inch of higher social ground can be obtained, one line of personal advantage won.

This does not touch the question of kindly giving and humbly receiving when the occasion demands. There is sometimes more generosity in accepting the favor lovingly and generously offered than there is self-respect in refusing it, and the true wisdom of life is "to know when," in this as in other things. To be always on stilts, with one's head in the air, scornfully rejecting all aid, whether one is lost on a moor or stuck fast in a morass, is to be silly and vain, if to hold out both hands, and a wide-cut apron too, for any gifts and favors one's friends or mere acquaintances will fling to us, is to be base and contemptible. The golden mean, that lovely but most difficult point to hit, is to understand what is to be accepted and what rejected, and why and how and when. Our elders and our superiors may give to us without loss to our self-respect; but then comes in the question, Who are our superiors? Does money make this superiority? But no high-spirited person likes to be fed, a social Lazarus, with the crumbs that Dives lets fall. Does station make this superiority? Favors from one's social superiors are terribly apt to transform the recipient into a sycophant, and to bend his neck many degrees too low in the zeal of selfish meanness that parades itself as gratitude and humility. Does mere age make this superiority? But old people are not disinclined to subsidize the young, and to buy with so much money attentions which they can not command for reverent grace. So that, even starting with the admission that we may accept favors from our elders and superiors, we have to turn back with so large a negative qualification as almost to nullify what has been conceded. On the whole, it is better to err on the side of independence than of laxity. Less harm is done by holding one's head high than by bending it lower than one's heart.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

By Miss BRADDON,

Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," etc.

CHAPTER VI.

AND THIS IS GEORGE FAIRFAX.

The next day was lovely. There seemed, indeed, no possibility of variation in the perfection of this summer weather; and Clarissa Lovel felt her spirits as light as if the unknown life before her had been all brightness, unshadowed by one dread or care. The party for Marley Wood started about an hour after breakfast—Lady Laura, Mrs. Dacre, Barbara Fermor, and Clarissa in one carriage; two Misses Dacre, Lady Geraldine, and Mrs. Wilmot in the other; Lizzie Fermor and Rose Dacre on horseback; with a small detachment of gentlemen in attendance upon them. There were wide grassy waste lands on each side of the road almost all the way to the wood, on which the equestrian party could disport themselves, without much inconvenience from the dust of the two carriages. Once arrived at the wood, there were botanizing, fern-hunting, sketching, and flirtation without limit. Lady Laura was quite happy, discussing her Dorcas societies and the ingratitude of her model cottagers with Mrs. Dacre; Lady Geraldine sat at the foot of a great shining beech, with her white dress set off by a background of scarlet shawl, and her hat lying on the grass beside her. She seemed too listless to ramble about with the rest of the party, or to take the faintest interest in the conversation of any of the gentlemen who tried to talk to her. She amused herself in a desultory way with a drawing-book and a volume of a novel, and did not appear to consider it incumbent on her to take notice of any one.

Clarissa and Barbara Fermor wandered away into the heart of the wood, attended by the indefatigable Captain Westleigh, and sketched little bits of fern and undergrowth in their miniature sketch-books, much to the admiration of the Captain, who declared that Clarissa had a genius for landscape. "As you have for croquet and for every thing else, I think," he said; "only you are so quiet about your resources. But I am very glad you have not that grand sultana manner of Lady Geraldine Challoner's. I really can't think how any man can stand it, especially such a man as George Fairfax."

"Why 'especially?'" asked Miss Fermor, curiously.

"Well, I don't know exactly how to explain my meaning to a lady—because he has knocked about the world a good deal—seen a great deal of life, in short. Il a vécu, as the French say. He is not the kind of man to be any woman's slave, I should think; he knows too much of the sex for that. He would take matters with rather a high hand, I should fancy. And then Lady Geraldine, though she is remarkably handsome, and all that kind of thing, is not in the first freshness of her youth. She is nearly as old as George, I should say; and when a woman is the same age as a man, it is her misfortune to seem much older. No, Miss Fermor, upon my word, I don't consider them fairly matched."

"The lady has rank," said Barbara Fermor.

"Yes, of course. It will be Mr. and Lady Geraldine Fairfax. There are some men who care for that kind of thing; but I don't suppose George is one of them. The Fairfaxes are of a noble old Scotch family, you know, and hold themselves equal to any of our nobility."

"When is Mr. Fairfax expected at the Castle?"

"Not till to-night. He is to come by the last train, I believe. You may depend Lady Geraldine would not be here if there were any chance of his arriving in the middle of the day. She will keep him up to collar, you may be sure. I shouldn't like to be engaged to a woman armed with the experience of a decade of London seasons. It must be tight work!"

A shrill bell, pealing gayly through the wood, summoned them to luncheon; a fairy banquet spread upon the grass under a charmed circle of beeches; chicken pies and lobster salads, mayonaise of salmon and daintily glazed cutlets in paper frills, inexhaustible treasure of pound-cake and strawberries and cream, with a pyramid of hot-house pines and peaches in the centre of the turf-spread banquet. And for the wines, there were no effervescent compounds from the laboratory of the wine-chemist—Lady Laura's guests were not thirsty cockneys, requiring to be refreshed by "fizz"—but delicate amber-tinted vintages of the Rhineland, which seemed too ethereal to intoxicate, and yet were dangerous. And for the more thirsty souls there were curiously compounded "cups:" claret and soda-water, fortified with curaçoa, and flavored artistically with burrage or sliced pine-apple.

The banquet was a merry one; and it was nearly four o'clock when the ladies had done trifling with strawberries and cream, and the gentlemen had suspended their homage to the Rhineland. Then came a still more desultory wandering of couples to and fro among the shadowy intricacies of the wood; and Clarissa, having for once contrived to get rid of the inevitable Captain, who had been beguiled away to inspect some remote grotto under convoy of Barbara Fermor, was free to wander alone whither she pleased. She was rather glad to be alone for a little. Marley Wood was not new to her. It had been a favorite spot of her brother Austin's, and the two had spent many a pleasant day beneath the umbrage of those grand forest trees; she sitting and reading, neither of them talking very much, only in a spasmodic way, when Austin was suddenly moved by some caprice to pour out his thoughts into the ear of his little sister—strange bitter thoughts they were sometimes; but the girl listened as to the inspirations of genius, she loved and admired him so much. Here he had taught her almost all that she had ever learned of landscape art. She had only improved by long practice upon those early simple lessons. She was glad to be alone, for these old memories were sad ones. She wandered quite away from the rest, and, sitting down upon a bank that sloped toward a narrow streamlet, began to sketch stray tufts and clusters of weedy undergrowth—a straggling blackberry branch, a bit of ivy creeping sinuously along the uneven ground—in an absent, desultory way, thinking of her brother and the days gone by. She had been alone like this about half an hour, when the crackling of the brambles near her warned her of an approaching footstep. She looked up, and saw a stranger approaching her through the sunlight and shadows of the wood—a tall man in a loose gray overcoat.

A stranger? No. As he came nearer to her the face seemed very familiar; and yet in that first moment she could not imagine where she had seen him. A little nearer, and she remembered all at once. This was her companion of the long railway journey from London to Holborough. She blushed at the recollection, not altogether displeased to see him again, and yet remembering bitterly that cruel mistake she had made about Arden Court. She might be able to explain her error now, if he should recognize her and stop to speak; but that was scarcely likely. He had forgotten her utterly, no doubt, by this time.

She went on with her sketching—a wreath of delicate ivy leaves, winding away and losing itself in a confusion of bramble and fern, every leaf sharply defined by the light pencil touches, with loving Pre-Raphaelite care—she went on, trying to think that it was not the slightest consequence to her whether this man remembered their brief acquaintance of the railway carriage. And yet she would have been wounded, ever so little, if he had forgotten her. She knew so few people, that this accidental acquaintance seemed almost a friend. He had known her brother, too; and there had been something in his manner that implied an interest in her fate.

She bent a little lower over the sketch-book, doing her uttermost not to be seen, perhaps all the more because she really did wish for the opportunity of explaining that mistake about Arden Court. Her face was almost hidden under the coquettish gray hat as she bent over her drawing; but the gentleman came on toward her with evident purpose. It was only to make an inquiry, however.

"I am looking for a picnic party," he said. "I discovered the débris of a luncheon yonder, but no human creature visible. Perhaps you can kindly tell me where the strayed revelers are to be found; you are one of them, perhaps?"

Clarissa looked up at him, blushing furiously, and very much ashamed of herself for the weakness, and then went on with her drawing in a nervous way, as she answered him,

"Yes, I am with Lady Laura Armstrong's party; but I really can not tell you where to look for them all. They are roaming about in every direction, I believe."

"Good gracious me!" cried the gentleman, coming a good deal nearer—stepping hastily across the streamlet, in fact, which had divided him from Clarissa hitherto. "Have I really the pleasure of speaking to Miss Lovel? This is indeed a surprise. I scarcely expected ever to see you again."

"Nor I to see you," Clarissa answered, recovering herself a little by this time, and speaking with her accustomed frankness. "And I have been very anxious to see you again."

"Indeed!" cried the gentleman, eagerly.

"In order to explain a mistake I made that night in the railway carriage, in speaking of Arden Court. I talked of the place as if it had still belonged to papa; I did not know that he had sold it, and fancied I was going home there. It was only when I saw my uncle that I learned the truth. You must have thought it very strange."

"I was just a little mystified, I confess, for I had dined at the Court with Mr. Granger."

"Papa had sold the dear old place, and, disliking the idea of writing such unpleasant news, had told me nothing about the sale. It was not wise, of course, but he felt the loss of Arden so keenly I can scarcely wonder that he could not bring himself to write about it."

"It would have been better to have spared you, though," the unknown answered, gravely. "I dare say you were as fond of the old home as ever your father could have been?"

"I don't think it would be possible for any one to love Arden better than I. But then, of course, a man is always prouder than a woman—"

"I am not so sure of that," the stranger muttered, parenthetically.

"And papa felt the degradation involved in the loss."

"I won't admit of any degradation in the case. A gentleman is none the less a gentleman for having spent his fortune rather recklessly, and the old blood is no less pure without the old acres. If your father were a wise man he might be happier now than he has ever been. The loss of a great estate is the loss of a bundle of cares."

"I dare say that is very good philosophy," Clarissa answered, smiling, beguiled from painful thoughts by the lightness of his tone; "but I doubt if it applies to all cases—not to papa's, certainly."

"You were sketching, I see, when I interrupted you. I remember you told me that night of your fondness for art. May I see what you were doing?"

"It is hardly worth showing you. I was only amusing myself, sketching at random—that ivy straggling along there, or any thing that caught my eye."

"But that sort of thing indicates so much. I see you have a masterly touch for so young an artist. I won't say any thing hackneyed about so fair a one; for women are showing us nowadays that there are no regions of art closed against them. Well, it is a divine amusement and a glorious profession."

There was a little pause after this, during which Clarissa looked at her watch, and, finding it nearly five o'clock, began to put up her pencils and drawing-book.

"I did not think that you knew Lady Laura Armstrong," she said; and then blushed for the speech, remembering that, as she knew absolutely nothing about himself or his belongings, the circumstance of her ignorance on this one point was by no means surprising.

"No; nor did I expect to meet you here," replied the gentleman. "And yet I might almost have done so, knowing that you lived at Arden. But, you see, it is so long since we met, and I—"

"Had naturally forgotten me."

"No, I had not forgotten you, Miss Lovel, nor would it have been natural for me to forget you. I am very glad to meet you again under such agreeable auspices. You are going to stay at the Castle a long time, I hope. I am booked for an indefinite visit."

"Oh no, I don't suppose I shall stay very long. Lady Laura is extremely kind; but this is my first visit, and she must have many friends who have a greater claim upon her hospitality."

"Hale Castle is a large place, and I am sure Lady Laura has always room for agreeable guests."

"She is very, very kind. You have known her a long time, perhaps?"

"Yes, I have been intimate with the Challoners ever since I was a boy. Lady Laura was always charming; but I think her marriage with Fred Armstrong—who worships the ground she walks on—and the possession of Hale Castle have made her absolutely perfect."

"And you know her sister, Lady Geraldine, of course?"

"Oh yes, I know Geraldine."

"Do you know Mr. Fairfax, the gentleman to whom she is engaged?"

"Well, yes; I am supposed to have some knowledge of that individual."

Something in his smile, and a certain significance in his tone, let in a sudden light upon Clarissa's mind.

"I am afraid I am asking very foolish questions," she said. "You are Mr. Fairfax?"

"Yes, I am George Fairfax. I forgot that I had omitted to tell you my name that night."

"And I had no idea that I was speaking to Mr. Fairfax. You were not expected till quite late this evening."

"No. But I found my business in London easier to manage than I had supposed it would be; so, as in duty bound, I came down here directly I found myself free. When I arrived at the Castle, I was told of this picnic, and rode off at once to join the party."

"And I am keeping you here, when you ought to be looking for your friends."

"There is no hurry. I have done my duty, and am here. That is the grand point. Shall we go and look for them together?"

"If you like. I dare say we shall be returning to the Castle very soon."

They sauntered slowly away, in and out among the trees, toward a grassy glade, where there was more open space for walking, and where the afternoon sun shone warmly on the smooth turf.

"I hope you get on very well with Geraldine?" Mr. Fairfax said, presently.

It was almost the same phrase Lady Laura had used about her sister.

"I have seen so little of her yet," Clarissa answered, rather embarrassed by this inquiry. "I should like to know her very much; but she only arrived yesterday, and we have scarcely spoken half a dozen words to each other yet."

"You will hardly like her at first, perhaps," Mr. Fairfax went on, doubtfully. "People who don't know much of her are apt to fancy her cold and proud; but to those whom she really likes she is all that is charming; and I don't think she can fail to like you."

"You are very kind to say so. I hope she may like me. Do you know, I have been so much interested in Lady Geraldine from the first—before I saw her even; partly, perhaps, because her sister told me about her engagement. You will think that very romantic and silly, I dare say."

"Not at all; a young lady is bound to be interested in that kind of thing. And I hope your interest in Lady Geraldine was not lessened when you did see her."

"It could scarcely be that. No one could help admiring her."

"Yes, she is very handsome; there is no question about that. She has been an acknowledged beauty ever since she came out. I think I can catch a glimpse of her yonder among the trees; I see a white dress and a scarlet shawl. Geraldine always had a penchant for scarlet draperies."

"Yes, that is Lady Geraldine."

They hastened their steps a little, and came presently to the circle of beeches where they had lunched, and where most of the party were now assembled, preparing for the return journey. Lady Geraldine was sauntering to and fro with Major Mason, listening with a somewhat indifferent air to that gentleman's discourse.

She caught sight of her lover the moment he appeared, and Clarissa saw the statuesque face light up with a faint flush of pleasure that brightened it wonderfully. But however pleased she might be, Lady Geraldine Challoner was the last of women to demonstrate her pleasure in her lover's arrival by any overt act. She received him with the calm grace of an empress, who sees only one courtier more approach the steps of her throne. They shook hands quietly, after Mr. Fairfax had shaken hands and talked for two or three minutes with Lady Laura Armstrong, who welcomed him with considerable warmth.

The Major dropped quietly away from Lady Geraldine's side, and the plighted lovers strolled under the trees for a little, pending the signal for the return.

"So you know Miss Lovel?" Geraldine said, with an icy air of surprise, as soon as she and George Fairfax were alone.

"I can hardly say that I know her; our acquaintance is the merest accident," answered Mr. Fairfax, and then proceeded to relate his railway adventure.

"How very odd that she should travel alone!"

"Scarcely so odd when you remember the fact of her father's poverty. He could not be supposed to find a maid for his daughter."

"But he might be supposed to take some care of her. He ought not to have allowed her to travel alone—at night, too!"

"It was careless and imprudent, no doubt. Happily she came to no harm. She was spared from any encounter with a traveling swell-mobsman, who would have garroted her for the sake of her watch and purse, or an insolent bagman, who would have made himself obnoxiously agreeable on account of her pretty face."

"I suppose she has been in the habit of going about the world by herself. That accounts for her rather strong-minded air."

"Do you find her strong-minded? I should have thought her quite gentle and womanly."

"I really know nothing about her, and I must not say any thing against her. She is Laura's last protégée; and you know when my sister takes any one up it is always a case of rapture."

After this the lovers began to talk about themselves, or rather George Fairfax talked about himself, giving a detailed account of his proceedings since last they had met.

"I went down to see my uncle," he said, "the day before yesterday. He is at Lyvedon, and I had a good look at the old house. Really it is the dearest old place in the world, Geraldine, and I should like above all things to live there by-and-by, when the estate is ours. I don't think we are likely to wait very long. The poor old man is awfully shaky. He was very good to me, dear old boy, and asked all manner of kind questions about you. I think I have quite won his heart by my engagement. He regards it as a pledge of my reform."

"I am glad he is pleased," replied Lady Geraldine, in a tone that was just a shade more gracious than that in which she had spoken of Clarissa.

The summons to the carriages came almost immediately. Mr. Fairfax conducted his betrothed to her seat in the barouche, and then mounted his horse to ride back to the Castle beside her. He rode by the side of the carriage all the way, indifferent to dust; but there was not much talk between the lovers during that homeward progress, and Clarissa fancied there was a cloud upon Mr. Fairfax's countenance.

CHAPTER VII.

DANGEROUS GROUND.

Life was very pleasant at Hale Castle. About that one point there could not be a shadow of doubt. Clarissa wondered at the brightness of her new existence; began to wonder vaguely by-and-by what it was that made it seem brighter every day. There was all the usual round of amusements—dinner-parties, amateur concerts, races, flower shows, excursions to every point of interest within a day's drive, a military ball at the nearest garrison town twenty miles off, perennial croquet, and gossip, and afternoon tea-drinking in arbors or marquees in the gardens, and unlimited flirtation. It was impossible for the most exacting visitor to be dull. There was always something.

And to Clarissa all these things possessed the charm of freshness. She was puzzled beyond measure by the indifference, real or simulated, of the girls who had seen half a dozen London seasons; the frequent declarations that these delights only bored them, that this or that party was a failure. George Fairfax watched her bright face sometimes, interested in spite of himself by her freshness.

"What a delicious thing youth is!" he said to himself. "Even if that girl were less completely lovely than she is, she would still be most charming. If Geraldine were only like that—only fresh and candid and pure, and susceptible to every new emotion! But there is an impassable gulf of ten years between them. Geraldine is quite as handsome—in her own particular style—and she talks much better than Clarissa Lovel, and is more clever, no doubt; and yet there are some men who would be bewitched by that girl before they knew where they were."

Very often after this Mr. Fairfax fell a-musing upon those apocryphal men who might be subjugated by the charms of Miss Lovel.

When did he awaken to the fatal truth that those charms were exercising a most potent influence upon his own mind? When did he open his eyes for the first time to behold his danger?

Not yet. He was really attached to Geraldine Challoner. Her society had been a kind of habit with him for several years of his life. She had been more admired than any woman he knew, and it was, in some sort, a triumph to have won her. That he never would have won her but for his brother's death he knew well, and accepted the fact as a matter of course—a mere necessity of the world in which they lived—not as any evidence of a mercenary spirit in the lady. He knew that no woman could better discharge the duties of an elevated station, or win him more social renown. To marry Geraldine Challoner was to secure for his house the stamp of fashion, for every detail of his domestic life a warrant of good taste. She had a kind of power over him, too, an influence begun long ago, which had never yet been oppressive to him. And he took these things for love. He had been in love with other women during his long alliance with Lady Geraldine, and had shown more ardor in the pursuit of other flames than he had ever evinced in his courtship of her; but these more passionate attachments had come, for the most part, to a sorry end; and now he told himself that Geraldine suited him better than any other woman in the world.

"I have outgrown all foolish notions," he said to himself, believing that all capacity was dead within him for that blind, unreasoning passion which poets of the Byronic school have made of love. "What I want is a wife—a wife of my own rank, or a little above me in rank—a wife who will be true and loyal to me, who knows the world well enough to forgive my antecedents, and to be utterly silent about them, and who will help me to make a position for myself in the future. A man must be something in this world. It is a hard thing that one can not live one's own life; but it seems inevitable somehow."

His mother had helped not a little to the bringing about of this engagement. She knew that her son's bachelor life had been at best a wild one; not so bad as it was supposed to be, of course, since nothing in this world ever is so bad as the rest of the world supposes it; and she was very anxious to see him safely moored in the sheltered harbor of matrimony. She was a proud woman, and she was pleased that her son should have an earl's daughter for his wife; and beyond this there was the fact that she liked Lady Geraldine. The girl who had been too proud to let the man she loved divine the depth of her feeling had not been too proud to exhibit her fondness for his mother. There had grown up a warm friendship between these two women, and Mrs. Fairfax's influence had done much, almost unknown to her son, to bring about this result of his chronic flirtation with Geraldine Challoner.

Just at present he was very well satisfied with the fact of his engagement, believing that he had taken the best possible means for securing his future happiness; an equable, quiet sort of happiness, of course—he was nearly thirty, and had outlived the possibility of any thing more than that. It would have bored him to suppose that Geraldine expected more from him than this tranquil kind of worship. Perhaps the lady understood this, and schooled herself to a colder tone than was even natural to her, rather than be supposed for one moment to be the more deeply attached of the two.

Thus it happened that Mr. Fairfax was not severely taxed in his capacity of plighted lover. However exacting Lady Geraldine may have been by nature, she was too proud to demand more exclusive attention than her betrothed spontaneously rendered; indeed, she took pains to let him perceive that he was still in full enjoyment of all his old bachelor liberty. So the days drifted by very pleasantly, and George Fairfax found himself in Clarissa Lovel's society perhaps a little oftener than was well for either of those two.

He was very kind to her; he seemed to understand her better than other people, she thought; and his companionship was more to her than that of any one else—a most delightful relief after Captain Westleigh's incessant frivolity, or Mr. Halkin's solemn small-talk. In comparison with these men he appeared to such wonderful advantage. Her nature expanded in his society, and she could talk to him as she talked to no one else. He used to wonder at her eloquence sometimes, as the beautiful face glowed, and the dark hazel eyes brightened; he wondered not a little also at the extent of her reading, which had been wide and varied during that quiet winter and spring time at Mill Cottage.

"What a learned lady you are!" he said, smiling at her enthusiasm, one day, when they had been talking of Italy and Dante; "your close knowledge of the poet puts my poor smattering to shame. Happily, an idler and a worldling like myself is not supposed to know much. I was never patient enough to be a profound reader; and if I can not tear the heart out of a book, as Samuel Johnson did, I am apt to throw it aside in disgust. But you must have read a great deal; and yet when we met, less than a year ago, you confessed to being only a schoolgirl fresh from grinding away at Corneille and Racine."

"I have had the advantage of papa's help since then," answered Clarissa, "and he is very clever. He does not read many authors, but those he does care for he reads with all his heart. He taught me to appreciate Dante, and to make myself familiar with the history of his age, in order to understand him better."

"Very wise of him, no doubt. And that kind of studious life with your papa is very pleasant to you, I suppose, Miss Lovel?"

"Yes," she answered, thoughtfully; "I have been quite happy with papa. Some people might fancy the life dull, perhaps; but it has scarcely seemed so to me. Of course it is very different from life here; but I suppose one would get tired of such a perpetual round of pleasure as Lady Laura provides for us."

"I should imagine so. Life in a country house full of delightful people must be quite intolerable beyond a certain limit. One so soon gets tired of one's best friends. I think that is why people travel so much nowadays. It is the only polite excuse for being alone."

The time came when Clarissa began to fancy that her visit had lasted long enough, and that, in common decency, she was bound to depart; but on suggesting as much to Lady Laura, that kindly hostess declared she could not possibly do without her dearest Clarissa for ever so long.

"Indeed, I don't know how I shall ever get on without you, my dear," she said; "we suit each other so admirably, you see. Why, I shall have no one to read Tasso with—no one to help me with my Missal when you are gone."

Miss Lovel's familiar knowledge of Italian literature and artistic tastes had been altogether delightful to Lady Laura, who was always trying to improve herself, as she called it, and traveled from one pursuit to another with a laudable perseverance, but an unhappy facility for forgetting one accomplishment in the cultivation of another. Thus, by a vigorous plunge into Spanish and Calderon this year, she was apt to obliterate the prosister's accomplishments she displayed a profound indifference, not to say contempt. She was not herself given to the cultivation of these polite arts; nothing could ever induce her to play or sing in public. She read a good deal, but rarely talked about books; it was difficult, indeed, to say what Lady Geraldine did talk about; yet in the art of conversation, when she chose to please, Geraldine Challoner infinitely surpassed the majority of women in her circle. Perhaps this may have been partly because she was a good listener; and, in some measure, on account of that cynical, mocking spirit in which she regarded most things, and which was apt to pass for wit.

Clarissa had been a month at Hale Castle already; but she staid on at the urgent desire of her hostess, much too happy in that gay, social life to oppose that lady's will.

"If you really, really wish to have me, dear Lady Laura," she said; "but you have been so kind already, and I have staid so long, that I begin to feel myself quite an intruder."

"You silly child! I do really, really wish to have you. I should like to keep you with me always, if I could. You suit me so much better than any of my sisters; they are the most provoking girls in the world, I think, for being uninterested in my pursuits. And your Italian is something wonderful. I have not opened my dictionary since we have been reading together. And, beyond all that, I have a very particular reason for wishing you to be here next month."

"Why next month, Lady Laura?"

"I am not going to tell you that."

"But you quite mystify me."

"I mean to mystify you. No, it's not the least use asking questions, Clary; but mind, you must not tease me any more about running away: that is understood."

In all this time Clarissa had not found herself found impression created by Dante and Tasso last year. Her music suffered by reason of a sudden ardor for illumination; or art went to the wall because a London musical season and an enthusiastic admiration of Hallé had inspired her with the desire to cultivate a more classic style of piano-forte playing. So, in her English reading, each new book blotted out its predecessor. Travels, histories, essays, biographies flitted across the lady's brain like the colored shadows of a magic-lantern, leaving only a lingering patch of picture here and there. To be versatile was Lady Laura's greatest pride, and courteous friends had gratified her by treating her as an authority upon all possible subjects. Nothing delighted her so much as to be appealed to with a preliminary "Now you, who read so much, Lady Laura, will understand this;" or, "Dear Lady Laura, you, who know every thing, must tell me why," etc.; or to be told by a painter, "You who are an artist yourself can of course see this, Lady Laura;" or to be complimented by a musician as a soul above the dull mass of mankind—a sympathetic spirit, to whom the mysteries of harmony are a familiar language.

In that spacious, luxurious morning-room of Lady Laura's Clarissa generally spent the first two hours after breakfast. Here the children used to come with French and German governesses, in all the freshness of newly starched muslin and newly crimped tresses, to report progress as to their studies and general behavior to their mother, who was apt to get tired of them in something less than a quarter of an hour, and to dispatch them with kisses and praises to the distant school-rooms and nurseries, where these young exotics were enjoying the last improvements in the forcing system.

Geraldine Challoner would sometimes drop into this room for a few minutes at the time of the children's visit, and would converse not unkindly with her nephews and nieces; but for her any nearer to that desired result of getting on well with Geraldine Challoner. That lady seemed quite as far away from her after a month's acquaintance as she had seemed at the very first. It was not that Lady Geraldine was uncivil. She was polite, after her manner, to Clarissa, but never cordial; and yet she could not fail to see that George Fairfax admired and liked Miss Lovel, and she might have been supposed to wish to think well of any one he liked.

Was she jealous of Clarissa? Well, no, it scarcely seemed possible to associate the fever of jealousy with that serene temperament. She had an air of complete security in all her intercourse with George Fairfax, which was hardly compatible with doubt or the faintest shadow of suspicion. If ever she did speak of Miss Lovel to her lover, or to any one else, she talked of her as a pretty country girl, and seemed to consider her as far removed, by reason of her youth and obscure position, from herself as if they had been inhabitants of two separate worlds.

Mr. Lovel had been invited to several dinner-parties at the Castle since his daughter's visit, but was not to be drawn from his seclusion. He had no objection, however, that Clarissa should stay as long as Lady Laura cared to retain her, and wrote very cordially to that effect.

What a pleasant, idle, purposeless life it was, and how rapidly it drifted by for Clarissa! She wondered to find herself so happy; wondered what the charm was which made her life so new and sweet, which made her open her eyes on the morning sunshine with such a glad eagerness to greet the beginning of another day, and filled up every hour with such a perfect sense of contentment.

She wondered at this happiness only in a vague, dreamy way, not taking much trouble to analyze her feelings. It was scarcely strange that she should be completely happy in a life so different from her dull existence at home. The freshness and beauty of all these pleasant things would be worn off in time, no doubt, and she would become just like these other young women, with their experience of many seasons, and their perpetual complaint of being bored; but just now, while the freshness lasted, every thing delighted her.

Clarissa had been more than six weeks at the Castle, while other visitors had come and gone, and the round of country-house gayeties had been unbroken. The Fermors were still at Hale, and languidly deprecated the length of their visit, without any hint of actual departure. Captain Westleigh had gone back to his military duties very much in love with Miss Lovel, and plaintively protested, in his confidences with a few chosen friends, against a Providence which had made them both penniless.

"I don't suppose I shall ever meet such a girl again," he would declare, piteously. "More than once I was on the point of making her an offer; the words were almost out, you know; for I don't go in for making a solemn business of the thing, with a lot of preliminary palaver. If a fellow really likes a girl, he doesn't want to preach a sermon in order to let her know it; and ever so many times, when we've been playing croquet, or when I've been hanging about the piano with her of an evening, I've been on the point of saying, 'Upon my word, Miss Lovel, I think we two are eminently suited to each other; don't you?' or something plain and straightforward of that kind; and then I've remembered that her father can't give her a sixpence, which, taken in conjunction with the lively state of my affairs, would mean starvation!"

"And do you think she liked you?" a curious friend would perhaps inquire.

"Well, I don't know. She might do worse, you see. As a rule, girls generally do like me. I don't see why there should be any difference in her case."

Nor did the Captain for a moment imagine that Clarissa would have rejected him had he been in a position to make an offer of his hand.

Lady Geraldine was a fixture at Hale. She was to stay there till her marriage, with the exception, perhaps, of a brief excursion to London for millinery purposes, Lady Laura told Clarissa. But the date of the marriage had not yet been settled—had been, indeed, only discussed in the vaguest manner, and the event seemed still remote.

"It will be some time this year, I suppose," Lady Laura said; "but beyond that I can really say nothing. Geraldine is so capricious; and perhaps George Fairfax may not be in any great hurry to give up his bachelor privileges. He is very different from Fred, who worried me into marrying him six weeks after he proposed. And in this case a long engagement seems so absurd, when you consider that they have known each other for ten years. I shall be really very glad when the business is over, for I never feel quite sure of Geraldine."

FINISHING TOUCHES.

IN the accompanying graphic picture the artist shows us the fair bride, arrayed in snowy habiliments, receiving the last touches to her dress from loving hands who will depute the task to none other. The sisters with a tender hand arrange the bridal veil, while the mother makes critical suggestions as she presides, with mingled pride and sadness, over the toilette of the child whom she has watched over from infancy, but whom she is soon to surrender into another's keeping; and the kneeling maid gazes with admiration at the young goddess, flushed with happiness and emotion, who, for this day at least, will reign as queen over all about her, with none to dispute her sway.

FINISHING TOUCHES.—[DRAWN BY MRS. A. P. STEPHENS.]

MOSAICS.

THE great value of mosaic consists in its indestructibility. The most carefully prepared pigments fade; fresco is affected by damp, and easily injured by accidents. The finest works of Leonardo da Vinci, Titian, and other great masters are gradually becoming effaced or clouded in obscurity. A few more generations, and copies more or less imperfect, engravings, and photographs, will be all that remain to verify the tradition of glories that have been; the glow of color and richness of tone, even now deepening into hues too sombre, will be things of the past.

Mosaic is, as far as human work can go, permanent. Not being merely superficial, the surface may be injured with impunity. Ground down and repolished, the picture reappears in its pristine beauty, all its colors fresh and pure as when first it left the atelier of the artist.

Mosaic-work is at present divided into two kinds—the Florentine and the Roman. The Florentine work is in real stone. At first only black, white, and gray were used, the figures being thus represented in simple chiaro-oscuro. But about the year 1563, in the time of Duke Cosmo de Medici, many veins of rich marble were discovered near Florence.

This discovery gave a new impetus to the workers in mosaic, who were, by means of these marbles, enabled to imitate the colors as well as the forms of the objects they wished to represent. To these were added lapis lazuli, agates, and even precious stones. When the latter are used they are sawed into thin laminæ, and applied like veneer.

In the execution of this description of mosaic, a slab of marble of the requisite size is prepared for the ground. On this the design is traced; then small cavities are chiseled out, and into these pieces of the requisite color are introduced. They are fastened into their places by cement or mastic. The French have also adopted this plan. Though beautiful decorative works may be produced in the Florentine mosaic, it is not so suitable for the imitation of paintings as the Roman. The natural stones are neither sufficiently various nor sufficiently delicate in tint.

The Roman mosaic is executed in colored glass, of which no less than 10,000 different tints are required and produced. The color is added when the glass is in a state of fusion. When thoroughly mixed the liquid is taken out with a large wooden-handled iron ladle, and poured upon a slab of smooth, flat marble. As it cools it is flattened by the application of another piece of marble, until the mass is an inch or more in thickness. Before the glass cools sufficiently to become hard it is cut into pieces of the required size and shape by a sharp iron tool. When quite cold the pieces are placed in a box, each tint having a separate compartment.

Gold and silver are frequently introduced into mosaic. These are prepared as follows: Pieces of yellow glass are moistened with gum-water, and to these gold or silver leaf is applied. The gilded glass is then placed upon an iron shovel at the entrance of the furnace; when it becomes red it is withdrawn. This process renders the gilding so secure that it is as permanent as the glass itself, and resists any atmospheric influence to which it may be exposed.

A frame is next prepared of the size of the picture about to be imitated. On this is laid a cement, composed of a mixture of chalk, brick-dust, gum tragacanth, and white of egg. This forms the ground for the design. The same kind of cement is used to fasten the glass cubes in their places. These are arranged with small iron pincers, and beaten down into their places with a wooden ruler or mallet. The surface is thus rendered flat, and is afterward polished in the same manner as plate-glass.

Mosaic copies of the large pictures that are now being made for St. Peter's, at Rome, have occupied from twelve to twenty years: and few even of the smaller copies can be produced in less than five or six. It is by no means such mechanical work as might at first be supposed. A knowledge of art is required, as well as great taste and judgment.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MISS M. M. M.—Make your black silk by Apron-Polonaise Suit pattern sent you, trimming with passementerie and lace. Put alternate pleated and gathered ruffles on skirt. Trained over-skirts will still be worn.

H. D. W.—Kilt-pleated skirts, and jackets, with white blouse-waists beneath, are worn by boys just before putting on trowsers. Four or five years is the age at which boys here make this change in clothing. Summer cashmeres and piques are used for boys' dresses. Piqué and white Victoria lawn trimmed with embroidery are shown for infants' summer cloaks.

S. H.—Make a low-necked basque of colored silk to wear over your round-waist white alpaca. Put ruffles or bands of the same silk on the skirt. The pattern sent you will suit your sample trimmed with brown bands of silk. Use blue or rose-colored neck-ties.

MRS. M.—Shawls are square; pallium scarfs are long, like a burnous. The French waists would suit you, made without belt, but long enough to pass under the belt of your skirt. They have a dart in front, and the loose back is blouse-shaped. Put drawing strings in the back of the belt, to which the skirt is sewed nearly plain.—Thanks for your recipe.

INEXPERIENCE.—Boys in kilt suits may wear either Turkish or plain drawers, as they must be too short to show below the skirt.

MRS. E. M. B.—Double your square shawl straight through the centre across the stripes, not with them. Then put carelessly around your shoulders like a scarf, with the stripes running down.—Your suggestion is good.

F.—French bodies of striped linen or percale will be much worn this summer.—If your friends still continued the acquaintance with the gentleman to whom they had introduced you, you did right to treat him courteously.

MADONNA CONSTANTINE.—There is an index to each volume of the Bazar, furnished gratis at this office, or sent by mail on receipt of postage.—Patterns of an infant's wardrobe are in Bazar No. 15, Vol. II.

BENNETT.—The groom should wear white kid gloves when the bride is dressed in white.—Make your sister's black silk like the blue reception dress described in the present number. Black, white, or lavender tie for gentlemen.

WINONA.—White organdy is preferable to tarlatan for a wedding dress in June. Nansook, bishop's lawn, or else alpaca, is for wrappers at that season. Get gray pongee for a traveling suit.—It is necessary for a bride to remove her glove to receive the wedding-ring.—The black silk would look well.

C. P. S.—We do not commend depilatories.

E. V. B.—Try chloroform for removing grease from your dress.

CALIFORNIA.—A basque now completes suits for the street. Trim with lace and passementerie. Flowing sleeves are not necessary. See our cut paper patterns for designs. Travel in a summer water-proof suit. Get a thread lace point if you can afford it; if not, get the llama lace.

A FRIEND.—Use nut brown pipings on your checked silk ruffles. Wear a sky blue or Nile green bow with it.

LENA RIVERS.—The wind god of the ancients was called Boreas.—Earth is sometimes spelled without a capital letter, when used as a common noun, as in the sense of dirt.—Your Scotch gingham should have a French waist and slightly gored skirt.

AMBITION.—Use the polonaise and wrapper patterns for making white dresses. Trim with bias bands and pleated ruffles.

MRS. E. L. S.—Why not trim your blue silk with black lace laid over white pleated muslin?

LYNA.—Your water-proof samples are good. The brown will probably wear best.

TIRA.—Make your sacque tight in the back, like a basque, by way of modernizing it. The cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV., will serve as a guide. Bias bands of silk and the fringe now on it, or else lace, are the trimmings.

J. L. C.—Make the silk suit for your little girl with a low-necked waist and basque. Trim with narrow bias ruffles pinked on each edge.

MICHIGAN.—Perhaps the best you can do is to have your dress dyed black. We do not commend dyes. It is far better to send dresses to a French scourer and have them cleaned. They do this to perfection with dresses greatly soiled, provided the color has not been extracted.

MRS. N. R. D.—Point lace braid costs about $1 50 for a dozen yards. The address of a house where it may be obtained has been given in our columns.

MISS A. W. V.—Twelve yards of black silk will make your demi-trained dress with basque and flounces. Lace is the handsomest trimming. To have your Bazars bound to match the first volume that you purchased ready bound will cost about $1 25 a volume.

MRS. H. M. F.—It is not convenient for us to mark the number of yards required on each suit pattern. The Bazar in which the suit is illustrated and described will tell you the quantity, and give accurate directions for making.

B. B. B. B.—We can not take time to hunt up the Reviews you want, and do not give addresses in this column.

F. M. B.—A bombazine suit for a stylish lady will look well made by pattern of Short-Sacque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Trim with bias bands and pleatings of English crape.

MRS. R. H. S.—Satin pipings are not used by our fashionable modistes. Gros grain or the dress material makes the pipings now used.

MEG MOORE.—For graduating dresses read "Girls' White Dresses," in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV. Make your pink organdy with French waist, and for the sleeves, upper skirt, and demi-train use the pattern of Worth Basque House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. For your striped silk use the Postilion-Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. Roll your short front hair up over a Pompadour topsy, and wear a false chatelaine.

MAMMA.—The Postilion-Basque Suit, illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., will be a good model for your black silk. If you read the Bazar regularly you will surely see that short suits are for the street and house both, while demi-trains are only for the house, or for carriage dresses. Use piqué, white muslin, buff linen, and ginghams for your little girl. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 18, Vol. IV., for children's dresses.

MRS. A. D. W.—Imported black silks have edges of various colors, depending alone on the fancy of the manufacturers. It is a mistaken idea that the color of the edge has any thing to do with the quality. The only thing it can possibly prove is that the silk is not dyed.

CAROLYN.—Make your white linen by directions given for piqué suits in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Trim with embroidery and bows of black velvet ribbon. A large white or buff pongee parasol, lined with silk of a becoming color, or else a small umbrella of brown, plum-color, or mazarine blue silk, will suit with nearly all dresses. From $5 to $12 is the range of prices. $15 buys a real hair chatelaine.—We know nothing of the firm you mention, and have not time to hunt it up, and, besides this, we always decline to answer questions about other establishments.

LOTTA S.—A gray or Frou Frou brown poplin of light quality will make a pretty summer traveling dress for a bride. A pearl-colored silk or grenadine suit would be handsome for church.

WOULD-BE STYLISH.—Get enough solid green silk to make an over-skirt and a sleeveless basque over your striped silk. The basque is a postilion like that of the suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., but is cut half low and square in the neck. A round waist, coat sleeves, and short skirt of the striped silk complete the pretty costume. You might put solid green flounces on the striped skirt. Satin is not used for trimming.

JANE R.—Children, misses, and most ladies wear drawers buttoned on the sides, like those illustrated in the Bazar.

ANNA J.—Bonnets are now worn for dress altogether. Hats are for traveling, shopping, etc.

MISS L. R.—The pattern of the Postilion-Basque Suit is ready. To take your bust measure correctly, pass a tape rather tightly around the body under the arms, over the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust. The number of inches of this measure is all we require when sending cut paper patterns.

LOUISE.—We do not make purchases for any one.—Pongee poplin is a substantial and stylish gray goods, much used here for summer wear, very suitable for an elderly lady, and worth $1 25 or $1 50 a yard.

CLARA.—Get black iron grenadine either three-fourths of a yard wide or else that a yard and a half wide. Make your suit by the Postilion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. The paper containing the illustration will tell you the quantity.

L. M. B.—High-necked and long-sleeved dresses—yokes with full skirt gathered in, and no belt—will be prettiest for your little girl.

ME.—Catch up the back of your polonaise skirt by a bow in each seam. We can not suggest any other change. The polonaise is the fashionable garment this year. White bishop's lawn suits will be worn by all ladies, old or young. A black grenadine suit is prettiest and most serviceable of all summer costumes. See New York Fashions of previous numbers for trimming gypsy bonnets.

NEW YORK CITY.—Put tapes in the back seams of your Worth skirt, and tie to other tapes at the belt, to shorten it. The over-skirt will not be too long even though it is within an inch or two of the edge of the dress skirt.—Your sample was not received.

DIAMOND D MOHAIRS.
LADIES,
It is a constant complaint among those who have traveled in Europe that they can not obtain an Alpaca which would wear like those they purchased in the Old Country. Such goods are not brought here, but, instead of them, inferior makes manufactured expressly for the American market, to look cheap under a high duty—fineness and weight produced by cotton and dressing, and lustre by hot pressing. You can not be blamed for selecting such goods. You have had almost nothing else offered you; and on a retailer's counter they are scarcely to be distinguished from the best goods; but they are scarcely out of the dressmaker's hands before the color is lost and the lustre gone. You need complain of this no more. In the Diamond (D) Mohairs you are offered the best Alpaca made in Great Britain. They only cost a few cents more than the trash that has hitherto been foisted on you. Made of the best wool, they do not lose their color or lustre. There is no dressing in them, and they will not crease. Water will not injure them, and they may be sponged off when soiled. Observe the Trade-Mark, and see that you get the right goods. Try this make, and you will find that for once you have a handsome dress that will remain handsome.

Waltham Watches.
We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

EMPLOYMENT.

I want 1000 agents to canvass for the COMPLETE HERBALIST. I will give such terms and furnish such advertising facilities that no man need make less than $300 per month and all expenses—no matter whether he ever canvassed before or not. A premium of a new dress given to lady canvassers. Address Dr. O. PHELPS BROWN, No. 21 Grand St., Jersey City, N.J., and full particulars will be sent by return mail.

APRIL, MAY, and JUNE purify the blood and beautify the complexion by using HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

In the Spring and Summer months the system undergoes a change. This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

H. T. HELMBOLD, Practical and Analytical Chemist, Crystal Palace Pharmacy, 594 Broadway, New York.

P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

THE GREAT EQUIVALENT.

The world may be safely challenged to produce so perfect a simulation of any thing in nature as is of its original, the Seltzer Spring of Germany. The Aperient, based on a correct analysis of the Seltzer Water, is even superior to the manufacture of Nature herself, because it contains all the active medicinal properties of the spring, unalloyed by any of the inert and useless particles found in all mineral fountains. The genuine article being secured, you have the Seltzer Water of Europe, purified and perfected, and probably the best, the most genial cathartic and anti-bilious preparation on the face of the earth.

The Forty-second Volume of Harper's Magazine is concluded with the present Number. Each Number of Harper's Magazine contains from fifty to one hundred per cent. more matter than a single Number of any other monthly periodical in the world, its contents being equal to those of a volume of Macaulay's History of England. Within so extended limits it is possible to include long and important articles, and at the same time secure variety. Each Number contains Serials and short Stories from the best writers in Europe and America, contributed expressly for Harper's Magazine; richly illustrated articles of Travel; carefully prepared papers of a Historical and Scientific character, a large number of which are profusely illustrated; timely articles upon important Current Topics; lighter papers upon an infinite variety of subjects; Poems from our most brilliant and popular writers; and, in addition to all these, five Editorial departments covering every matter of current interest, in Art, Society, History, Science, Literature, and Anecdote.

An Extra Copy of either the Magazine, Weekly, or Bazar will be supplied gratis for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the Magazine 24 cents a year, for the Weekly or Bazar 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the Magazine, or 20 cents for the Weekly or Bazar, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the Magazine commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the Weekly and Bazar commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of Harper & Brothers is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

FACETIÆ.

CAN a ship with two owners be called a partnership?

THERE ARE MANY SUCH ABOUT.—A physician said of a quack that "he was such an ignoramus that if he could take a lantern and go down inside his patient, he couldn't find out what the matter was."

AN ATTACHED COUPLE—Oyster-shells.

SELF-DECAPITATION.—A person lifting his head up.

Of what trade are bees?—They are comb-makers.

THE HEIGHT OF SABBATARIANISM—Finding a bank-note on the pavement on a Sunday, and declining to pick it up.

HOW TO GET THE EXACT WEIGHT OF A FISH—Weigh him in his own scales.

CANNIBALISM EXTRAORDINARY.—It is our melancholy duty to announce that a gentleman well known in literary circles and the neighborhood of Hoxton, a kind husband, an affectionate father, a devoted friend, and an ex-deacon, one at whom the finger of suspicion has never been pointed, and on whose character the breath of calumny has never yet alighted, was the other day found devouring a favorite author!

TOO TRUE.

IT WASN'T THUS HE WAS WONT TO BEHAVE IN THOSE DEAR OLD DAYS, SO LONG AGO! HE DIDN'T THEN LEAVE SOME PEOPLE TO GET OVER STILES ANY WAY, THE BEST THEY COULD, WHILE HE WALKED ON, READING HIS STUPID NEWSPAPER!

MUSICAL JOTTINGS.—Mrs. Pralamop says she does not understand what they mean by "The Dead March in Saul." She is not aware that the dead march any where, or under any circumstances. She shook her head in persistent bewilderment when some one informed her that the "Dead March in Saul" only meant the Dead March out of "Saul."

A FLIMSY SUBSTITUTE—Notes for gold.

A LEADING ARTICLE—A dog-chain.

JOINT PROPRIETORS—Butchers.

THE BEST BREAD SOURCE—Work.

FORTUNE-TELLERS—Bank clerks.

"IMPRESSIONS OF GREECE"—Candle-droppings on the carpet.

What sport is like girls' gossip?—Decr-stalking.

NOT LIKELY TO BE SHOWN.—Talleyrand used to be worried about his autograph, and to one of his persecutors he thus wrote: "Will you oblige me with your company to dinner on Wednesday next, at eight o'clock? I have invited a number of exceedingly clever persons, and do not like to be the only fool of the lot."

STICKING UP FOR AN ABSENT FRIEND.

MISS FRUMPINGTON (who has dropped in for a chat about last night's ball). "And can it be True, Clara, that Captain Jinks actually so far Forgot himself as to Try and Kiss you in the Conservatory after Supper?"
CLARA. "He did indeed, Miss Frumpington. Vulgar little Wretch!"
MISS FRUMPINGTON. "You Surprise me! To Me Captain Jinks has always behaved like such a perfect Gentleman!"

WONDERS OF FASHION.

"Wear my Hat on my Head! Impossible, Grandpa dear! Haven't done such a Thing for Ages! It's Pinned on with my Hair!"

"Them soldiers must be an awful dishonest set," said an old lady, "for not a night seems to pass that some sentry is not relieved of his watch!"

THE BEST.

"Why don't you give us a little Greek and Latin occasionally?" asked a country deacon of a new minister.

"Why, do you understand those languages?" was asked.

"No; but we pay for the best, and we ought to have it."

"CAPITAL" SPORT—Money-hunting.

To what port ought a courtship in a storm to steer for?—Union Bay, I guess.

A newly married man took his bride on a tour to Switzerland for the honeymoon, and when there induced her to attempt with him the ascent of one of the high peaks. The lady, who at home had never ascended higher than a church, was much alarmed, and had to be carried by the guides with her eyes blindfolded, so as not to witness the horrors of the passage. The bridegroom walked by her side, expostulating with her fears. He spoke honey-moon whispers, but the rarefaction of the air was such that every word was audible. "You told me, Leonora, that you always felt happy, no matter where you were, so long as you were in my company. Then why are you not happy?"

"Yes, Charles, I did," replied she, sobbing hysterically, "but I never meant above the snow line."

THE MAY QUEEN.

THE KING OF THE MAY.

"I say, Sam, dey tell me dare is a man down East dat is so industrious dat he works twenty-five hours in a day?"

"How is dat, Cuffy? Dare are only twenty-four hours in a day."

"Why, he gets up an hour before daylight, you stupid nigger!"

A VOLUME OF LOVE—Your bank-book.

If a man loses his breath it is no use to run for it. He can catch it quicker by standing still.

THE BEST SUBSTITUTE FOR SILVER—Gold.

THE LAPS OF TIME—Our old coat-tails.

Is the man who believes in suppers necessarily sup(p)erstitious?

A CONSTANT GLEANER—The tax-gatherer.

The question of the day is whether it is more difficult for a girl of the period to get her clothes in her trunk, or her trunk in her clothes.

A THRASHING-MACHINE—A school-master's cane.

COME TO GRIEF.—When does a cab-horse enjoy a melancholy pleasure?—When he can indulge in "the luxury of Woh."

When is a mother a father?—When she's a sigher.

A bachelor friend suggests that in most marriages considerable "soft soap," with strong lye, is used, and the whole operation ends in shaving!

VOL. IV.—No. 20.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Mantelets for Girls from 7 to 13 Years old, Figs. 1–6.

Figs. 1 and 2.—MANTELET FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD. This mantelet is made of light brown ladies' cloth, trimmed with brown velvet ribbon three-fifths of an inch wide. The neck of the mantelet is finished with a standing collar of the material.

Figs. 3 and 4.—MANTELET FOR GIRL FROM 11 TO 13 YEARS OLD. This mantelet is made of the same material as the dress, that is, of light brown poplin, and is trimmed with a box-pleated ruffle of the material. Cover the seam made by sewing on the ruffle with a bias strip of the material one inch and one-fifth wide; on this strip sew braid as shown by the illustration. To make the mantelet, cut of the material and brown alpaca lining from Figs. 36 and 37, Supplement, each two pieces, and from Fig. 38 one piece. Join the back and side pieces according to the corresponding figures; then join the back with the fronts on the shoulders from 3 to 4. Sew the mantelet together from 4 to * on Figs. 37 and 38, and join with Fig. 37 from : to *, each a band of poplin. These bands are closed under the fronts in adjusting the mantelet. Set on the trimming, finish the neck with a standing collar made of the material and lining. The mantelet is closed with hooks and eyes.

Fig. 2.—MANTELET FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.—BACK.—[See Fig. 1.]

Fig. 5. — MANTELET FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD. This mantelet is made of granite cashmere, and is trimmed with a side-pleated ruffle and ends of the material. Cut from Fig. 39, Supplement, after joining on the piece turned down in Supplement, two pieces, and one piece from Fig. 40. Sew up the seam in the back, join the shoulder seams, and face the mantelet all around, except the neck, with a strip of granite silk an inch and three-fifths wide. Furnish the front with hooks and eyes. Face the part which constitutes the trimming along the outer edge, except the neck, with a strip of the material four-fifths of an inch wide, and trim it with a side-pleated ruffle as shown by the illustration. Arrange the upper edge of the trimming part in pleats, bringing × on ●, baste it along the neck of the mantelet according to the corresponding figures, cord both together, and sew on a side-pleated ruffle, as shown by the illustration. Finally, fasten three ends of cashmere under the trimming part, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 1.—MANTELET FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.—FRONT. [See Fig. 2.]

Fig. 6.—MANTELET FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD. This mantelet is made of light gray barathea, lined with gray silk. The trimming consists of black velvet ribbon four-fifths of an inch wide and a bow of black velvet at each side of the mantelet.

LIVING IN GERMANY.

HOUSES AND RENT.

THERE is an ever-increasing number of American people who are taking refuge from the high cost of living of their own country in the more economical life of Europe. Of all parts of the Continent Germany is destined to become the especial favorite, from the simplicity yet refinement of its social habits, its intellectual activity, the opportunities it offers for education, the cheapness of labor, and consequent low price not only of necessaries but luxuries, the general healthfulness of its climate, and the charms with which the taste of the people for music, the fine arts, gardening, and out-door enjoyment has endowed all its public places and resorts.

Even the metropolitan cities of Germany, as compared with those of the United States, are much cheaper. The cost of living in strangers' style, at strangers' prices, in the most fashionable hotels of Vienna, Berlin, and Hamburg is not much more than one-half of that in the great caravanseras of New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago. In the smaller capitals of Munich, Dresden, and Stuttgart it is less. To fully appreciate, however, the economical advantages of living in Germany, Americans must throw off as soon as possible their character of travelers.

Those who propose to reside for a year or more in Germany, and can dispense with the stir and variety of a large capital, had better betake themselves to some of the smaller towns, as Heidelberg or Darmstadt. Here they will find hotels or boarding-houses, where they will be welcome as boarders by the month or season, at a rate much less than that demanded of passing travelers. It will be more economical, however, and comfortable, especially if there is a young family, to hire apartments, and to sustain an independent household. We would recommend, by all means, if the length of residence should justify it, the renting of unfurnished rooms. The charge for the furnished is disproportionately high, and the furniture is often so frail and rickety as to be constantly liable to breakage and derangement, for which, of course, the tenant has to pay. The articles, moreover, picked up here and there, are rarely homogeneous in form, color, or texture, and are a constant worry to an orderly eye. The casualties are so frequent, and the compensation demanded so exorbitant, that we have often suspected that the arm-chairs and lounges, the lamps and sugar-bowls, were so many man-traps, with their dangers artfully concealed by a little varnish or cement, to catch the unwary. The best plan is, undoubtedly, to buy one's own furniture, and this, in all its varieties, can be bought at a moderate price, and generally disposed of after a few years' careful service at a deduction from the original cost less than what the hire of more ugly and less convenient articles would have amounted to.

Fig. 3.—MANTELET FOR GIRL FROM 11 TO 13 YEARS OLD.—FRONT.—[See Fig. 4.] For pattern see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 36–38.

The common mode of living in the towns of Germany is on flats, or in parts of houses. Each floor is a complete residence within itself, with kitchen, offices, and all attached. The staircase leading to the street door is common to the different occupants, but each floor forms as distinct and private a dwelling as a self-contained house. Any disadvantage such an arrangement may have—but we know of none—in regard to domestic privacy is more than compensated by the important benefit of greatly diminishing the expense of rent to each tenant. It has the further advantage, moreover, of requiring fewer servants. The town houses are generally built of three stories, affording convenient residences for that number of families. The second, termed the bel étage, is ordinarily considered the best floor, but has seldom any greater advantage over the others than its position and the little additional height of its ceilings and walls may be supposed to give it. An addition is made to the rent in consideration of this presumed superiority. The third-floor is, notwithstanding, esteemed by many as decidedly the best, since having only the garret or servants' rooms above, its quiet is less likely to be disturbed by noise on the upper floors or the stairs of the common hall. It, moreover, has the advantage of a more extensive out-look, and this in certain situations, in Heidelberg, for example, where the views are so attractive, is greatly valued.

The great saving in the item of rent will be appreciated by all who have paid their $1500, $2000, $3000, and perhaps more hundreds and thousands of dollars a year, according to their requirements, for houses in New York, when they find that they can hire dwellings of equal convenience, in the most attractive quarters of a German town, for one-fifth of these sums. We know of a gentleman who lets his house in New York for $4000 a year, and now has his family equally accommodated in a suite of handsome apartments in Dresden at an annual expense of $600. We know of another who, while temporarily residing in our costly city, paid $200 a week for his rooms and board in the Fifth Avenue, and at this time is charged only that sum a month at Munich for better apartments and a more luxurious fare. Again, there is a family at Heidelberg which we find installed in handsome apartments in the Anlage, the finest quarter of that picturesquely situated town. Each of the five windows, which front in a row the broad avenue, looks out upon clumps of trees, plantations, flower beds, and shaded walks, which, after winding in and out through a wide level of park, ascend the acclivities of the surrounding hills of vineyard and wood. The grand old Castle of Heidelberg lies in dignified ruin within full view on the left, and you see every where the eaves and roofs of tasteful villas and neat cottages showing above the overlapping of the heights and through the openings between the trees. Here is certainly attractiveness of position, and the interior gives indication of all the essentials of comfort. The apartments consist of one large saloon with three windows, four bedrooms, a wide hall, kitchen, and the necessary offices, embracing the whole third flat, or story. In addition there are two attic bedrooms, a large cellar, and the use of a garden. For all this only $240 a year are paid! The furniture, which seems to include every thing required by a family accustomed to regard most even of the luxuries of life as necessaries, cost in all, including an abundant supply of linen, precisely $1000! Adding twelve per cent. of this sum ($120) for annual wear and tear of the furniture to the $240 paid for rent of the apartments, we have $360 in all as the yearly cost of a well-situated and conveniently furnished dwelling. This inexpensive residence gives fuller satisfaction to the requirements of comfort and luxury, and the exigency of respectability, than could be obtained from any furnished house in New York at $2000 a year; yet Heidelberg has the reputation in Germany of being a dear place.

Digitized by Google

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Rouge.

MY DEAR MEDORA,—When I said to one of your friends the other morning that I had never seen you look more fresh and blooming than you did the evening before at the madrigal concert, she smiled, and said nothing. But when I asked her whether she had remarked the peculiar rosiness of your cheeks, she smiled still more. And when, astonished, I asked again, and more urgently, if she had observed the exquisite color, she laughed outright as she answered, "One dollar a cup." Now an old and unmarried gentleman who has cherished a great many of his early ideals does not readily think ill of any woman, and it was only after several minutes of silence and painful doubt that I could bring myself to ask the question which her words irresistibly suggested—"Do you mean to insinuate that Medora paints her cheeks?" Your friend raised her eyes deprecatingly, shrugged her shoulders a very little, and answered, "Of course she paints."

In the French memoirs, indeed, I had read of rouging, and I knew that actresses paint their cheeks, and I had even seen the eyelashes and the nail-tips of Oriental women which had been touched with kohl and henna; but that lovely young women around me here, walking upon the Avenue, and driving in the Park, actually rub rouge upon their cheeks, gave me a thrill of surprise and sorrow. When I left your friend it was with curiosity morbidly excited. As I passed a group of prettily dressed young women, I looked at them eagerly, but my eyes were not so delicately trained that I could determine whether their color was false. But I did remark that their ears were bored, and hung with metal and jewels, like savages, so that I could not but feel that the same savage instinct might lead them to paint themselves, like the Indians, and I was sorry that I could not see their arms, to discover if they were tattooed. I observed, however, that the rings were hung in the flesh of the ears only, and not in that of the nose, where they would be still more conspicuous.

Indeed, your friend's remark had so poisoned my mind that all the pretty women who passed suggested the most painful doubts. If their color is false, what is true about them? If I can not believe in their cheeks, may I credit their hair? I asked myself, regretfully; or are they mere masquerading figures, of whose real grace and charm and beauty there are no means of knowing? As I walked on with my mind full of rouge, as it were, I met a young gentleman who had just been at the exhibition of the Academy, and he began to speak of some of the pictures, and among them Boughton's "Last Rose of Summer," so ardently that at last I involuntarily asked him, "Was it a dollar a jar?" He looked at me in surprise, as if I had lost my wits suddenly, and, remembering myself, I said to him, "I beg your pardon, but really you put so much rouge into your conversation that I incautiously asked you the price. Don't be offended; but since I have learned that a young friend of mine paints her cheeks, I seem to discover rouge every where."

The young gentleman smiled, and left me. He thought I was a little crazy. But I know that he rouges his conversation. And it is not to me only that he does so. He will repair this evening to the house of a certain maiden, who, I sincerely hope, does not paint her cheeks. He will sit by her side in the twilight in the remotest corner. You, perhaps, Medora, can imagine what he will say. But can you tell whether his words will not be rouged? Can you be sure that after long years, when he is no longer a wooer, and when the scene has changed to his own house, his own family, and his own daily, busy life—can you be sure, I say, that the young woman—no longer young—will not turn upon him and say, "When we sat together in the summer evenings long ago, when we were lovers, and not yet married, you talked the swift hours delightfully away, and my heart listened with all its faith. It believed your words, Sir—pah! they were painted an inch thick! All that rose-bloom of passionate eloquence was rouge only! Your conversation was false as a ballet-dancer's complexion." My dear Medora, I fear that the dame would be in the right, and that the man who rouges his talk is no more honest than the woman who colors her cheeks.

If what your friend told me be true, and you do make that fair face of yours—yes, and its very fairness itself—a lie, I do not wonder that I see Byron and Swinburne lying upon your table. Their inkstand is a rouge pot. They redden their lines into falsehood. They tint with a lie. It is not a genuine and noble emotion that glows upon their page; it is a painted passion. But why blame them, for how hard it is to escape! If you paint your cheeks, my dear Medora, it is because you wish to produce a certain effect upon the public. Your public, indeed, is a private circle. It is a drawing-room. It is Mrs. Grundy's set. But you rouge for them. And what is the author's public? It is a larger circle than that you appeal to. But his desire is, like yours, to affect them. He, too, would produce a certain impression, and he too has recourse to the rouge pot.

I go to the theatre, and I am told that I shall see the mirror held up to nature. But that must be done in obedience to the rules of art. It is Shakespeare's "King Henry the Eighth," perhaps, that I am to see, and while the orchestra plays and the curtain is not yet raised I please myself with a picture of what the scene should be. "Of course," says my neighbor, "Miss Jones, who acts Queen Katharine, will rouge her cheeks. She must do that, or there would be no effect at this distance. Undoubtedly she must paint her cheeks." The music stops and the curtain rises, and presently Queen Katharine enters. Her cheeks are rouged. Rouged? They are plastered with paint. Her face is a rigid mask. The color positively seems to drip upon her dress. But as she advances in her part I observe that it is not upon her dress only that it drips. The entire text of the part, and all her action, and all her tones, are equally rouged. They are hideously smeared with paint. It is no more the poetry of Shakespeare, or the movement and the music of human life, than the stage upon which she stands is the solid earth. And then I perceive that as you, Medora, rouge your cheeks for effect, so for effect the whole delivery of the drama is rouged, and that the false color on the actress's cheeks is only the emblem of the false color spread over the play.

My dear Medora, I begin to think your rouged cheeks very venial, for I take up my newspaper, and again I behold a mere smear of rouge. I attempt to read the news; but it has all been colored according to the fancy of the purveyor. Here is a significant fact delicately shaded out of sight. There is an unimportant detail made absolutely scarlet or crimson. If I turn to the editor's comment, it is all rouge again. This remote and improbable influence is vehemently overstated. That obvious and menacing conclusion is lost in contemptuous silence. You color your cheeks to produce the most favorable effect possible. My diligent friends in the newspapers color their facts and remarks for the same purpose. In your case and in theirs, it is not the truth that we see, but only what somebody is resolved that the truth shall seem to be.

Your friend said that your color cost one dollar a cup. But I wonder, dear Medora, if your Conrad—attorney and counselor at law—if he ever observes with apprehension your resplendent complexion and asks a few questions about it, will also reflect that if you use color by the delicate cup, he uses it by the barrel and the hogshead? I heard him in one of his recent arguments in court. Now, my dear Medora, if I may venture to fancy you at your mirror, equipping yourself for conquest, I can see you with deft and delaying hand touching your primed finger-tip to your cheek as a bird swiftly dips and lightly skims in the shining pool; and the effect is so subtile and so rare that the most incredulous judgment hangs poised between perfect nature and transcendent art. But Conrad, whom I saw producing his effect, was like the whitewasher with his pails and brushes. He dipped the brush and laid it, saturated and reeking with the wash, upon the surface he was treating. It was all coarsely apparent. There was no illusion. And when I remonstrated, he said: "Why, that is my business! That is what I am paid for, to make my side seem white and the other side black. It is not the fact that I care about, but to make the appearance conform to my assertion and intention." If ever, therefore, Conrad complains that he could almost believe your cheeks are rouged, tell him that your object is not to show your cheeks as they are, but as you wish them to be, in order that you may be thought young and beautiful. And if he asks with horror who taught you so immoral a lesson, reply to him: "Conrad, thou art the man!"

But, my dear Medora, my mind was so full of the poison instilled by your friend's remark that I could not avoid it even at Saint Rainbow's. I observed as I entered that the spires were wood carved, and painted to resemble cut stone: "Pah! rouge! rouge!" I exclaimed, with such ardor that Mrs. Carbuncle looked at me as if I had publicly denounced her, and Mr. Carbuncle bristled up to me in the most belligerent manner to know if I intended to insult his wife. "Good Heaven! Carbuncle," said I, "I don't know her." But as I reflected upon the sham towers, and saw you, Medora, beyond Mrs. Carbuncle, I could not help adding, "But it does smell dreadfully of paint, doesn't it, Carbuncle?" He merely glowered, and went into church. I listened to the sermon very attentively; but the simple truths which I had hoped to hear were so preposterously rouged with the preacher's rhetoric, and with his scarlet and crimson theories, that I turned away, and my eyes fell upon neighbor Grab. His face had the most humane and benevolent aspect conceivable. 'Tis only rouge, I said to myself; the hard-hearted old fellow paints his face with a soft expression. Joel Snoar, in the corner pew, had propped his head with the face toward the pulpit, as if listening intently. But Joel was fast asleep. Rouge, again, I said. And just as the preacher ended, as I was afterward told, a prodigious description of the torments to which we were all hastening, I exclaimed so energetically, as I saw Mrs. Grundy herself aping devotion, "Rouge! rouge!" that all the sleepers suddenly awakened and glared at me as a moral monster, and the preacher, after sermon, prayed especially for Sabbath-breakers and profaners of the temple.

Thus you see, dear Medora, that the result of my hearing your friend's remark is the discovery that the verb "to rouge" is conjugated in all the numbers and persons: "I rouge; thou rougest; he rouges. We rouge; ye or you rouge; they rouge." If we could only put it in the past tense!

Yours, AN OLD BACHELOR.

THE "CIRCUS" WORLD.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

IN the country, where every sound must give an account of itself, the early stillness of summer mornings is sometimes broken by a protracted clatter. The noise assaults your ears long before it makes any impression on your soul, "buried in sleep." Then you become slowly aware that it is not a steady, level ado, but a rattling that swells and sinks and swells again in a series of disturbing culminations; and presently you comprehend that a procession of some sort is going by, and you are wide awake in an instant. Processions are not so common in the country that they can be suffered to hide their light under a bushel. The household is suddenly set astir—every window-blind opened far enough for curious eyes to peer out, and for the bright, fresh, dewy morning to peer in. The barefoot milk-boy is slowly sauntering by, his newly scoured tin pail resplendent in the sunshine, and his wide eyes fixed on the clatter, just rounding the knoll beneath the elms: one, two, three, four pairs of horses, as different from the sober steeds in yonder pasture as silk from stuff—gay, high-stepping horses, that look as if the map of the world had been wrapped around them for skin, the continents tinted roan, the seas in white; and behind them long two-story wagons, like boxes on wheels, gayly painted, fast closed. But we know it is the circus, and that those gorgeously colored boxes inclose a howling wilderness of bears and tigers, and that somewhere along the road, at some auspicious hour, some happy person will see the elephant; but we must content ourselves for the present with the pretty little pony, and the grand chariot which contains such members of the "troupe" as are not driving the horses or stretched out prone, dead asleep, on the tops of the howling boxes. A very sleepy circus it always is at this time of the morning; but it sets the whole village wild with enthusiasm.

Then the handbills come and add fuel to the flame. And the county paper takes up the parable, and flares out with chariots and horsemen—and horsewomen too—in every attitude of danger and daring, and the odds are you go. If you have children, you say it is to please the children. If you have none, you say it is to see the crowd. But it isn't. It is to see the circus. You feel a little shamefaced to march up and buy a ticket of the man who has made an office of the rear of his wagon, but you do it. Hosts of minor tents have colonized in the vicinity of the mammoth tent, and on their canvas sides picture to you in vivid colors and flaunting capitals the attractions of the Two Interesting Idiots from Australia, Remarkable Double-Headed Girl—Is She One, or Is She Two? The Calculating Pig, or The Giantess of the Hebrides. But you shun side issues and plunge at once into the lions' den and take heart. For no loud advertisement nor monstrosity of drawing can conceal the fierce magnificence of a lion, the treacherous softness of a panther, the graceful beauty of the leopard. They circle their impatient round—the free, wild, fettered things—and bring into this mean arena the grandeur of Numidian wildernesses. Before them the keepers walk back and forth in dingy scarlet coats, reciting to their ever-shifting audiences choice bits of natural history with an impassive face and a monotonous voice that make the growling and roaring of the other beasts seem oratorical and intelligent. Here is the huge white polar bear, draggling his long hair on the floor, and panting with heat, in spite of the four hundred pounds of ice wherewith he is daily blockaded, and the hogsheads of water that keep him constantly wet. Alas! the ice-chest and the shower-bath are but a sorry tepid substitute for the arctic floe that his hot blood leaps and longs for. Here is the prowling hyena—that ghoul among beasts, that horror of ingenuous youth, till the same tender hand which turned Henry VIII. into a fond husband, and Judas Iscariot into a too zealous loyalist, touched the hyena too, and whitewashed him into a roving sanitary commission prosecuting its good work by moonlight. Here in the middle of the tent lie the camels, mild and ugly; and immediately the white sands of the desert stretch around us, and the damsel Rebekah, lithe and blithe and very fair to look upon, stands once more by the well of Nahor at the evening-tide, and down from Gilead comes a cavalcade of Midian merchants, bearing spicery and balm and myrrh. "Slow coaching," young America would say; but when Ahasuerus sent out all swiftly a decree to revoke the bloody edict of Haman, "hastened and pressed" by the love and the terror of his young Jewish queen—Esther the beautiful, and brave as beautiful, and wise as brave—the camels and young dromedaries held their heads high among his post-horses. Was it three thousand of such sturdy cattle as these that Job's stables held? Round such tawny, homely necks did Zebah and Zalmunna hang their golden ornaments? and is it from this coarse, ungainly hair the wonderful shawls are woven and broidered, not for an age, but for all time? And if, as my lord keeper affirms, it takes one hundred and fifty pounds of meat every day to feed a baker's dozen of lions and tigers, on what enemy's country could Job have foraged to keep his stalls from famine, even if his mews were as piously inclined as our nineteenth century beasts, who have unanimously agreed to keep the Sabbath-day by an unbroken fast? No feeding in this circus on Sunday! Let the compilers of our Sabbath manuals take notice. Whether it is for the health of their bodies or the subjugation of their souls doth not appear; but it would seem as if Sunday must be a rather long day to them, with not even the solace of a curious stick to stir up their sides and their solitude.

And here is that mountain of animated nature, the elephant. Is he an elephant? Is he not a mass of baked mud that lived once among the megatheriums and ichthyosauruses, when life was big and slow and pokey, and has come down to us by mistake, as one born out of due time? Certainly he seems here very much out of time and place. He is so utterly unbeautiful! and he appears to know it, poor fellow, and looks meek and deprecating out of those small, sidewise, modest eyes of his. What straight, ungraceful legs! what a short, useless neck! what an unwieldy head! And why will they make him dance, when dignity is his only rôle? And what does an elephant think of being made to climb up and stand on a tub just large enough to give room to his four feet—if an elephant can be said to have feet, where the appearance is that his legs have simply come to an end?

Before you have had time enough to see the baby elephant, who is but half as homely as the other, because only half as big; or the baby lion, who is as fierce at heart as his jungle-born papa; or the ostrich, who "can carry a full-sized man on his back, and run nine miles an hour," says the exhibitor in his measured monotone—and I know one man with whom I should like to see him try it and lose his way; or the quills upon the fretful porcupine; or the always funny monkey—you must go in to see the "performance," which does not, perhaps, rank among the high arts, but which is often a good deal higher than is quite comfortable to look at. Indeed, it seems to me more wonderful for men and women to perform such riding feats than for the great God to make an elephant or a rhinoceros. It is harder to defy law than to organize law. Nature established gravitation; but she must establish something. If a stone does not go down when it is dropped, it must go somewhere. But having made a point of putting people down, Nature must feel astonished to see those circus-riders stay up. The broad-saddle riding is not so incomprehensible. Any body could ride standing on a soft saddle as big and flat as a table, and perhaps make shift to jump through a hoop in the air, since the horse, though galloping, gallops slowly withal. But when it comes to riding without any saddle at all, and riding two horses at a time, and standing straight up on them both, and a woman standing straight up on you, and all sweeping around together in a dizzy whirligig—why, you can't do it.

And here they live and grow together for years and years—little lions and leopards and little men and women—in a world of their own; and you know, perhaps, as much about the one as about the other.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

UNDRESSED SILKS.

AMONG the few new fabrics of the season is one especially worthy of mention. This is undressed silk, a fine Lyons gros grain without the dressing that gives stiffness and most of its lustre to gros grain. It has the natural demi-lustre of the silk, is very soft, does not spot or rumple, and will not cockle from dampness. It may be made up as dressily as the silk pongees, and is admirable for sea-side costumes and elegant traveling suits. There are two qualities—the Catelan, and a heavier article called Breda silk. It is imported in all the stylish colors—tan, tea-color, fawn, écru, the frog-colors, and Frou Frou brown. The price is $2 25 a yard.

PONGEES AND FOULARDS.

A less expensive material in the pale summer tints is pongee foulard—a light, silky fabric, with serge twill, and soft enough to drape like cashmere. The twill gives promise of more service than is usually found in frail foulards. It is three-quarters of a yard wide, worth $1 25 a yard, in every shade of gray, buff, and brown. Fine Lyons pongee, almost as dressy as silk, is $2 a yard, and twenty-four inches wide. More attractive still is the real India pongee, in its unbleached natural color, thick and substantial, yet light, cool, and pleasant to the touch. This elegant fabric costs from $2 to $2 50 a yard. The striped pongees, also new, have inch-wide stripes like satin on plain pongee of the same shade. In plum-color, tea, and London smoke these are considered very stylish for costumes. The prices range from $2 to $2 75.

LYONS POPLINS.

Lyons poplins are almost as handsome this season as expensive Irish poplins. The cord is not as even and large as in Pym's best, but the fabric is the same, and the light quality more pleasant for summer wear, while the cost is only $1 or $1 25 a yard. The colors are as perfect as in rich silks, the tea and Frou Frou shades being especially desirable for suits.

SUMMER SILKS.

Three dollars a yard is asked for the best summer silks—white grounds with penciled stripes of black or a color. The qualities sold for $2 are warranted not to spot, and very pretty-looking silks, alike on both sides, are shown for $1 25. The silks of still lower price so largely displayed in the early part of the season are not to be had now.

BLACK GRENADINE.

Small-meshed grenadines are used this year in preference to the large square meshes so long in vogue. Iron grenadine, well twisted, strong, and three-fourths of a yard wide—the most convenient width—is sold for 75 cents a yard. This makes a pretty show, and retains its color almost as well as finer goods. Glossy silk grenadines in armure figures cost from $1 to $2.

Black silks at $1 25 a yard are commended by merchants as good enough for wearing under grenadine. These light silks answer very well for under-skirts beneath grenadine; but experience teaches that they are not substantial enough for waist linings. A thick gros grain for $2 or $2 50 is really better economy. We deprecate also the fashion of making a separate silk under-skirt, as it is difficult to get the silk and grenadine skirts the same length; besides, grenadine is not strong enough to support the heavy, full flounces now worn. It is far better to make a black silk skirt, and use up all one's grenadine in putting flounces on the silk, making them extend far above the edge of the over-skirt or polonaise.

Most elaborate flounces are put on grenadine. An instance of this is an apron-polonaise suit made at one of the best French houses. The black silk skirt had around the bottom a bias ruffle of silk over an eighth of a yard deep. This ruffle was not meant to show, but to hold out the grenadine flounce above it. This grenadine flounce was straight, scantily gathered, two fingers deep, and edged with a two-inch bias ruffle. Lapping over this was a similar flounce cut in large scallops, with a large box-pleat between each scallop. The heading was a grenadine ruche and a standing frill. A lengthwise bow of gros grain was on each pleat. The very long apron-polonaise was cut precisely like that illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., except that two darts were taken in front, and deeper seams were made under the arms and behind, fitting the garment closely to the figure. The trimming was a bias frill two inches wide, headed by a ruche. This surrounded the garment, trimmed the coat sleeves, and was arranged on the apron in the way shown in our engraving. The waist lining of silk extended just to the hips, the skirt of the polonaise being unlined. In this exquisitely made suit the grenadine seams were pressed open, and bound with thin silk ribbon to prevent raveling. French modistes charge from $150 to $200 for such costumes. Bias grenadine flounces are usually hemmed on the outside, not bound. A plain and stylish finish for bias ruffles is a tiny fold of the dress material showing above a half-inch hem turned up on the right side. To do this the seams joining the widths of ruffling must be reversed near the lower edge; then lay the edge of the ruffle in a narrow fold or tuck, and, sewing through three layers, fasten this fold to the ruffle. Turn up on the outside your binding or hem, the piping fold will reveal itself, and the whole must be secured in its place by slip stitches concealed beneath the hem. This is tedious, but so pretty that it repays the time and trouble of making it. Kilt pleats, alternately of gros grain and grenadine, are also used for trimming. Many flounces are also edged with narrow feathery lace, either thread or guipure, and very often only an imitation lace. For dressy black grenadine costumes, to be worn at watering-places, in the carriage, or at home, black lace two or three inches wide is placed over white lace—either coarse Valenciennes or Bruges—or over pleatings of white Swiss muslin edged with narrow patent Valenciennes.

We repeat that the linings of corsages are not cut down low, leaving the neck and arms merely covered by grenadine. Southern readers object to thick high linings of thin dresses, but, with the neck pointed low and the sleeves made open, the dress is not warmer than when clinging grenadine is brought in contact with the skin. At all events, this fashion prevails, even for organdy muslins. A black and white organdy made for a Saratoga outfit, either for the house or street, has an apron-polonaise and single skirt trimmed with fluted ruffles headed by puffs strapped with black velvet. The high, close corsage is lined throughout with white linen. Black velvet bows looped the skirt and ornamented the half-flowing sleeves. The skirt lay on the ground a quarter of a yard. Modistes charge $30 for these cool, fresh-looking suits. They are very frail, however, and will scarcely bear washing, but may be worn a long time without. Suits of gray English barége similarly made have three straight flounces edged with very narrow pleatings of lilac barége and patent Valenciennes. Another favorite trimming for suits is a single flounce three-eighths of a yard wide, the upper eighth held in flat side pleats, the lower part hemmed and flowing free from the skirt.

TROUSSEAU FOR MAY.

A trousseau, just finished for a bride going abroad, has many beautiful garments. The bridal dress is white silk with orange flowers. The bride-maids' dresses were one pink, the other blue silk. A white tulle flounce three-fourths of a yard deep, piped with the dress silk, surrounded the train. The long tulle over-skirt had a deep hem piped with silk, and was caught up by sprays of the sweet pea. The corsage, pointed back and front, and laced behind, had deep Pompadour squares filled with tulle puffs. The long graceful train was rounded and made to lie smoothly on the floor without a single fold. The straight back widths, exceedingly long, were pleated into the side seams near the top to make them very bouffant. The white muslin trained skirt worn beneath had ample deep flounces, starched very stiff to support the dress train.

A lovely dinner dress for the bride was French gray silk trimmed with pale rose pink silk. The demi-train had a graduated flounce outlining a court train. This flounce was gathered in front and box-pleated on the train. It was headed and finished with bias bands piped with rose-color. A tablier trimming was six crescent-shaped bands, finished with bows, arranged to show a rose-colored lining. The basque had a deep-pointed back with pleated drapery, also showing the contrasting silk. A duchesse collar of rose silk edged with black lace. A reception dress of ciel blue silk had two white crape flounces, very deep, and pinked. The upper part of the skirt formed a bouffant puff. Half-high basque, and sleeves ruffled to the elbow. One of the prettiest walking suits was black and white striped silk, made with polonaise and flounced skirt.

The traveling dress to be worn on the steamer was of green English water-proof. The skirt had a broad flounce trimmed above and below with points of green silk. The plain, long over-skirt was edged with silk points. The postilion-basque had coat sleeves, and was trimmed to simulate a vest. Worn over this was a loose paletot with flowing sleeves, the garment lined throughout with green silk. A circular of the same water-proof, with a pretty hood, was also provided for wearing on deck. A second traveling dress, to be worn on the Continent, was ashes-of-roses poplin trimmed with dark brown silk. The skirt was flounced; the polonaise was simply hemmed, and had a wide silk facing down the front fastened by bows. Added to this stylish over dress was a jaunty jacket of the poplin, lined with silk, and finished up the back and sleeves by bows. A morning wrapper for use on the steamer was of light French flannel, made loose, so as to be easily gotten into when seasick, and accompanied by a cape and hood for going on deck.

SUMMER BONNETS.

The latest importation is of bonnets direct from Paris, made by Virot and other familiar names. They are chips of rare fineness and Leghorns, much larger than any gypsy bonnet yet worn, with indented head pieces broad enough for brims of round hats. They look very odd when hanging in a milliner's room, but are very stylish when properly worn. One of these, marked $50, is of chip, with Nile green gros grain ribbon two inches wide knotted around the crown. Two paler green ostrich tips on the head piece fall on the crown, while below this are streamers of black lace. The face trimming is a black lace ruche with leaves purpled by the frost. Ribbon strings to tie under the chin. Another is trimmed with white ribbon and feathers, and has pale green sprays in the face trimming. A third has a China crape scarf of pale lavender, with black and white ostrich tips. A torsade of the crape makes the face trimming. Black dotted net strings, edged with white lace under black.

Elegant Leghorns for more elderly ladies are trimmed with black gros grain piped with palest écru, and ostrich tips of the two colors.

A novelty from Virot's is of black grenadine, with square meshes laid plainly on the frame and piped with black gros grain. Moss-rose-buds form the face trimming, and a deep mantilla veil completes the bonnet.

The loveliest round hat from the same house is a round crown and narrow rolled brim covered with two shades of China crape in the violet tints: price $50.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN; VIRFOLET; GEDNEY; and PAGE.

PERSONAL.

THE amount of physical labor and travel performed by the bishops of the Episcopal and Methodist churches is almost incredible. The statistics of the Episcopal Church show that the average life of a bishop is but fifteen years. They are literally worked to death. Bishop WHIPPLE, of Minnesota, has almost broken down in his work. Bishop LITTLEJOHN, of Long Island, does the work of half a dozen clergymen. He has his robes on on Sunday six and even seven times. Of the fifty-two Episcopalian bishops, thirty-three have been consecrated during the last twelve years.

—JOHN RUSKIN, who seems to lose his head when he forsakes art for politics, recently declared that it would be better that the people of Europe should perish than that they should become tainted with American ideas. With what disgust and alarm, then, must this enthusiastic admirer of medieval notions observe the progress of American literature among those very people! Here is Dr. JOHN W. DRAPER'S "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," in Russian, printed, in two handsome volumes, at St. Petersburg—an honor accorded to only one other American book, "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Translations of Dr. DRAPER'S work have also appeared in French, German, and Italian, and a handsome edition, in two volumes, has been published by BELL & DALDY in London. Translations of his "History of the Civil War in America" into French, Russian, and German are also in course of preparation. Mr. RUSKIN will find his outcry against the influx of American ideas quite as vain and ridiculous as Mrs. Partington's battle with the Atlantic Ocean.

—Lady BULWER, whose name is seldom seen nowadays in the public prints, is said to have written a religious novel illustrating the conversion of a fashionable woman of the world through a long series of afflictions. It is entirely unlike "Blanca Capello," "Chevely," and other of her ladyship's earlier works.

—A letter from Paris, just received from Mr. W. PEMBROKE FETRIDGE, the author of "Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East," gives a graphic picture of the fearful condition of that unhappy city. He says:

"PARIS, April 9, 1871.

"I write this in the midst of one of the most dreadful bombardments probably ever known. Solid shot, shell, and boîte à mitraille (grape-shot) are falling, five a minute, on every side of us. Every house on our avenue has been struck one or more times. Our chimney has been knocked off, and yesterday FANNIE and myself were standing on our balcony, which nearly faces Mont Valérien, watching the shots, because we have plenty of time to get behind two walls after we see the fire before the shot arrives (thirty-seven seconds), but the battery demi-lune situated at Rond-point, Courbevoie, dropped a boîte à mitraille out of its line a little, and exploded one hundred feet from where we were standing. One of the balls (there are forty in each boîte), about one and a half inches in diameter, struck our balcony, breaking clean off one foot of iron one inch thick, and landing a piece close to my foot big enough to kill an elephant. We have been 'baptized with fire,' and not a soldier has wept a tear. There were no soldiers present to weep—perhaps that was the reason! Four houses from us is the Ottoman embassy; a shell has just dropped in the court-yard, breaking every window in the house, and killing a man and woman. Yesterday, opposite the same house, a shell dropped in the midst of a battalion of the National Guard, killing six or seven and wounding quantities. They were marching toward Porte Maillot (the gate the forts are bombarding) with flying colors, yelling and shouting; suddenly they fell on their faces, a few running over the others. The commander had a hard time in trying to form their ranks. He finally did, getting them out of range, made them a speech, and then they continued, Indian file, about twenty feet apart, under the cover of the houses. Friday, the 7th, was the first day that any shells came as far up as the Arc de Triomphe. For several days the Avenue Grande Armée and Place de l'Etoile had been filled with thousands watching the struggle at the Pont de Neuilly. The National Guards were finally driven off, and the Line got possession of the bridge at about 5 o'clock P.M. There were probably 20,000 persons present. A Mr. DURAND, wife, and daughter, had been to our house watching Valérien fire, and FANNIE, FLOSSIE, and myself returned to their carriage, which was standing in front of the arch at the head of the Avenue Grande Armée, when the Line got their guns in position. I said, 'Ladies, I think we had all better be home. The troops may fire too high.' The words had hardly escaped me when whiz-z-z-z-z came a shell ten feet above our heads, striking the Arc de Triomphe two hundred feet behind us, and bursting with fearful noise. To attempt a description of the scene would be impossible. One-half threw themselves on their faces at once; another quarter after the shell had burst, and it was all over for the moment; another quarter ran over those that were down, while the carriage started over every thing. We got out of the carriage, and made our way home, the shells bursting on every side of us.

"I must stop. Another shell has driven in the whole roof directly in front of us. I am afraid we shall be starved for want of provisions. Our cook don't dare to go out. I think it is much safer here than if we went down town. There will probably be fearful fighting in the streets. Versailles is bound to come in. We have no fear, although the risk is great, and people are being killed on every side of us."

—Among the good debaters in the United States Senate on the Ku-Klux bill, EDMUNDS, of Vermont, and THURMAN, of Ohio, are said to have borne off the honors. The latter improves on acquaintance. He is the Democratic leader of the Senate, and in some respects one of the ablest men now in public life. A night debate, with THURMAN holding the leading position on his side, is a treat indeed. He has great candor of statement, a hearty, wholesome manner, considerable personal magnetism, a thorough acquaintance with law and history, and a vigorous common-sense and massiveness of understanding, that reminds one of JOHN BRIGHT.

—That great and good traveler, PAUL DU CHAILLU, having squeezed all the good out of Africa, now proposes to post off on a summer tour through Sweden and Norway, and give to the American boy and girl all the little peculiarities of the Scandinavians. Mr. DU CHAILLU is one of the alertest of human beings, sharp of eye, glib of tongue, ready of pen, and can not fail to make an entertaining book.

—Mr. CORCORAN, of Washington, who is placing himself with PEABODY, GIRARD, COOPER, STEWART, LENOX, and others, on the roll of public benefactors, after having given a fortune for the establishment of an Art Museum in Washington, has now founded in that city a "Home for Gentlewomen" who have become impoverished by some misfortune. The edifice for this new charity has cost nearly $200,000, and the endowment is sufficient to the support of sixty ladies.

—We are to have next season an opera the odd characteristic of which will be an orchestra composed entirely of ladies, the conductor being also a lady. The prima-donna will be Madame FABBRI; baritone, MÜLLER; basso, DALLIESTER; and a twelve-year-old prima-donna, Miss ELZER, who is said to be a prodigy. We may also expect NIEMANN, the tenor. His wife, HEDWIG RAABE, is under engagement to Mr. GRAU.

—A gentleman who saw the ex-Emperor and EUGÉNIE at Chiselhurst says that the latter has become quite fat and fussy, and her complexion dark and sallow, without a bloom. The Emperor has a well-fed look, is low in stature, thick-set, and looks as though he never had a care in his life. His hair and mustache are now quite white, but no whiter than a year ago.

—Mr. E. W. STOUGHTON, one of the ablest lawyers of this city, has given Dartmouth College ten thousand dollars to found a museum of pathological anatomy.

—An Italian interviewer who was recently prospecting in Berlin was received by the Empress, and shown through the private apartments of his Majesty. "They were as simple," he says, "and unpretending as has been generally reported. But I saw there one thing which surprised me a little, and which seemed to be at variance with the belief commonly entertained of the character of WILLIAM I. Like every body, I thought that his Majesty was a bluff old soldier, who did not care much for books and literature. I found that this was a mistake. King WILLIAM has a very fine private library, and the books, which is better yet, have been read; and not a few of them contain marginal notes written by his Majesty."

—BRIGHAM YOUNG has been a-shopping at Chicago for the Mrs. YOUNGS. It took about $25,000 to procure the desiderated accoutrements, and a whole car to transport them to the City of the Saints and saintesses.

—MINNIE HAUCK will not soon return to the U. S., having accepted an engagement for two years from the management of the Hofoperntheater, in Vienna.

—Mr. CHARLES NORDHOFF, of the New York Evening Post, resides five hundred feet above water on the banks of the Hudson, at Closter, New Jersey. Mr. N. says it is called Closter on account of being closter to New York than Piermont. Mr. N. has a palace near the fearful precipices belonging to his farm, and is fringing the exterior palace walls with a great variety of tulips. It is an agreeable peculiarity of the editors of the E. P. that they admire and cultivate the tulip.

—Miss GEROLT, daughter of the Prussian minister, was married to Mr. RANGABE, the Greek minister, on the 19th ult., in the little Greek chapel at the residence of the Rev. Father NICHOLAS BJERRING in this city, which was brilliantly lighted with wax tapers in honor of the ceremony, the large candelabra, with seven lights, being also used. The ceremony commenced by the pastor meeting the company outside of the sanctuary, and then handing both to the bride and bridegroom a lighted candle, which was imbedded in a bouquet of flowers. This done, the pastor approached the altar, where for several minutes he read prayers, then returned to the candidates, receiving from the bridegroom the rings, with which he again went to the altar, and read prayers. Leaving the sanctuary, he now approached the candidates again, and after questioning each as to whether any impediments to the marriage existed, he handed a ring to each. During this latter ceremony two golden crowns, studded with precious stones, were held above the heads of the bride and bridegroom, Mr. CATACAZY holding the one over the bride, and Mr. BALTAZZI performing a similar office for the bridegroom. After this the priest proceeded to deliver a brief exhortation to the young couple, taking his text from First Corinthians, first chapter, tenth verse. He said he took to himself the privilege of saying a few words, as the bridegroom was a member of the religion which he professed—that of the orthodox Greek Church. But his great object was to impress upon the bride the fact that the Greek Church did not desire converts to its fold, unless conscience, and conscience only, was the motive for a change of religion. He wished a happy life to both the bride and bridegroom. The crowns were again held over the heads of the bride and bridegroom, and the priest then offered a golden cup containing wine to each of the candidates, after which prayers were read, the entire ceremony concluding with the benediction, the priest first kissing the golden cross, and then presenting it to the bride and bridegroom to go through the same ceremony.

Bag for Tatting, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS egg-shaped work-bag is made of card-board, covered with brown silk, and ornamented with fine gold cord as shown by the illustration. Inside of the lower half of the case is a brown silk bag, and inside of the upper half a band of elastic braid, designed to hold the shuttle and hook used in tatting. Cut of card-board from Fig. 31, Supplement, two pieces. Paste shirting on both sides of each of these pieces, sew the edges of the material together along each opening, passing the needle alternately through first one and then the other edge of the material, always from the under side to the upper, drawing the thread tight, so that the edges thus joined shall come together. When both halves of the egg-shaped case are thus far completed, cover the outer side of each half with a layer of cotton batting, which in turn is covered, first, with net, and then with brown silk cut on the bias. The silk covering must be large enough to allow the edge of the silk to be folded down on the inside two-fifths of an inch wide and fastened there. Fasten a small bronze glove-button to the ends of each half of the case, and sew pieces of fine gold cord lengthwise on each half of the basket, as shown by Fig. 2; to do this fasten the end of the cord to one button, pass it to the other button, lay it around this, then around the first button, then again around the other button, and so on until the part is trimmed as shown by the illustration. The cords must be three-tenths of an inch apart at the middle; they are tacked on at regular intervals with fine gold-colored sewing silk. Furnish the lower half of the case with a smooth brown silk lining, and the upper half with brown silk quilted over wadding in small diamonds. To the outer edge of the inner side of the upper half sew a border of interlooped gold cord and the cross band of brown silk elastic braid, as shown by Fig. 1, and sew through the latter once more at the middle. Trim the outer side of the upper half with a ruche of brown silk ribbon three-fifths of an inch wide; the seam made by sewing on the ruche is covered with gold cord. Sew a brown silk bag, two inches and two-fifths high and furnished with a shirr, in the lower half of the case along the upper edge. Finally, sew the two halves together on one lengthwise edge with a few stitches, and at the middle of the front fasten a button and button-loop for closing.

Point Russe Medallions for Card-Cases, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE medallions may be worked on various kinds of material, such as silk, velvet, gros grain, etc. Work with either one or several colors of saddler's silk in point Russe, back stitch, satin, half-polka, and knotted stitch. When worked with black silk on Swiss muslin or cambric these medallions are also suitable for cravat ends.

Crochet and Tatted Collars, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—CROCHET COLLAR. To make this collar, work, first, with tatting cotton No. 80, two rows of gimp like the gimp edging on Fig. 5, Harper's Bazar, No. 32, Vol. III., page 500. One row of gimp must be as long as the width of the collar desired, and the other three times as long. Then crochet with tatting cotton No. 120 on the scallops of one lengthwise edge of the longer row of gimp, 1 sc. (single crochet) on the next first scallop, * 5 ch. (chain stitch), 1 tc. (treble crochet) on the following scallop, 1 leaflet of 3 qc. (quadruple crochet) on the second following scallop; these 3 qc. are not worked off separately, but together; now follow 5 ch., 1 tc. on each of the following nine scallops; these 9 tc. are not worked off separately, but all together. Then crochet 5 ch., fasten to the first of the 5 ch. previously worked, work a leaflet as before on the following scallop of the gimp, then a tc. on the second following scallop, then four times alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following scallop. Repeat from * until the work is as long as the width of the collar is desired. The end of this, as well as of the remaining rounds, is worked like the beginning; both form the front corners of the collar. Then crochet 1 sc. on the last scallop at the end of the gimp (this is the same scallop on which the last sc. of the first round was worked); now take the shorter gimp in hand, and crochet on the first scallop at one side of the gimp 1 sc., then 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following scallop of the same gimp, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following scallop of the same gimp, * 8 ch., now fasten to the first round previously crocheted, working 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the vein between the first two leaflets; then work, going backward, 6 sl. on the first 6 of the 8 ch. previously worked. Now follow 2 ch., 1 sc. on the first next scallop of the shorter gimp, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following scallop, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following scallop, 2 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the second following scallop of the first round consisting of 5 ch. with 1 sl., 2 ch., 1 sc. on the following scallop of the shorter gimp, 2 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the following ch. scallop of the first round, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the following scallop of the shorter gimp, 2 ch., fasten to the middle st. of the following ch. scallop of the first round, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the following scallop of the shorter gimp, 5 ch., 1 sc. on the following scallop of the gimp, and repeat from *. Finally, work 5 sc. on each still free scallop at the upper lengthwise edge of the shorter gimp, then, going further, on the next crosswise edge and the under rounded edge of the collar, alternately 1 picot of 5 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet) on the second, and 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the first of the 5 ch., 1 sc. on the next first scallop of the gimp; at the under edge of the scallop, in the hollow between every two bands, take up one loop each of nine scallops of the gimp, these nine loops must be worked off together, throwing the thread over once. The second crosswise edge of the collar is worked like the first.

Fig. 2.—TATTED AND CROCHET COLLAR. To make this collar, work, first, the tatting with tatting cotton No. 80. For each ring of the strip of tatting at the upper edge of the collar work 5 ds. (double stitch) each, and three times alternately one very small p. (picot), 5 ds. Between every two of these rings leave an interval of thread three-tenths of an inch long, besides this, join the rings as shown by the illustration. Work the tatting scallops at the under edge of the collar as follows: First work the requisite number of single five-leaved figures. Each figure consists of five leaflets; each of the first two and the last two leaflets consist of 6 ds. and three times alternately 1 p., 6 ds. The third (middle) leaflet consists of 4 ds. and five times alternately 1 p., 4 ds. The leaflets must be divided each by an interval of thread three-tenths of an inch long, and connected by means of a picot, as shown by the illustration. After the fifth leaflet is completed, tie the beginning and end of the working thread together, and cut off both; the interval of thread between the first and last leaflet must also be three-tenths of an inch long. The scallops which surround the five-leaved figures must be worked with two threads (shuttles). To do this tie both threads together, fasten to the p. at the point of the first leaflet of a five-leaved figure, and work always over the foundation thread a scallop of 3 ds., and three times alternately 1 p., 3 ds., * fasten to the p. at the point of the following leaflet, one scallop as before, fasten to the first free p. of the following leaflet, one scallop of 3 ds. and five times alternately 1 p., 3 ds.; fasten to the second following p. of the same leaflet (thus the p. at the point of this leaflet is passed over), one scallop of 3 ds. and three times alternately 1 p., 3 ds., fasten to the p. at the point of the following leaflet, one scallop of 3 ds. and three times alternately 1 p., 3 ds., fasten to the p. at the point of the last leaflet. Now turn the work, and work a scallop of 2 ds. and twice alternately 1 p., 2 ds. Then turn the work again, fasten the foundation thread to the p. at the point of the first leaflet of a new five-leaved figure, and over the foundation thread work one scallop of 3 ds. and three times alternately 1 p., 3 ds.; instead of forming the second p., fasten to to the last scallop of the preceding point, as shown by the illustration. Repeat from *. At the end of this, as at the end of the following crocheted rounds, work as at the beginning, so that the two ends of the collar correspond. Now crochet on the p. at the upper straight edge of the row of points as follows: 1st round.—1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the p. at the point of the first leaflet at the right crosswise side of the collar, 4 ch., 1 sc. on the first free p. of the same leaflet, 4 ch., 1 stc. on the connecting thread between the before referred to and the

On this round work the 2d round.—One row of dots as follows: 1 dc. on the stc. at the beginning of the preceding round, 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following stitch of the preceding round, 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following stitch. Now form a dot: work the latter on the two bars of the 2 dc. last worked, not, as usual, on the upper vein of these dc. Thus the collar is held crosswise. Work on the two bars referred to, five times alternately take up one loop, throw the thread over once, then work off all the loops and the threads thrown over together. This completes the dot. Now work 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following stitch of the preceding round, 1 ch., 1 dc. on the second following stitch of the preceding round; on these 2 dc., and at the same time surround the vertical thread which has been formed by working off the preceding dot, work one dot as before. Work in this manner to the end of the round. 3d round.—1 sc. on the first stitch of the preceding round, fasten to the first ring of the row of tatting rings previously worked, where this ring is closed with 1 sl. * 4 sl. on the four following stitches of the preceding round, at the same time work on the connecting thread between the tatting ring referred to and the following one, fasten to the following tatting ring as before, and repeat from *. 4th round.—Alternately 1 sc. on the p. at the point of the first tatting ring, 3 ch. 5th round.—Like the second round. 6th round.—1 sl. on each st. of the preceding round, which completes the collar.

THIS cover, which Fig. 1 shows reduced in size, consists of sixteen triangular parts, which are worked in Tunisian stitch with medium-sized knitting cotton, embroidered in satin and twisted stitch, and joined as shown by Fig. 1. The cover is edged with a crochet fringe border. Fig. 2 shows one of these triangular sections in full size. Begin each section with a foundation of 76 st. (stitches), and on these work 39 pattern rows in Tunisian stitch; in doing this narrow 1 st. each at the beginning and end of the first round of each pattern row, so that in the last round all the stitches are used up. The completed triangle is edged with a round of cross double crochet, as shown by Fig. 2, and then ornamented with embroidery. The flower and the berries are worked in twisted stitch; the leaves in satin stitch; the stems in half-polka stitch. All these designs must be underlaid with cotton, so that they appear raised. Overhand the triangles thus formed together on the under side, as shown by Fig. 1. Fill out the space at the middle of the cover with a rosette crocheted in the following manner: * 1 dc. (double crochet) on the stitch at the point of one of the eight triangular parts which meet there, 4 ch. (chain stitch), pass over the last of these, 1 sl. (slip stitch), 1 sc. and 1 dc. on the next 3 ch. Repeat seven times from *, then fasten to the first dc. with 1 sl. and fasten the thread. The points at the middle of the rosette are held together with a wheel. For the border at the outer edge of the cover work two rounds as follows: 1st round.—On each cross double crochet at the outer edge of the cover work a dot of 7 tc. (treble crochet) each, after each dot 3 ch. 2d round.—Cross double crochet. Each cross double crochet is worked on the ch. before and on the ch. after each dot. On each cross double crochet tie fringe strands of white cotton, each three inches and one-fifth long. In this way larger or smaller covers may be made at pleasure; the crocheted triangular sections may also be joined with similar sections of plain or embroidered cloth. Fig. 3 shows such a section of white Marseilles in full size. The design in this is worked in back stitch with black split zephyr worsted; the latter stitches are worked over with white cotton, so that a fine cord is simulated. The section is edged in with button-hole stitches; on these a round of alternately one twisted stitch, 3 ch., then a round of sc. is worked (see illustration).

EXACTNESS.

A RARE merit in women—indispensable to one who wishes for employment. Much of the inaccuracy of women arises from their early education. Few teachers of girls are exact themselves; therefore they never dream of teaching their pupils exactness. Now it is all well enough for a girl to understand her lesson sufficiently to say it in her own words: only do not let her suppose when she does so that she is repeating the passage as it is in the book. Let her be able to say it both ways, if you like. But if a piece of prose or poetry is to be learned, let it be learned in the words of the author. The words in which he clothes his ideas or instructions are characteristic of his own mind. Often-repeated inaccuracies deaden the powers of perception, and produce confusion of ideas and of memory. This confusion is injurious to any one, but to a girl who wishes to earn money by her labor it is fatal. There is no possible employment in which she will not need exactness. What does an often-repeated inaccuracy in accounts, or even in needle-work, grow into? A mountain of blunder, which at last topples over and crushes us. Poor things! we creep out from the fallen mass, bruised and dispirited, angry with it and angry with ourselves, once again wearily to begin our task.

Again and again we hear of "ladies who wish to obtain employment in copying manuscripts or law papers." How the law papers fare, solicitors best know; manuscripts fare hardly enough, in a general way. One lady insists on inserting a comma apparently every time she dips her pen in the ink—a landmark which may possess some interest for herself, but is insightly to the outer world; another, who finds a difficulty in understanding a word, alters it to suit her own views; another leaves out or inserts capitals according to her own wild will; others insist on a liberal use of dashes, changing commas, semicolons, even full stops, into that unauthorized mark, thereby producing a bewildering effect on the unhappy author, who scarcely recognizes his own work in the bedashed page. Nor are these all his annoyances if he rashly employ an inexact copyist. The little vexations she unintentionally causes are legion. Copy of manuscript not infrequently wants so much correction and careful reading that he would have saved both time and labor by making the copy himself. Certainly he would have been spared a great outlay of control of temper.

Now there are women so exact that they may be trusted implicitly for accuracy in every thing. Why should not all make themselves so? Employers expect it, and have a right to expect it. How is it to be acquired?

By attention, determination, patience. Watch yourself carefully that you do nothing, however trifling, inaccurately. In this way:

If you are reading a French book, and do not know perfectly the meaning of each word, stop. Make out every word clearly before you allow yourself to go on.

If engaged in copying, read over each page as you write it; compare it with the original—not merely the words, but the punctuation, the use of capitals, the breaks into paragraphs. Let nothing escape your eye. In copying, it is best to copy even what you know, or think you know, to be mistakes. The author is responsible for them, not you. Look on yourself simply as a machine, the beauty of which consists in its accurate performance of its work; in its neatness, its precision. Therefore, if you have made the slightest deviation from the original, rewrite the page.

Carry out the same principle with every other work. Make it an inflexible rule that no inaccuracy shall even elude you; that before you go to bed at night your work shall be examined, proved, be it what it may.

Sleep on your resolutions, your decisions, if you will; never on your inaccuracies. To-morrow will have its own work, and the faults of to-day must not be thrust on its shoulders in addition. Its own burden will be enough for it.

But courage! To attain accuracy is not so hard as it sounds. Only begin. Do not say, "I am inaccurate, I know; I am very sorry for it, but I can not help it." Accuracy is simply a habit of the mind, and, like all other habits, the child of training. It only needs constant watching of your work, firm resolution, self-imposed punishment for every transgression: things we can all give, though not without effort.

REGRETS.

If we had but known, if we had but known,
Those summer days together,
That one would stand next year alone
In the blazing July weather!
Why, we trifled away the golden hours,
With gladness, and beauty, and calm,
Watching the glory of blossoming flowers,
Breathing the warm air's balm;
Seeing the children like sunbeams play,
In the glades of the long cool wood;
Hearing the wild bird's carol gay,
And the song of the murmuring flood.
Rich gems to Time's pitiless river thrown,
If we had but known, if we had but known!

If we had but known, if we had but known,
Those winter nights together,
How one would sit by the hearth alone
In the next December weather!
Why, we sped those last hours, each for each,
With music and games and talk,
The careless, bright, delicious speech,
With no doubt or fear to balk;
Touching on all things, grave and gay,
With the freedom of two in one,
Yet leaving, as happy people may,
So much unsaid, undone.
Ah, priceless hours forever flown,
If we had but known, if we had but known!

If we had but known, if we had but known,
While yet we stood together,
How a thoughtless look, a slighting tone,
Would sting and jar forever!
Cold lies the turf for the burning kiss,
The cross stands deaf to cries,
Dull, as the wall of silence is,
Are the gray unanswering skies!
We can never unsay a thing we said,
While the weary life drags past,
We never can stanch the wound that bled,
Where a chance stroke struck it last.
Oh, the patient love 'neath the heavy stone,
If we had but known, if we had but known!

If we had but known, if we had but known!
We had climbed the hill together;
The path before us seemed all our own,
And the glorious autumn weather.
We had sown: the harvest was there to reap.
We had worked: lo! the wages ready.
Who was to guess that the last long sleep
Was closing round one already?
With never a warning, sharp and strong,
Came the bitter wrench of doom,
And love and sorrow and yearning long
May wail by the lonely tomb.
Oh, keenest of pangs 'mid the mourner's moan,
If we had but known, if we had but known!

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

SMOULDERING FIRES.

WITH the beginning of August there came a change in the weather. High winds, gloom, and rain succeeded that brilliant, cloudless summer-time, which had become, as it were, the normal condition of the universe; and Lady Laura's guests were fain to abandon their picnics and forest excursions, their botanical researches and distant race-meetings; nay, even croquet itself, that perennial source of recreation for the youthful mind, had to be given up, except in the most fitful snatches. In this state of things amateur concerts and acted charades came into fashion. The billiard-room was crowded from breakfast till dinner time. It was a charmingly composite apartment—with one long wall lined with bookshelves, sacred to the most frivolous, ephemeral literature, and a grand piano in an arched recess at one end of the room—and in wet weather the chosen resort of every socially disposed guest at Hale. Here Clarissa learned to elevate her pretty little hand into the approved form of bridge, and acquired some acquaintance with the mysteries of cannons and breaks. It was Mr. Fairfax who taught her billiards. Lady Geraldine dropped into the room now and then, and played a game in a dashing, off-hand way with her lover, amidst the admiring comments of her friends; but she did not come very often, and Mr. Fairfax had plenty of time to teach Clarissa.

Upon one of these wet days he insisted upon looking over her port-folio of drawings; and in going through a heap of careless sketches they came upon something of her brother Austin's. They were sitting in the library—a very solemn and splendid chamber, with a carved oak roof and deep mullioned windows, a room that was less used than any other apartment in the Castle. Mr. Fairfax had caught Miss Lovel here, with her port-folio open on the table before her, copying a drawing of Piranesi's; so there could be no better opportunity for inspecting the sketches, which she had hitherto refused to show him.

That sketch of Austin's—a group of Arab horsemen done in pen and ink—set them talking about him at once; and George Fairfax told Clarissa all he could tell her about his intercourse with her brother.

"I really liked him so much," he said, gently, seeing how deeply she was moved by the slightest mention of that name. "I can not say that I ever knew him intimately—that I can claim to be his friend; but I used at one time to see a good deal of him, and I was very much impressed by his genius. I never met a young man who gave me a stronger notion of undisciplined genius; but, unhappily, there was a recklessness about him which I can easily imagine would lead him into dangerous associations. I was told that he had quarreled with his family, and meant to sell out and take to painting as a profession; and I really believe that he would have made his fortune as a painter; but when I heard of him next, he had gone abroad—to the colonies, some one said. I could never learn any thing more precise than that."

"I would give the world to know where he is," said Clarissa, mournfully; "but I dare not ask papa any thing about him, even if he could tell me, which I doubt very much. I did try to speak of him once; but it was no use—papa would not hear his name."

"That seems very hard; and yet your father must have been proud of him and fond of him once, I should think."

"I am not sure of that. Papa and Austin never seemed to get on quite well together. There was always something—as if there had been some kind of hidden resentment, some painful feeling, in the mind of each. I was too young to be a competent judge, of course; but I know, as a child, I had always a sense that there was a cloud between those two, a shadow that seemed to darken our lives."

They talked for a long time of this prodigal son; and this kind of conversation seemed to bring them nearer to each other than any thing else that had happened within the six weeks of their acquaintance.

"If ever I have any opportunity of finding out your brother's whereabouts, Miss Lovel, you may be sure that I will use every effort to get you some tidings of him. I don't want to say any thing that might lead to your being disappointed; but when I go to town again, I will hunt up a man who used to be one of his friends, and try to learn something. Only you must promise me not to be disappointed if I fail."

"I won't promise that; but I promise to bear my disappointment quietly, and to be grateful to you for your goodness," Clarissa answered, with a faint smile.

They went on with the inspection of the drawings, in which Mr. Fairfax showed himself deeply interested. His own manipulative powers were of the smallest, but he was an excellent critic.

"I think I may say of you what I said of your brother just now—that you might make a fortune if you were to cultivate art seriously."

"I wish I could make a fortune large enough to buy back Arden Court," Clarissa answered, eagerly.

"You think so much of Arden?"

"Oh yes; I am always thinking of it, always dreaming of it. The dear old rooms haunt me sleeping and waking. I suppose they are all altered now. I think it would almost break my heart to see them different."

"Do you know, I am scarcely in a position to understand that fervent love for one's birthplace. I may be said to have no birthplace myself. I was born in lodgings, or a furnished house—some temporary ark of that kind—the next thing to being born on board ship, and having Stepney for one's parish. My father was in a hard-working cavalry regiment, and the early days of my mother's married life were spent in perpetual wanderings. They separated, when I was about eight years old, forever—a sad story, of course; something worse than incompatibility of temper on the husband's side—and from that time I never saw him, though he lived for some years. So, you see, the words 'home' and 'father' are for me very little more than sentimental abstractions. But with my mother I have been quite happy. She has, indeed, been the most devoted of women. She took a house at Eton when my brother and I were at school there, and superintended our home studies herself; and from that time to this she has watched my career with unchanging care. It is the old story of maternal tenderness and filial short-comings. I have given her a world of trouble; but I am not the less fond of her or the less grateful to her." He stopped for a few moments, with something like a sigh, and then went on in a lighter tone. "You can see, however, that having no ancestral home of my own, I am hardly able to understand the depth of your feeling for Arden Court. There is an old place down in Kent—a fine old castellated mansion, built in the days of Edward IV.—which is to be mine by-and-by, but I doubt if I shall ever value it as you do your old home. Perhaps I am wanting in the poetic feeling necessary for the appreciation of these things."

"Oh no; it is not that," Clarissa answered, eagerly; "but the house you speak of will not have been your home. You won't have that dim, dreamy recollection of childhood spent in the old rooms: another life, the life of another being almost, it seems, as one looks back to it. I have only the faintest memory of my mother, but it is very sweet, and it is all associated with Arden Court. I can not conjure up her image for a moment without that background. Yes, I do wish for fortune, for that one reason. I would give the world to win back Arden."

She was very much in earnest. Her cheeks flushed and her eyes brightened with those eager words. Never, perhaps, had she looked lovelier than at that moment. George Fairfax paused a little before he answered her, admiring the bright, animated face—admiring her, he thought, very much as he might have admired some beautiful wayward child—and then he said, gravely:

"It is dangerous to wish for any thing so intensely. There are wishes the gratification whereof is fatal. There are a dozen old stories in the classics to show that, to say nothing of all those medieval legends in which Satan is complaisant to some eager wisher."

"But there is no chance of my wish being gratified. If I could work my fingers to the bone in the pursuit of art or literature, or any of the professions by which women win money, I should never earn the price of Arden. Nor would that hateful Mr. Granger be disposed to sell a place which gives him his position in the county: and I suppose he is fond of it, after a fashion. He has spent a fortune upon improvements. Improvements!" repeated Clarissa, contemptuously. "I dare say he has improved away the very spirit of the place."

"You cherish a very strong dislike for this gentleman, it seems, Miss Lovel."

"I am wicked enough to dislike him for having robbed us of Arden. Of course you will say that any one else might have bought the place. But then I can only reply that I should have disliked any other purchaser just the same; a little less though, perhaps, if he had been a member of some noble old family—a man with a great name. It would have been some consolation to think that Arden was promoted."

"I am afraid there is a leaven of good old Tory spirit in your composition, Miss Lovel."

"I suppose papa is a Tory. I know he has a profound contempt for what he calls new people—very foolish, of course; I quite feel that; but I think he can not help remembering that he comes of a good old race that has fallen upon evil days."

"You remember my telling you that I had been to Arden Court. Mr. Granger gave a state dinner once while I was staying here, and I went with Fred and Lady Laura. I found him not by any means a disagreeable person. He is just a little slow and ponderous, and I should scarcely give him credit for a profound or brilliant intellect; but he is certainly sensible, well-informed, and he gave me the idea of being the very essence of truth."

"I dare say he is very nice," Clarissa answered, with a subdued sigh. "He has always been kind and attentive to papa, sending game and hot-house fruit, and all that kind of thing; and he has begged that we would use the park as if it were our own; but I have never crossed the boundary that divides my new home from my old one. I couldn't bear to see the old walks now."

They talked for a good deal longer, till the clanging of the Castle bell warned Clarissa that it was time to dress for dinner. It is amazing how rapidly time will pass in such serious confidential talk. George Fairfax looked at his watch with an air of disbelief in that supreme authority, the Castle bell, which was renowned for its exact observance of Greenwich time. That blusterous, rainy August afternoon had slipped away so quickly.

"It is a repetition of my experience during that night journey to Holborough," Mr. Fairfax said, smiling. "You have a knack of charming away the hours, Miss Lovel."

It was the commonest, most conventional form of compliment, no doubt; but Clarissa blushed a little, and bent rather lower over the port-folio, which she was closing, than she had done before. Then she put the port-folio under her arm, murmured something about going to dress, made George Fairfax a gracious courtesy, and left him.

He did not hurry away to make his own toilette, but walked up and down the library for some minutes, thinking.

"What a sweet girl she is!" he said to himself, "and what a pity her position is not a better one! With a father like that, and a brother who has stamped himself as a scape-grace at the beginning of life, what is to become of her? Unless she marries well, I see no hopeful prospect for her future. But, of course, such a girl as that is sure to make a good marriage."

Instead of being cheered by this view of the case, Mr. Fairfax's brow grew darker and his step heavier.

"What does it matter to me whom she chooses for her husband?" he asked himself. "And yet no man would like to see such a girl throw herself away for mercenary reasons. If I had known her a few months ago! If! What is the history of human error but a succession of 'ifs?' Would it have been better for me or for her that we had learned to know each other while I was free? The happiest thing for me would have been never to have met her at all. I felt myself in some kind of danger that night we met in the railway carriage. Her race is fatal to mine, I begin to think. Any connection in that quarter would have galled my mother to the quick—broken her heart, perhaps; and I am bound to consider her in all I do. Nor am I a schoolboy, to fancy that the whole color of my life is to be governed by such an influence as this. She is only a pretty woman, with a low, sweet voice, and gentle, winning ways. Most people would call Geraldine the handsomer of the two. Poor child! She ought to seem no more than a child to me. I think she likes me and trusts me. I wish Geraldine were kinder to her; I wish—"

He did not particularize that last wish even to himself, but went away to dress, having wasted the first quarter of the three quarters that elapsed between the first and second bell at Hale Castle.

Throughout that evening, which was an unusually quiet and domestic evening for Hale, he did not talk any more to Clarissa. It might even have been thought that he scrupulously and of a fixed purpose avoided her. He devoted himself to chess with Lady Geraldine—a game he played indifferently, and for which he cherished a profound aversion. But chess was one of Geraldine Challoner's strong points; and that fair-haired, aquiline-nosed beauty never looked more regal than when she sat before a chess-table, with one thin white hand raised and hovering gently above the carved ivory pieces.

Mr. Fairfax lost four or five games in succession, excusing his own careless play every time by some dextrous compliment to his betrothed. More than once he stifled a yawn—more than once his glances wandered away to the group near the grand piano, amidst which Clarissa was seated, listening to Lizzie Fermor's brilliant waltzes and mazurkas, with an open music-book on her lap, turning over the leaves now and then, with rather a listless, preoccupied air, Mr. Fairfax thought.

That evening did certainly seem very dreary to Clarissa, in spite of Miss Fermor's dashing music and animated chatter. She missed that other talk, half playful, half earnest, with which George Fairfax had been wont to beguile some part of every evening; finding her out, as if by some subtile instinct, in whatever corner of the room she happened to be, and always devoting some one half hour of the evening to her society. To-night all things came to an end: matrons and misses murmured their good-nights, and sailed away to the corridor, where there was a regiment of small silver candlesticks, emblazoned with the numerous quarterings of Armstrong and Challoner, and George Fairfax only rose from the chess-table as Lady Laura's guests abandoned the drawing-room. Geraldine bade her lover good-night with her most bewitching smile—a smile in which there was even some faint ray of warmth.

"You have given me some very easy victories," she said, as they shook hands, "and I won't flatter you by saying you have played well. But it was very good of you to sit so long at a game which I know you detest, only to please me."

"A very small sacrifice, surely, my dear Geraldine. We'll play chess every night if you like. I don't care much for the game in the abstract, I admit; but I am never tired of admiring your judicious play, or the exquisite shape of your hands."

"No, no; I don't want to put you in for such severe training. I saw how tired you were more than once to-night, and how your eyes wandered away to those noisy girls by the piano, like an idle boy who is kept at his lessons when his companions are at play."

Mr. Fairfax's sunburnt countenance reddened a little at this reproof.

"Was I inattentive?" he asked. "I did not know that. I was quite aware of my bad play, and I really believe I was conscientious."

And so they wished each other good-night and parted. Geraldine Challoner did not go at once to her own room. She had to pass her sister's quarters on her way, and stopped at the door of Lady Laura's dressing-room.

"Are you quite alone, Laura?" she asked, looking in.

"Quite alone."

A maid was busy unweaving a splendid pyramid of chestnut plaits which had crowned the head of her mistress; but she, of course, counted for nothing, and could be dismissed at any moment.

"And there will not be half a dozen people coming in to gossip?" Lady Geraldine asked, in rather a fretful tone, as she flung herself into an arm-chair near the dressing-table.

"Not a soul; I have wished every one good-night. I was rather tired, to tell the truth, and not inclined for talk. But, of course, I am always glad of a chat with you, Geraldine. You may go, Parker; I can finish my hair myself."

The maid retired, as quietly as some attendant spirit.

Lady Laura took up a big ivory brush and began smoothing the long chestnut locks in a meditative way, waiting for her sister to speak. But Lady Geraldine seemed scarcely in the mood for lively conversation; her fingers were twisting themselves in and out upon the arm of her chair in a nervous way, and her face had a thoughtful, not to say moody, expression.

Her sister watched her for some minutes silently.

"What is the matter, Geraldine?" she inquired at last. "I can see there is something wrong."

"There is very much that is wrong," the other answered, with a kind of suppressed vehemence. "Upon my word, Laura, I believe it is your destiny to stand in my light at every stage of my life, or you would scarcely have happened to have planted that girl here just at this particular time."

"What girl?" cried Lady Laura, amazed at this sudden accusation.

"Clarissa Lovel."

"Good gracious me, Geraldine! what has my poor Clarissa done to offend you?"

"Your poor Clarissa has only set her cap at George Fairfax; and as she happens to be several years younger than I am, and I suppose a good deal prettier, she has thoroughly succeeded in distracting his attention—his regard, perhaps—from myself."

Laura Armstrong dropped the hair-brush in profound consternation.

"My dear Geraldine, this is the merest jealous folly on your part. Clarissa is the very last girl in the world who would be guilty of such meanness as to try and attract another woman's lover. Besides, I am sure that George's attachment to yourself—"

"Pray don't preach about that, Laura!" her sister broke in, impatiently. "I must be the best judge of his attachment; and you must be the very blindest of women if you have not seen how your newest pet and protégée has contrived to lure George to her side night after night, and to interest him by her pretty looks and ingénue airs and graces."

"Why, I don't believe George spoke to Miss Lovel once this evening. He was playing chess with you from the moment he came to the drawing-room after dinner."

"To-night was an exceptional case. Mr. Fairfax was evidently on duty. His manner all the evening was that of a man who has been consciously culpable, and is trying to atone for bad behavior. And your favorite was wounded by his desertion—I could see that."

"She did seem a little dull, certainly," Lady Laura answered, thoughtfully. "I observed that myself. But I know that the girl has a noble nature, and if she has been so foolish as to be just a little attracted by George Fairfax, she will very quickly awake to a sense of her folly. Pray don't give yourself the faintest uneasiness, Geraldine. I have my plans for Clarissa Lovel, and this hint of yours will make me more anxious to put them into execution. As for George, it is natural to men to flirt; there's no use in being angry with them. I'm sure that wretched Fred of mine has flirted desperately in his way."

Lady Geraldine gave her shoulders a contemptuous shrug, expressive of the most profound indifference to the delinquencies of Mr. Armstrong.

"Your husband and George Fairfax are two very different people," she said.

"But you don't for a moment suppose there is any thing serious in this business?" Laura asked, anxiously.

"How can I tell? I sometimes think that George has never really cared for me; that he proposed to me because he thought his mother would like the marriage, and because our names had often been linked together, and our marriage was in a manner expected by people, and so on. Yes, Laura, I have sometimes doubted if he ever loved me—I hate to talk of these things, even to you; but there are times when one must confide in some one—and I have been sorely tempted to break off the engagement."

She rose from her chair, and began to pace up and down the room in a quick, impatient way.

"Upon my honor, I believe it would be the happiest thing for both of us," she said.

Lady Laura looked at her sister with perfect consternation.

"My dearest Geraldine, you would surely never be so mad!" she exclaimed. "You could not be so foolish as to sacrifice the happiness of your future life to a caprice of the moment—a mere outbreak of temper. Pray let there be an end of such nonsense. I am sure George is sincerely attached to you, and I am very much mistaken in you if you do not like him—love him—better than you can ever hope to love any other man in this world."

"Oh yes, I like him well enough," Geraldine Challoner answered, impatiently: "too well to endure any thing less than perfect sincerity on his part."

"But, my dearest, I am sure that he is sincere," Laura answered, soothingly. "Now, my own Geraldine, do, pray, be reasonable, and leave this business to me. As for Clarissa, I have plans for her, the realization of which would set your mind quite at ease; but if I can not put them into execution immediately, the girl shall go. Of course you are the first consideration. With regard to George, if you would only let me sound him, I am sure I should get at the real state of his feelings, and find them all we can wish—"

"Laura!" cried Geraldine, indignantly, "if you dare to interfere, in the smallest degree, with this business, I shall never speak to you again."

"My dear Geraldine!"

"Remember that, Laura, and remember that I mean what I say. I will not permit so much as the faintest hint of any thing I have told you from you to George."

"My dearest girl, I pledge myself not to speak one word," protested Lady Laura, very much alarmed by her sister's indignation.

Geraldine left her soon after this, vexed with herself for having betrayed so much feeling even to a sister—left her, not to repose in peaceful slumbers, but to walk up and down her room till early morning, and look out at daybreak on the Castle gardens and the purple woods beyond, with a haggard face and blank, unseeing eyes.

George Fairfax, meanwhile, had lain himself down to take his rest in tolerable good humor with himself and the world in general.

"I really think I behaved very well," he said to himself; "and having made up my mind to stop any thing like a flirtation with that perilously fascinating Clarissa, I shall stick to my resolve with the heroism of an ancient Roman; though the Romans were hardly so heroic in that matter, by-the-way: witness the havoc made by that fatal Egyptian, a little bit of a woman that could be bundled up in a carpet—to say nothing of the general predilection for somebody else's wife which prevailed in those days, and which makes Suetonius read like a modern French novel. I did not think there was so much of the old leaven left in me. My sweet Clarissa! I fancy she likes me—in a sisterly kind of way, of course—and trusts me not a little. And yet I must seem cold to her, and hold myself aloof, and wound the tender, untried heart a little, perhaps. Hard upon both of us, but I suppose only a common element in the initiatory ordinances of matrimony."

And so George Fairfax closed his eyes and fell asleep, with the image of Clarissa before him in that final moment of consciousness, whereby the same image haunted him in his slumbers that night, alternately perplexing or delighting him; while ever and anon the face of his betrothed, pale and cold and statue-like, came between him and that other face; or the perfect hand he had admired at chess that night was stretched out through the darkness to push aside the form of Clarissa Lovel.

That erring dreamer was a man accustomed to take all things lightly—not a man of high principle; a man whose best original impulses had been weakened and deadened not a little by the fellowship he had kept and the life he had led; a man unhappily destined to exercise an influence over others disproportionate to the weight of his own character.

Lady Laura was much disturbed by her sister's confidence; and being of a temperament to which the solitary endurance of any mental burden is almost impossible, immediately set to work to do the very things which would have been most obnoxious to Geraldine Challoner. In the first place she awakened her husband from comfortable slumbers, haunted by no more awful forms than his last acquisition in horseflesh, or the oxen he was fattening for the next cattle-show, and determinedly kept him awake while she gave him a detailed account of the distressing scene she had just had with "poor Geraldine."

Mr. Armstrong, whose yawns and vague, disjointed replies were piteous to hear, thought there was only one person in question who merited the epithet "poor," and that person himself; but he made some faint show of being interested, nevertheless.

"Silly woman, silly woman!" he mumbled at last. "I've always thought she rides the high horse rather too much with Fairfax. Men don't like that sort of thing, you know. Geraldine's a very fine woman, but she can't twist a man round her fingers as you can, Laura. Why don't you speak to George Fairfax, and hurry on the marriage somehow? The sooner the business is settled the better with such a restive couple as these two; uncommonly hard to drive in double harness—the mare inclined to jib, and the other with a tendency to shy. You're such a manager, Laura, you'd make matters square in no time."

If Lady Laura prided herself on one of her attributes more than another—and she did cherish a harmless vanity about many things—it was in the idea that she was a kind of social Talleyrand. So on this particular occasion, encouraged by simple Fred Armstrong, who had a rooted belief that there never had existed upon this earth such a wonderful woman as his wife, my lady resolved to take the affairs of her sister under her protection, and to bring all things to a triumphant issue. She felt very little compunction about breaking her promise to Geraldine.

"All depends upon the manner in which a thing is done," she said to herself, complacently, as she composed herself for slumber. "Of course I shall act with the most extreme delicacy. But it would never do for my sister's chances in life to be ruined for want of a little judicious intervention."

CHAPTER IX.

LADY LAURA DIPLOMATIZES.

THE weather was fine next day, and the Castle party drove ten miles to a rustic race-course, where there was a meeting of a very insignificant character, but interesting to Mr. Armstrong, to whom a horse was a source of perennial delight, and a fair excuse for a long gay drive, and a picnic luncheon in carriages and on coach-boxes.

Among Lady Laura's accomplishments was the polite art of driving. To-day she elected to drive a high phaeton with a pair of roans, and invited George Fairfax to take the seat beside her. Lady Geraldine had a headache, and had not appeared that morning, but had sent a message to her sister to request that her indisposition, which was the merest trifle, might not prevent Mr. Fairfax going to the races.

Mr. Fairfax at first seemed much inclined to remain at home and perform garrison duty.

"Geraldine will come down stairs presently, I dare say," he said to Lady Laura, "and we can have a quiet stroll in the gardens while you are all away. I don't care a straw about the Mickleham races. Please leave me at home, Lady Laura."

"But Geraldine begs that you will go. She'll keep her room all day, I've no doubt; she generally does when she has one of her headaches. Every one is going, and I have set my heart on driving you. I want to hear what you think of the roans. Come, George, I really must insist upon it."

She led him off to the phaeton triumphantly, while Frederick Armstrong was fain to find some vent for his delighted admiration of his gifted wife's diplomacy in sundry winks and grins, to the address of no one in particular, as he bustled to and fro between the terrace and the hall, arranging the mode and manner of the day's excursion—who was to be driven by whom, and so on.

Clarissa found herself bestowed in a landau full of ladies, Barbara Fermor among them, and was very merry with these agreeable companions, who gave her no time to meditate upon that change in Mr. Fairfax's manner last night, which had troubled her a little in spite of her better sense. He was nothing to her, of course; an accidental acquaintance whom she might never see again after this visit; but he had known her brother, and he had been kind and sympathetic—so much so that she would have been glad to think that he was really her friend. Perhaps, after all, there was very little cause that she should be perplexed or worried on account of his quiet avoidance of her that one evening; but then Clarissa Lovel was young and inexperienced, and thus apt to be hypersensitive and easily disturbed about trifles.

Having secured a comfortable tête-à-tête with Mr. Fairfax, Lady Laura lost no time in improving the occasion. They were scarcely a mile from the Castle before she began to touch upon the subject of the intended marriage, lightly, and with an airy gayety of manner which covered her real earnestness.

"When is it to be, George?" she asked. "I really want to know something definite, on account of my own engagements and Fred's, which must all hinge more or less on this important business. There's no use in my talking to Geraldine, for she is really the most impracticable of beings, and I can never get her to say any thing definite."

"My dear Lady Laura, I am almost in the same position. I have more than once tried to induce her to fix the date for her marriage, but she has always put the subject aside somehow or other. I really don't like to bore her, you see; and no doubt things will arrange themselves in due course."

Lady Laura gave a little sigh of relief. He did not avoid the question—that was something—nor did her interference seem in any manner unpleasant to him. Indeed, nothing could be more perfect than his air of careless good humor, Lady Laura thought.

But she did not mean the subject to drop here; and after a little graceful manipulation of the reins, a glance backward to see how far behind they had left the rest of the caravan, and some slight slackening of the pace at which they had been going, she went on:

"No doubt things would arrange themselves easily enough, if nothing happened to interfere with our plans. But the fact is, my dear George, I am really most uneasy about the state of poor papa's health. He has been so sadly feeble for the last three or four years, and I feel that we may lose him at any moment. At his age, poor dear soul, it is a calamity for which we must be prepared. But, of course, such an event would postpone your marriage for a long time, and I should really like to see my sister happily settled before the blow fell upon her. She has been so much with him, you see, and is so deeply attached to him, it will be worse for her than for any of us."

"I—I conclude so," Mr. Fairfax replied, rather doubtfully. He could not help wondering a little how his betrothed cared to leave a beloved father in so critical a condition; but he knew that his future sister-in-law was somewhat given to exaggeration—a high coloring of simple facts—as well as to the friendly direction of other people's affairs. He was, therefore, not surprised, upon reflection, that she should magnify her father's danger and her sister's filial devotion. Nor was he surprised that she should be anxious to hasten his marriage. It was natural to this impulsive matron to be eager for something—some event involving fine dress and invitations, elaborate dinners, and the gathering together of a frivolous crowd to be astonished and delighted by her own cleverness and fascination. To have a handsome sister to marry, and to marry well, was, of course, a great opportunity for the display of all those powers in which Lady Laura took especial pride.

And then George Fairfax had told himself that this marriage was the best possible thing for him; and, being so, it would be well that there should be no unnecessary delay. He had, perhaps, a vague feeling that he was giving up a good deal in sacrificing his liberty; but, on the whole, the sacrifice was a wise one, and could not be consummated too quickly.

"I trust you alarm yourself needlessly about your father, my dear Lady Laura," he said, presently; "but upon my word you can not be more anxious to see this affair settled than I am. I want to spend my honey-moon at Lyvedon, the quietest, most picturesque old place you can imagine, but not very enjoyable when the leaves are falling. My good uncle has set his heart on my borrowing his house for this purpose, and I think it would please Geraldine to become acquainted with an estate which must be her own in a few years."

"Unquestionably," cried Lady Laura, eagerly; "but you know what Geraldine is, or you ought to know—so foolishly proud and sensitive. She has known you so long, and perhaps—she would never forgive me if she knew I had hinted such a thing—had half unconsciously given you her heart before she had reason to be assured of your regard; and this would make her peculiarly sensitive. Now do, dear George, press the question, and let every thing be settled as soon as possible, or I have an apprehension that somehow or other my sister will slip through your fingers."

Mr. Fairfax looked wonderingly at his charioteer.

"Has she said any thing to put this fancy into your head?" he asked, with gravity rather than alarm.

"Said any thing? Oh dear, no! Geraldine is the last person to talk about her own feelings. But I know her so well," concluded Lady Laura, with a solemn air.

After this there came a brief silence. George Fairfax was a little puzzled by my lady's diplomacy, and perhaps just a little disgusted. Again and again he told himself that this union with Geraldine Challoner was the very best thing that could happen to him; it would bring him to anchor, at any rate, and he had been such mere drift-wood until now. But he wanted to feel himself quite a free agent, and this pressing on of the marriage by Lady Laura was in some manner discordant with his sense of the fitness of things. It looked a little like manœuvring. Yet, after all, she was quite sincere, perhaps, and did really apprehend her father's death intervening to postpone the wedding.

He would not remain long silent, lest she should fancy him displeased, and proceeded presently to pay her some compliments upon the roans, and on her driving, after which they rattled on pleasantly enough till they came to the green slope of a hill, where there was a rude rustic stand and a railed race-course, with a sprinkling of carriages on one side and gypsy tents on the other.

Here Mr. Fairfax delivered over Lady Laura to her natural protector; and, being free to stroll about at his own pleasure, contrived to spend a very agreeable day, devoting the greater part thereof to attendance upon the landau full of ladies, among whom was Clarissa Lovel; and she, being relieved from that harassing notion that she had in some unknown manner offended him, and being so new to all the pleasures of life that even these rustic races were delightful to her, was at her brightest, full of gay, girlish talk and merry laughter. He was not to see her thus many times again, in all the freshness of her young beauty, perfectly natural and unrestrained.

Once in the course of that day he left his post by the landau, and went for a solitary ramble; not among the tents, where black-eyed Bohemians saluted him as "my pretty gentleman," or the knock-'em-downs and weighing-machines, or the bucolic babble of the ring, but away across the grassy slope, turning his back upon the race-course. He wanted to think it out again, in his own phrase, just as he had thought it out the day before in the library at Hale.

"I am afraid I am getting too fond of her," he said to himself. "It's the old story—just like dram-drinking. I take the pledge, and then go and drink again. I am the weakest of mankind. But it can not make very much difference. She knows I am engaged—and Lady Laura is right. The sooner the marriage comes off the better. I shall never be safe till the knot is tied; and then duty, honor, feeling, and a dozen other motives will hold me to the right course."

He strolled back to his party only a little time before the horses were put in, and on this occasion went straight to the phaeton, and devoted himself to Lady Laura.

"You are going to drive me home, of course?" he said. "I mean to claim my place."

"I hardly think you have any right to it, after your desertion of me. You have been flirting with those girls in the landau all day."

"Flirting is one of the melancholy privileges of my condition. An engaged man enjoys an immunity in that matter. When a criminal is condemned to death they give him whatever he likes to eat, you know. It is almost the same kind of thing."

He took his place in the phaeton presently, and talked gayly enough all the way home, in that particular strain required to match my lady's agreeable rattle; but he had a vague sense of uneasiness lurking somewhere in his mind—a half consciousness that he was drifting the wrong way.

All that evening he was especially attentive to Lady Geraldine, whose headache had left her with a pale and pensive look which was not without its charm. The stately beauty had a softer air, the brightness of the blue eyes was not so cold as it was wont to be. They played chess again, and Mr. Fairfax kept aloof from Clarissa. They walked together in the gardens for a couple of hours next morning; and George Fairfax pressed the question of his marriage with such a show of earnestness and warmth that Geraldine's rebellious pride was at once solaced and subdued, and she consented to agree to any arrangement he and Lady Laura might make.

"She is so much more practical than I am," she said; "and I would really rather leave every thing to her and to you."

Lightly as she tried to speak of the future, she did on this occasion allow her lover to perceive that he was indeed very dear to her, and that the coldness which had sometimes wounded him was little more than a veil beneath which a proud woman strove to hide her deepest feelings. Mr. Fairfax rather liked this quality of pride in his future wife, even if it were carried so far as to be almost a blemish. It would be the surest safeguard of his home in the time to come. Such women are not prone to petty faults, or given to small quarrels. A man has a kind of security from trivial annoyances in an alliance with such a one.

It was all settled, therefore, in that two hours' stroll in the sunny garden, where the roses still bloomed in some diminution of their midsummer glory, their sweetness just a little overpowered by the spicy odor of innumerable carnations, their delicate colors eclipsed here and there by an impertinent early dahlia. Every thing was settled. The very date of the wedding was to be decided at once by Lady Laura and the bridegroom; and when George Fairfax went back to the Castle he felt, perhaps for the first time in his life, that he really was an engaged man. It was rather a solemn feeling, but not altogether an unpleasant one. He had seen more of Geraldine Challoner's heart this morning than he had ever seen before. It pleased him to discover that she really loved him; that the marriage was to be something more to her than a merely advantageous alliance; that she would in all probability have accepted him had he offered himself to her in his brother's life-time. Since his thirtieth birthday he had begun to feel himself something of a waif and stray. There had been mistakes in his life, errors he would be very glad to forget in an utterly new existence. It was pleasant to know himself beloved by a proud and virtuous woman—a woman whose love was neither to be easily won nor lightly lost.

He went back to the Castle more at ease with himself than he had felt for some time. His future was settled, and he had done his duty.

THE INNOCENT HEART.

BY MARIAN DOUGLAS.

STILL the same as of old,
With the buttercups' gold
All aglow, the broad meadow-land slopes to the west;
Time has passed by the place
With a smile on his face,
And you scarcely can tell where his footsteps have pressed.
All unpruned the green woodbine creeps up to the eaves,
And the cottage roof hides with its mantle of leaves;
And the doves on the roof their old love-stories tell;
And the winds, from the garden, of southernwood smell;
And the lilac-bush stands by the gate, as of yore;
And the cinnamon rose keeps its place by the door,
Looking pink with its flowers as a cloud of the dawn:
Oh, there's nothing that's changed, but there's something that's gone!
It has gone from my life—it has vanished from me;
I am not what I used, in life's morning, to be:
In the peace of the scene then I too had a part,
But I've lost, oh, I've lost it—my innocent heart!

True, the world meets me now
With a smile and a bow;
I'm a guest, not unsought, in her mansions of pride.
Better scorn and neglect
With my old self-respect,
When I'd nothing to fear, since I'd nothing to hide!
An unmerited trust is a burden of shame,
And there's praise undeserved that cuts deeper than blame.
All the sweetness of friendship is gone when we feel
We have done or have said what 'tis wise to conceal.
I have come to the home of my childhood again,
And the friends I once loved meet me fondly as then;
But I shrink from their kindness; it is not for me—
It belongs to the woman I once used to be;
And a shadow o'er all the sweet landscape is cast—
I am not what I was when I looked on it last:
In the peace of the scene then I too had a part,
But I've lost, oh, I've lost it—my innocent heart!

WORTH WHILE FOR WOMEN TO KNOW.

IN this spring's planting forget not to cluster about your house all the sweet-scented flowers, and especially the aromatic sorts. They have not only the gift of pleasing the most refined of all senses, but the office of conservators of health. Recent investigations by a renowned savant disclose the fact that ozone, the life-giving, life-renewing principle of the air, is largely exhaled by certain plants of sweet savor. Indeed, more of this pure element is given out by them than by any chemical combination known. Thank God, the use of flowers is discovered at last! Not the vestige of excuse for any utilitarian sneer at their culture is left. And now crowd the court-yard and balcony with all the wealth of fragrance a Northern season can know. The same authority declares it a measure of sanitary prudence to plant these flowers largely in all malarious, unhealthy, and marshy places, for they act as disinfectants. All the bad effects of shrubbery are due to too close planting, so as to deprive the house and grounds of sunlight. It is only in the full light of the sun's rays that they exert their healing power. A single perfumy pine will diffuse wholesome vapor over an area of thrice its breadth of shade if planted in open ground. Cedars, spruce, firs, larch, sassafras, and all gum-bearing and odorous trees, have this beneficial property; and I hope to see the time when they will displace the poisonous ailanthus and weakly poplar in city streets. The sweet-scented shrub and flowering currant, roses and azaleas, have the property of yielding ozone in a greater degree than the purely sweet flowers. The early spring blossoms, jonquil, hyacinth, and sweet alyssum, are charged with ozone, as one may say, while, in after months, the clove-pink, heliotrope, mignonnette, all kinds of mint, in or out of flower, tuberose, and honeysuckle keep up the succession. Houses in low grounds should be surrounded by beds of these plants, open to the sunlight. Hence the taste at the present day for flower beds, and blooming shrubs grouped in masses on the lawn, has a sanitary effect as well as a picturesque one.

Having these rich materials at hand, what woman of taste will not desire to preserve some souvenir surcharged with the soul of the summer's delight? Boxes of heliotrope, mignonnette, and pansies in the window sweeten the air of her dwelling; but for her personal delectation why should she not arrest the perfumes of midsummer? To do this by the aid of modern science is very simple. A small, wide-mouthed glass jar, such as are used by museums for specimens of natural history, should be filled with ether, and closed with a glass stopper dipped in glycerine to thoroughly exclude the air. Fill this jar during the season with the fresh blossoms of any fragrant plant, cut after the dew is dry, and stripped of leaf and stem as well as calyx. The petals alone of roses, violets, tuberoses, or pinks should be used; heliotrope should be cut close to the panicle of bloom. Of course a jar is allotted to each kind of blossom. The ether has the property of taking up the fragrant particles from flowers, and when evaporated leaves the essential oil of the plant behind, a very few drops of which in deodorized alcohol gives a delicious extract. Quantities of flowers are required, and the petals in the jar should be changed for fresh ones every day. Only skill and patience will succeed in the perfumer's art; but one success is worth the trouble of many failures.

Those who do not care to essay such delicate experiments as the above may be pleased to try these simple compounds. A charming recipe for scent-powder to be used for wardrobes, boxes, etc., far finer than the mixtures sold at the shops, is the following: Corianders, orris root, rose leaves, and aromatic calamus, each one ounce; lavender flowers, two ounces; rhodium-wood, one-fourth of a dram; musk, five grains. These are mixed and reduced to coarse powder. The scent on clothes is as if all fragrant garden flowers had been pressed in their folds.

A perfume for note-paper, said to be that used by the Queen of England, is made of powdered starch, one-half ounce; fresh orris powder, the same; attar of roses, ten drops. Put this into bags and keep in the writing-desk with paper.

All delicious flavors may be imprisoned by keeping the delicate substance in deodorized alcohol. How deodorized? By filtering through animal charcoal or bone-black in powder. The black may be used many times over. A thick flannel bag with wire at the top will answer for the filter. Fill it with the black dust, and pour the alcohol in it, leaving it to settle through. Have wide-mouthed bottles with glass stoppers ready, and half fill with alcohol; then fill with powdered orange or lemon peel, peach leaves, almonds, slices of pine-apple, raspberries, or fresh cherries; and the housewife will have a finer assortment of flavors than any manufacturer will furnish her. If she wishes, however, to imitate flavors which in the natural form are out of reach, it is best to use compounds of which she is not ignorant.

Banana may be imitated with oil of jasmine and a very little tartaric acid.

Strawberry, with a strong tincture of orris and a very little acetic ether—one ounce of the tincture to one-eighth of ether.

Strong tincture of orris root resembles raspberry.

Pine-apple is made with butyric ether, the acid itself coming from the transformation of rancid butter by a chemical process.

Very little of these preparations is needed to give the desired flavor. Four ounces of the tinctures mentioned will supply flavor enough for constant use during a whole summer.

A MAY BLOSSOM.

THE 1st of May had come. Up rose the sun, and up rose Mrs. O'Rooney; for though not bound to the chariot wheels of that luminary, and wont on most occasions to disregard his summons most comfortably, this was not an ordinary occasion with the worthy dame. A habit of annual (or semi-annual) removal teaches irresistibly the value of an early rise; and the 1st of May, if no other day in the calendar, always found the O'Rooney family awake and stirring.

For many years had the O'Rooneys pervaded this seventh district of the busy town. Now a garret, now a cellar received them. The top stories of the poorer buildings knew them well; in most they had dwelt; the rest felt them coming. They were a reckless, merry, multitudinous race. There were big little O'Rooneys, and little little O'Rooneys, the least of all seldom attaining a greater age than one year before a lesser yet appeared to claim his place. But, big and little, they were all alike good-humored, broadly Irish, and improvident. The wee-est of all the wee ones would take the bread from his mouth to feed a hungry playmate or a starved cat; and the parental O'Rooneys, content to fling themselves and their progeny on the general public for support in every tight pinch, never hesitated for a moment to unlatch their door and share their crust with any more forlorn than themselves. "Sure, what's enough for nine is enough for ten," was their philosophy. "We'll get through somehow." And they always did.

Their departure from any given quarter was usually accelerated by a notice to quit from some long-suffering landlord. With each removal they might be said to burn their bridge behind them, and to be presumably certain not to turn up again in that particular spot. This was no grief to them. Life would have seemed dull without this gentle perennial excitement.

"The crather is afther his rint again," Mrs. O'Rooney would tell her husband, cheerfully. "'Pay or clare out,' he sez—small blame to him. And where'll we go next, Tim?"

"Well," Tim would perhaps reply, "there's a flure in Godfrey Street we've niver thried at all at all. We might go there. It's two dollars a week, and a pump handy."

"Is it opposite the bake-house, you mane?" Mrs. O'Rooney would rejoin, with a joyous Irish screech. "Think of the convaniance of that, now! It's likely they'll give credit for a month or more."

Fired by this delightful prospect, the family duds and belongings would be hastily collected. Cheerful and chatty as a flock of crows, the O'Rooneys would rise en masse, flit a half mile or so, and settle in a new nest, which twenty-four hours would make as disorderly, as shiftless, and as cheerful as the one they had just quitted.

It was from Godfrey Street that they were now preparing to move. The "bake-house" having long since recognized and shut its doors against them, there was the less to regret in departure.

"Now, boys, tumble up, and on wid your clothes," cried the mother. "There's a wurrld to do this day. See there, now, Norry shames you. She's dressed afore you all."

Norry, aged four, was the only girl among the nine. This fact Mrs. O'Rooney was wont to lament on occasions of hurry and pressure. "Boys is well enough," she would aver; "but they're all tear and no mend, and all soil and no scour. Girls for my money!" But this munificent offer notwithstanding, Norry remained the only one. On this particular May morning, however, the lack was felt less than usual, for little Mary O'Rourke was "to the fore," and it would have been hard to light any where upon a handier or more helpful little maid than Mary.

This small stranger within the O'Rooney gates had come to them straight from a hospital, where she had half died of ship-fever. Homesick, feeble, friendless, the poor girl would not have known where to lay her sixteen-year-old head except for the attic in Godfrey Street which opened its kindly door to take her in. The debt thus incurred she repaid with the whole devotion of her warm heart and helpful hands. Night and day she labored in the service of these "friends in need." She scrubbed, she cobbled, she swept, she dusted, she polished the stove and the boys' faces. The domicile was never so clean or the family so comfortable before. Her presence had grown necessary to them, and, hard as it sometimes was to find food for this additional mouth, no one ever thought of sending Mary away to shift for herself. No, indeed. They'd pull through somehow, Mrs. O'Rooney said; they always did; and anyhow "there'd be no living without Mary at all at all."

She was a pretty, tidy-looking creature, this "angel unawares" of the O'Rooneys, with the blue eyes and glossy black hair of her native Ireland, and lips so ripe and blooming as to truly suggest the poet's image of

"Strawberries smothered in crame."

Beauty probably bore its share in the influence she exerted over the boys, who, according to their mother, were "good boys, as boys go, but obstinate as pigs when they'd a mind to." Certain it is that Teddy was never so amenable, or Pat—second in size and age—so chivalrous to any one before; that Tim and Barney followed her about as under a charm; that the smaller ones submitted to hair-brushing at her hands as at no other; and the baby was always crying to be taken into her arms. She was "as cliver as a rale fairy," the elder Tim asserted, and all the O'Rooney family bore him out in the opinion.

A "rale fairy" was needed for the job on hand this May-day morning. Breakfast to prepare; beds to uncord and pack; clothes to sort and tie in bundles; tins, kitchen utensils, what-not to collect and fasten up; a stove to take down—all amidst the dances and whoops of nine excited children, is no easy task. Mrs. O'Rooney's ordinary method of procedure was irregular as an Ojibbeway's. Things instinctively came out of her hands hind side before—wrong end foremost; but under Mary's influence something like order was infused into the chaos. The boys were collected, loaded with articles suited to their strength, and sent off at full trot toward the new lodgings, with Teddy at their head. It was while marshaling this unruly host down the stairs that Mary became aware of a counter-procession on its way up.

First came a youngish man, carrying a big bundle, and springing lightly along, two steps at a time, notwithstanding the apparent weight of his burden. A frank-looking fellow he was, with wavy hair and kind brown eyes—a little sad—such eyes as women like. After him toiled two children, each laden with something—tiny children, boys, the older not more than six. The brown eyes met Mary's as the young man came up. She blushed, and, confused, she knew not why, retreated to her eyrie. To her surprise, the party followed.

"Is it here we're to go?" inquired the man, in unmistakable brogue.

"I don't know," replied Mary, opening her eyes wider. "We're leaving, ourselves. It's the O'Rooneys we are."

"That's it," said the stranger, pulling a bit of paper from his pocket and consulting it—"that's the name. We've rinted the room you're laving, miss, and were bringing up our things, being turned out of our own bit of a place. But perhaps it's in your way we'll be?"

"Oh, we haven't any 'way!'" said Mary, laughing.

"Then, if it's no inconvaniance, we'll fetch them up, for it's at the street-dure they are; and perhaps we can lind you a hand at the same time."

"It's very polite you are, I'm sure," said Miss O'Rourke, and she gave a pretty blush.

"Such a pair of cheeks haven't mit my eyes before since I left Ireland!" thought the young man; but he said:

"Oh, niver spake of it, miss! James Connell's my name, and I'd be proud to assist you, being my countryman."

So Mary made room for him to pass; and in half an hour the O'Rooneys and the Connells were on the footing of old acquaintance, and the children were clinging about Mary as if they had known her always. They were pretty rogues, with clean, well-scrubbed faces; but their clothes were shabby and dilapidated, and there were singular attempts at patching, which told of clumsy male fingers. "It's bad work a man makes trying to be father and mother both," James said. His young wife had died two years before, on their passage over from Ireland, he told them; and Mrs. O'Rooney's motherly heart warmed at once to the little ones and their father.

Most hearts would have warmed to Connell, he was so wonderfully helpful and handy, and so full of good-will. His time and strength were applied to the porterage of Mrs. O'Rooney's valuables as cheerfully as to his own. He and Tim shouldered each other's stove-pipes and bedsteads indifferently, and the meeting resolved itself into a "bee" of mutual aid and service. So it came to pass that when, at noon, Tim and the boys departed from the premises, bearing the last bundles, Mrs. O'Rooney and Mary lingered. To their womanly apprehensions "a lone man," who couldn't know how to set himself to rights, was a sorry spectacle; and, after a whispered consultation, they frankly offered to stay an hour or two and "fix up." "Ye'll be the better for it all summer," Mrs. O'Rooney told him. "A man's little worth for getting things straightened, but my Mary there's a rale fairy for the like of that."

Connell had excellent wages, and his furniture was good and substantial—far better than the scanty plenishing it replaced. But the stove was dull, the cherry table stained and blackened; every thing lacked its shine. This Mary proceeded to give. James and Mrs. O'Rooney sat by, and watched her busy hands as she scrubbed and dusted and polished; now pasting a strip of paper over a soiled spot, now applying a drop of glue to a fracture; brightening whatever she touched, and humming scraps of merry rhyme to the children, who chased her as flies do a sunbeam. At last:

"Whatever is she, thin," asked James—"your daughter?"

"No, but as good," whispered back Mrs. O'Rooney.

"But she called you mother."

"So she did, the darlint. She was a poor girl from the other side, you see, who we took in sick, but she's grown to be the light of our eyes. She talks of going to sarvice; but Tim he'll not hear of it, nor me either. No—not while there's a morsel left in the cupboard, anyhow!" Mrs. O'Rooney concluded, with a sigh.

James asked no more, but his eyes followed Mary with a steadfast gaze. She became conscious of this at last, and it embarrassed her.

"Mother," she said from the window which she was washing, "this is done now. I'll just polish the kettle a bit and set it on, and then we'll be going."

"Oh!" cried James, starting up. "You mustn't go without a sup of something, and you tiring yourself to aid us. I've some tay and a loaf here, Miss Mary, and I'll set the table while the kettle boils."

But this Mary would not permit. Born housewife as she was, it was pain to see things done clumsily. So she took the cloth from him and spread it lightly over the freshly rubbed table, brought the cups and plates from the neat dresser where she had just ranged them, brewed the tea, cut the bread—all in a noiseless, gentle way, which was full of real grace. Connell watched her, enchanted; and when, as they drew up their chairs, she proceeded to fill the cups from the shining Britannia pot, his feeling of delight and comfort found vent in words.

"It's different intirely!" he cried. "Tay hasn't tasted nor bread relished so well since we set foot in this country. Has it children?"

"I wiss Maly would stop always," said the youngest, "and sing songs and make tay."

"Do! do!" screamed the other—"won't you, Maly?"

Poor Mary! But her confusion increased tenfold when Connell seized the other hand and exclaimed, "Won't you, Mary? I mane it," he went on; "but I'd not have found courage to say it so soon except for the talk of the little ones. You've only known us a day, Mary, but I feel to know you always. And when I saw you sitting there and smiling, with the tay-pot in your hand, I thought within meself, 'I can't niver let her go.' A rale fairy, your mother here calls you; and I belave it. Stay and be a fairy for us, Mary; for niver was a fairy more wanted to the fore than here, and just now."

"Well, I declare!" began Mary, faintly; but Mrs. O'Rooney chimed in:

"And you niver said a thruer word, James. It seems suddent, mavourneen; but listen to him, for he manes thruly by you. I know a man when I look in his eyes, and I tell you so. 'Twill be sore to part from you, darlint, and how we'll get along I can't say; but there's a rale home for you here, with plinty in it; and that's more than we can give at all at all, for all the good-will that's in our hearts. And them little fellows needs a mother, Mary."

"We all need you, Mary," whispered Connell, his handsome face close to hers. "Say 'yis,' Mary, and let it be this very night. I feel as if I couldn't let you go, and the room all dark behind you! And where's a more blessed day in the whole year than May-day to begin life together?"

"But I must help mother get to rights," cried sweet Mary. "Oh no, no! I can't, I can't, I can't!"

We all know what follows after nineteen "nay-says."

"Niver mind me, dear," cried Mrs. O'Rooney.

But the impetuous lover added, "And so you shall, love. Go you wid her now, and git in order, while I stip down and spake to Father O'Brien. This evening I'll come for you all, and we'll go to the praste's house, and after that we'll have a bit of a supper in this room you've made so clane and nice; and it'll be the happy day always that brought us together. Say 'yis.'"

So Mary said yes. She scrubbed diligently till sundown, then rebraided her hair, donned her "other gown," and, attended by all the O'Rooneys, went to the "praste's house," as pretty a bride, notwithstanding her long day of house-work, and absence of blonde and orange blossoms, as ever moonlight shone upon. The match so hastily arranged turned out happier by far than some entered into after long and punctilious delay; and from that day to this Mary Connell has been to husband and children as to the O'Rooneys, "a rale fairy," blessing and brightening all that came under her hands.

INFANT GENIUSES.

NOTHING is more reprehensible than the disposition to laugh at, and thereby to encourage, all traits of singularity, oddness, or affectation which children may exhibit, as marks of genius which ought not to be repressed. Of all the dangerous errors into which parents can fall, this, in our opinion, is the worst. For nothing so soon hardens into second nature as juvenile eccentricity; and few things are more injurious to success in life than marked oddities of manner and gesture when they reach the point of grotesqueness. The majority of the world agree with Mr. Peter Magnus: they don't see the necessity of originals; and what is more, so many "originals" are only sham ones after all. That is to say, their singularity is merely a bad habit which they can't shake off, and is only very partially innate. When you see a child doing any thing unlike other children, any thing queer, surprising, or uncouth, however comic or however clever it may seem, never laugh at or applaud it. Children naturally very self-willed, and with real natural peculiarities, can soon be broken of such tricks, if treated with absolute indifference. But once let the idea find its way into their brains that such sallies, naughty though they be, are regarded as marks of genius, and the mischief is done. If the boy be a boy, after all, of weak character, his nonsense may be driven out of him at school; if not, it will only be driven deeper in. Adherence to his "own ways" becomes gradually, in his eyes, a mark of manly independence, till at last there may come to be no folly or excess which he will not justify to himself on the same grounds. That such men, as children, must make themselves perfectly odious to all, except their doting relatives, is a trifle. I have seen the finest intellects and the most generous characters wasted and ruined, in consequence of habits in great part attributable to the encouragement of boyish oddities.

What is called "precocity" in children is, of course, something quite different, nor is the improper encouragement of it attended by the same class of dangers as those we have described above. The danger in this case is, that boys who do not maintain the same relative superiority as they grow up which they maintained in childhood—no uncommon case—may become disgusted with themselves, and sink into despondent idlers. There is, indeed, another bad consequence to be looked for in the opposite direction. A lad of twenty, who does not go ahead of his companions as he did at twelve, may refuse to recognize the truth, hug himself in the belief in his own unimpaired excellence, and set down every failure to accident or want of industry. When this habit of mind becomes inveterate, the consequences are frequently disastrous. But they are too well known to be dwelt upon. The former class of consequences has not been so generally observed. But we fancy the secret of many a wasted life is to be found in them. And when we consider, however dry the subject may be to childless persons—when we consider the wonderful powers of observation and assimilation which children possess, how extraordinarily apt they are to catch at any thing in their own favor, how they magnify in their own little minds all they hear said about themselves, either for good or for evil, it does seem wonderful that parents are not more careful than they generally seem to be with regard to such little matters, fraught as they are with immeasurable consequences, as we have here described.

We now come to the other side of the question, and have a few words to say to those ineffably foolish parents who keep their children down. This, no doubt, is rather an old-fashioned error, but it is far from being extinct for all that. We have spoken of the mistake which people make by encouraging eccentricities in their children; but they surely make just as great a mistake by checking their natural aspirations. There are in the world people with so little self-confidence, so little knowledge of real life outside their own small circle, that the bare idea of their children being able to distinguish themselves seems to them monstrous. Experto credo. These words are not written without warrant for them. Children must not have "too grand ideas." They must not think they are going to do this, that, or the other in the world. They must not attempt to cope with people who are born with silver spoons in their mouths. It is quite absurd to suppose that in their humble station there can be any of the stuff that makes men wealthy and eminent. It is heresy and wickedness to entertain such an idea. Now, strange as it may seem, there really are people in the world who bring their children up on these principles, who try to crush in its infancy every tendency their children may show to raise themselves in life, and after they grow up would rather see them starve than advance a sixpence to help them in quite legitimate aspirations. It is difficult to get to the bottom of the state of mind in which such parents pass their lives. It seems to be a social conservatism of the stupidest and narrowest kind, though such men are not generally political conservatives. The phenomenon is almost inexplicable, but it exists, if a phenomenon can be said to exist, and it is opposed to all the healthiest traditions of a free country.

USEFUL RECIPES.

BRAN BREAD.—Take a sponge of wheat flour; when it is light add salt, and a small quantity of molasses, stirring in bran flour with a spoon until it is as stiff as you can get it without taking the hands to it. When it has risen again, put it into well-greased pans with the spoon, and bake until done.

ANOTHER RECIPE.—Make a thin mush of a pint and a half of corn meal, and add to it 1 handful of salt; when milk-warm, stir in a wine-glassful of yeast, 1½ pounds of bran flour, and a table-spoonful of molasses; mix these ingredients well together, and, having the pan well greased, form a loaf on it. Let it rise, and bake a little longer than the same sized wheat loaf.

BEEF À LA MODE.—Select about 6 or 8 pounds out of the round, free of bone, and a tender, juicy piece. Cut gashes in it so as to go nearly all the way through, and insert strips of fat salt pork about half an inch in thickness. If possible, with your fingers pull the pork through on the under side. Put a little pepper and salt in the gash before the meat goes in. Rub all over the outside about as much salt and pepper as it would take to season it well. Tie as tightly together as possible with strong twine, making the meat as round and compact as you can. Allow 2 table-spoonfuls of whole cloves to this quantity of meat, sticking them on the outside. Some persons prefer the ground spice, rubbing it into the gash and over the pork before it goes in; but it destroys the lightness of the meat, and makes it dark. A few blades of mace stuck in are an improvement, and garlic, if wished. When the meat is prepared, put it into a large stew-pan, setting it on the back part of the stove, and adding no water, as the essence of the meat soon runs out. Let it cook slowly five hours, keeping it covered all the time, and turn it once or twice. When nearly done, pour over it 3 table-spoonfuls of lemon juice, and half a gill of strong brandy, basting it every few minutes. When done, remove the strings.

CORN GRIDDLE CAKES are delicious. Take the fine white meal, and stir rich buttermilk into it until it is almost the consistence of thin mush; add a little soda, and salt to taste. Have the griddle hot and well greased. Drop on a spoonful, and pat them down with the spoon, so that they will not be more than a quarter of an inch in thickness. When brown, turn them and let them brown on the other side. In eating them, split and butter. The great "knack" is not to have the batter runny, nor yet too stiff; just so that it will drop in a lump from the spoon.

BATTER BREAD.—One quart of buttermilk, ½ of a teacupful of boiled rice mashed, 4 eggs, yolks and whites beaten separately; white corn meal and flour enough to make a stiff batter—about one-fourth the quantity of wheat flour to the meal; salt to taste. Bake in a well-greased pan for about half an hour or three-quarters. The oven should be rather quick. Try it by running a straw through the cake to see if it is done.

ANOTHER RECIPE.—Into a basin break 4 eggs, having about a pint of meal in the basin; beat all well together, add a large table-spoonful of lard, salt to taste, and milk enough to make a stiff batter. Just before you pour it into the baking-pan add ½ of a tea-spoonful of soda dissolved in a little milk. All batter bread is nicer baked in a round pan than in either a square or oval one. It is also lighter baked in tin or iron than in a "Turk's head" of earthenware.

In winter a nice corn bread, very digestible, can be made with snow. Take about a quart of meal; into this stir well a tea-spoon not much more than half full of soda, and cut fine into it a table-spoonful of good suet lard; add a tea-spoonful of salt. Stir in nearly a quart of light, clean snow, doing it in a cool place, where the snow will not melt. Have an oval dripping-pan well greased, and when the snow is well incorporated with the meal pour it in. Bake it about forty minutes in a rather quick oven. The cake should be broken, not cut. Tear the pieces open with a fork, and butter them.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE really good, neat housewife takes a proper pride, when she leaves the house wherein she has abided one year or more, as the case may be, in putting every room—nay, every hidden nook and corner—in decent order for the incoming tenant. But, judging by this test, there are very few good housewives in our metropolis. The majority aver that all that is required of them is to leave the premises "broom-clean," and not one in fifty take the slightest pains to see that even this is done. The cart-loads of rubbish, the accumulation of years, taken from attics and cellars and dark closets of houses which have been occupied by respectable people, would horrify a neat New England housekeeper. We sincerely commiserate those of our readers—and we fear there are many—who have been in discomfort externally and vexation of spirit internally during the past week, while cleansing processes, which should have been completed under other supervision and before the 1st of May, have been going on about them. The tribulations of moving are annual, and, though the present ones will soon vanish, May, 1872, will come quicker than many desire. Meanwhile a good old-fashioned rule is worthy of being borne in mind until April 30, 1872. It is a simple one. It will save half the vexations attendant on moving. It is, in brief,

"Be you to others kind and true,
As you'd have others be to you."

The months of May and June are considered the best for making a trip to the Yosemite Valley, and travel thither has already begun. The number of visitors to the valley in 1870 was 1935; in 1864 there were but 147; this year there will probably be at least 2500. The short route from Stockton into the Yosemite this year is twenty-eight miles by railway, sixty-five by stage, and seventeen on horseback.

Some man altogether too curious in prying into family matters—which should always be regarded as sacred from the intrusion of the public eye—thus sums up the domestic happiness of the great city of London: Runaway husbands, 2348; runaway wives, 1132; married parties legally divorced, 4175; living in open warfare, 17,345; living in private misunderstanding, 13,279; living mutually indifferent, 55,340; regarded as comfortable, 3175; nearly happy, 127; perfectly happy, 13. To indicate the moral progress of man-and-womankind, we are reminded that there are thirteen couples in London more fortunate than Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden!

The dangerous illness of the beautiful Princess Frédérica, eldest daughter of ex-King George of Hanover, began with an accident which happened year ago last December. On Christmas-eve, 1869, she was fixing up a Christmas-tree for some poor children, when suddenly a green wax taper which she had lighted fell on her bare arm and burned her severely. Since that time her physicians have been unable to get the poison out of her system, and it is now believed that her life can not be saved.

Gloucester, Massachusetts, is in mourning on account of the probable loss of four fishing schooners and forty men. In February two fishing vessels from the same place were lost, which, with the probable disasters of April, give a total of six vessels and sixty-three lives lost.

Poor, mad, misguided Paris had no glorious Easter-Sunday. A sanguinary strife was going on in various sections of the terror-stricken city. Only a few churches ventured to open their doors for the services of the day, and in those singular scenes were enacted. A detachment of National Guards had been stationed in each, who remained quiet until after the offertory, when they marched up to the altars, arrested the priests, and seized the money on the offertory plates. During the previous Saturday night hundreds attempted to escape from the city—some by letting themselves down from the ramparts by ropes, others by bribing the sentries on duty at the gates. Many women are among the victims of this unnatural strife, not a few of whom have perished sabre in hand, and pistol in the belt of their uniform dress. The wretched condition of Paris can scarcely be imagined. Provisions are daily increasing in price; coal is becoming scarce; weeks ago not a postage-stamp could be obtained in Paris, and the postal department was in confusion; there were five hundred prisoners in the Conciergerie; no one could leave Paris without a pass, which needed to be renewed every day, at a cost of about forty cents, and these passes were granted only to particular persons; torpedoes have been planted and batteries erected in various quarters; ghastly sights of violence and murder are met with every where; houses are shattered, and choice gardens and parks utterly ruined. One might well inquire concerning Paris, as was once concerning Jerusalem, "Is this the city that men call the perfection of beauty—the joy of the whole earth?"

According to the most accurate calculations that can be made, the meat bill of New York city for the last year was $30,000,000, and the liquor bill $68,000,000. Ice costs the city $2,500,000 a year; and $7,000,000 are expended in theatrical and other amusements. Of the 163,598 children between the ages of five and fifteen, 78,450 are in Protestant Sabbath-schools. The statement has been made that the rum-shops of the city, if placed in line, would extend on both sides of Broadway from the Battery to the Central Park.

A young lady of Concord, New Hampshire, recently celebrated her first birthday anniversary by a party, at which were assembled about thirty ladies and gentlemen, varying in ages from three months to three years. At an early hour refreshments were served at two long tables, at which a couple of dozen of "high chairs" had been placed for the guests. The bill of fare was entirely satisfactory to all concerned.

A singular case was decided in the Supreme Court of this city, which revealed the funeral expenses of one woman to have been $1395 11. The executor of the estate had refused to pay the bill presented by the plaintiff, and the latter stated that during the last illness of the deceased she sent for him, and made specific arrangements about her funeral, and that he carried out her wishes. She had acquired her property by peddling dry-goods—owning wagons, and employing men to drive them.

A French fashion-writer says:

"The élite of our grandes dames who remained in Paris during the siege devoted themselves to the ambulances, and wore the costume of the ambulancières. This consisted of a gray dress, a white apron with bib fastened on to the bodice, a spotless muslin handkerchief crossed over the bosom and fastened behind, a little muslin cap with the national white, blue, and red cocarde at the side, and the brassard of the Société de Geneve on the arm. The Countess of Flavigny, one of our most celebrated élégantes, was at the head of the ambulanciers' committee, and, strange as it may sound to our friends over the sea, who are longing to hear of the new French fashions, neither that noble lady nor any of her companions wore any other dress while the city was invested. The fact is, French ladies are better than they are generally believed to be, and during the time of distress and famine, fashion and frivolities were set aside. Those ladies whose duties kept them at home, and who did not wear the ambulancière costume, were never seen but in deepest mourning. Black cashmere or dull silk costumes, trimmed with crape and jet, are even now almost the only ones to be seen in the streets of Paris. Black cashmere shawls are draped as mantles, looped up in several places with large fluffy tassels of black floss silk."

Only nineteen novels were published in France during the war.

There is much truth in the remark of a recent English writer that conversation at a dinner-table which is not general—conversation, so to speak, in which both ends of the table do not meet—is not conversation at all; yet the difficulty of attaining so simple an end has made many moralists declare that no dinner is endurable which consists of more than eight people. To extend it to twelve is to cut up your company into at least three sections; to venture upon eighteen is to reduce it almost to the atomic state—certainly to separate it into couples.

The sudden death of Charles, son of Victor Hugo, occurred at Bordeaux. In the morning he had breakfasted with his father and Louis Blanc. In the evening the former was to give a farewell dinner at a restaurant to some friends. At eight o'clock Charles Hugo took a cab to join the party, ordering the driver to stop at a café on the way. When the man did so he found that M. Hugo, who was alone in the vehicle, had ceased to exist.

Mormon physicians are under greater restrictions than those in the more—or less—enlightened sections of our country. They are forbidden, under penalty of $1000, and not less than a year's imprisonment, to prescribe any of the more powerful medicines without first explaining their qualities to the patient or his friends, and obtaining their unqualified consent.

No more need for making soap in Iowa City, for near there a mine of soap has been discovered. It is said to be a mineral substance, and to possess all the valuable properties of the manufactured article.

In a recent work on the medical jurisprudence of India authorities are brought forward to prove that the Brahmins invented the law requiring a Hindoo widow to burn herself on her husband's funeral pyre as a means of self-protection. Before its introduction the wives were in the habit of avenging themselves on their husbands for neglect and cruelty by mixing poison with their food; and at last things came to such a height that the least matrimonial quarrel resulted in the husband's death. It must be admitted that there is a peculiar refinement of cruelty in the expedient adopted, which would commend itself to the Asiatic mind.

It is estimated that more than 2,762,000 men were sacrificed to the demon of war from the year 1815 to the year 1864. During the civil war in America the State of New York alone lost not less than 48,950 men. Now a vast number slain in the late European war will swell the list of the lost in battle; and when the civil turmoil in Paris is over there will need to be a new catalogue made out.

THE FOUR-LEAVED CLOVER.

THERE was once a poor peasant youth living on the slope of a beautiful hill, who loved a pretty shepherdess who tended her flock far below in the valley, where the grass was greener than emeralds, where the sun came latest, and from whence it departed earliest. The pretty shepherdess used to raise her bright eyes toward the hill, and wish that she might dwell on its slope, and catch the sunbeams a little sooner and keep them a little longer; while the youth would gaze down into the pleasant valley, and think how wonderfully the sun illuminated it. But he had somewhere heard, or read, or dreamed that if one found a four-leaved clover he might wish for what he would and it should be his; good fortune should follow him all his days and bear him company. Therefore he gave his flocks into the care of a younger brother, and set off to find the four-leaved clover which was to endow him with all that was precious—riches, health, and a sweetheart; for though Corydon's heart was set upon Phyllis, the pretty shepherdess in the valley, he hadn't the smallest hope that she would take him as he was, never having asked her. So he took his way over hill and dale, through bush and brake, across loitering brooks and swiftly flowing rivers. He walked with his eyes on the ground, and the thorns tore his clothes, and his feet grew weary, and his heart heavy with seeking and finding nothing. At night he slept amidst the dew, and ate of wild, ripe berries, and of honey that the wild bees hoard. When, despairing, he shouted, "Where is my four-leaved clover, my four-leaved clover?" the echo answered, "Over! over!" and lured him on; and the mischievous winds borrowed the odor of distant clover fields and cheated him with hope close at hand; while the rain drenched him in a frolic, and the stars winked as if they were laughing at him. But still he pursued his search; he journeyed into far countries; he saw strange peoples and places; he was arrested for trespass, for vagrancy, for lunacy, and sometimes when he had managed to escape from confinement by promising his jailer a share of his good fortune when he should find the clover, then the fields were hidden under drifts of snow, or had just been mown, four-leaved clovers and all. Still he bent his steps through shadow-haunted woods, and slept in caves and on the edge of precipices, and heard wild creatures roaring in the recesses of the forest; and at length, after long, long years of search without success, he turned his face toward home. The sun was withdrawing from the green valley as he neared it, lingering only in long lines of light where it pierced through an opening among the hills, while the hills themselves were like shining goals. It seemed as if he had left it all but yesterday, for such secluded places change slowly. And were not these the same flocks that he left browsing on the slope? Were not these the same shepherds and shepherdesses reclining in the shade? Was not this his Phyllis coming to meet him after her day's toil? But when he put out his hands, and would have embraced her, she took refuge in the arms of a middle-aged, bronzed woman, who stood with sad, faded eyes, watching for her on the cottage threshold. "What would you, stranger?" she asked of the peasant, who was no longer a youth, but wrinkled and gray. "For shame, to fright my child with your unseemly ways! If you are hungry, come in and sup; and we will even give you a mat on the floor for a night's rest, and a pillow of fresh herbs."

"No, I am not hungry—not for food. I will even trudge up the slope to my cot." So he went on till he came to where the wild will of the mountain torrent had been tamed to do a good turn for its neighbor the mill; and the dusty miller standing in his door-way called out to him:

"Good-day, stranger. Whither are you bound, may I ask—on a pilgrimage to the stars?"

"Up the hill yonder, to my own people."

"Ay, then you're no stranger to these parts? Yet I've lived here, man and boy, fifty odd years; but bless me if I ever laid eyes on you before!"

"Like as not; it must have been a good spell since I left this place, though it seems but yesterday. Mayhap you have heard of one Corydon, who kept his flocks hereabouts?"

"Ay, ay, every body's heard of him. If a fellow does a foolish thing, they cry, 'Silly Corydon!' He was a hair-brained simpleton, who ran after a clover leaf. He left his flocks and sweetheart, and traveled after luck; but luck had the start of him. And then, to be sure, if luck won't come to you, say I, don't coax her, but wait a while. Now there's the torrent; when it sulks and dries up, and the mill's mum, do I toil up the hill yonder, and go to meddling with nature? Not I; she knows her business, and I know mine. I just sit down and wait, and watch the shadows and the clouds, and by-and-by there's a rush, and here's the torrent again hard at work, and the mill busy as ever! Ay, ay, Corydon was too much in love with luck, though he left behind him a sweetheart, Phyllis, who spoiled her eyes watching for him, and then married, for better or worse. You passed her cottage a short way back, there!"

"A bronzed woman, with gray locks and wrinkles? I should never have known her!" and then he picked up his staff and went on. He had not the heart to tell the miller that he was silly Corydon himself. By-and-by he drew up at his own cottage and looked in. The family were seated for the evening meal; his brother, a hale, hearty man, in the prime of life, with his smiling wife and rosy-faced children laughing like the water-brooks, and keeping up a cheerful din. It seemed to Corydon that he was gazing at the picture of what his own life might have proved had he not fallen in love with luck. The tears trembled in his eyes at the thought—at the remembrance of Phyllis in her bloom, of all he had lost, of the little gained; the tears trembled in his dim eyes, and fell, one by one, upon a four-leaved clover growing there beside his own door-stone!

THE LATE QUEEN OF SWEDEN.

THE late Queen, Wilhelmina Frederica Alexandrina Anna Louisa, Princess of Orange, and Queen-Consort to King Charles XV. of Sweden and Norway, was a daughter of Prince William Frederick of the Netherlands, who is uncle to the King of Holland. She was born August 5, 1828, and married in June, 1850. Her Majesty was much esteemed and beloved in Sweden as a good wife and mother and a gracious queen. Her health and strength had lately declined, and when she was seized with illness she could not throw it off. In December her mother, Princess William Frederick of Holland, died. At that inclement season the Queen had gone to be with her mother in her illness, when, her voyage and journey having been attended with much fatigue, the seeds of her last disease were doubtless sown. No sooner had she returned home than the King became seriously ill, when she attended on him night and day, and this performance of duty has proved too much for her, the husband and family having now to lament the loss of one for whom, it may be truly said, three nations mourn with them. The King was in a very feeble state; but he insisted on being carried to see the Queen before her death, when her daughter, Princess Louise, and her husband, the Crown Prince of Denmark, who had arrived from Copenhagen two days before, were also present. The Crown Princess of Denmark is her Majesty's only surviving child; the only other—a son—having died in early infancy. On the death of that son the King gave vent to his grief in a poem, which appears in his published writings. It may also be remarked that the Queen was an author of some repute, having, under the nom de plume of "Jane Voncome," published in Swedish a translation of an English work called "The Laborers in the Vineyard," of which the profits were devoted to charitable purposes.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S VISIT TO NAPOLEON.

IN the incident which we illustrate this week—the visit of the Queen of England to the ex-Emperor of the French—Queen Victoria has fulfilled one of the common courtesies of social life, not to say of imperial etiquette, in receiving the fallen monarch and returning his "call." She can afford to be even cordial with the ex-Emperor, seeing how unmistakably her sympathies during the war went with his enemy. King William himself was not less courteous and attentive to Napoleon after Sedan than the Queen of England after Wilhelmshöhe.

Yarn Basket with Point Russe Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS yarn basket, which Fig. 1 shows closed and Fig. 2 open, is made of pasteboard covered with white velvet and blue satin ribbon, and consists of two parts fastened together with blue silk cords, which at the same time form the handle of the basket. Cut of pasteboard from Fig. 29, Supplement, two pieces, and from Fig. 30 eight pieces. Cut these parts through to half of their thickness along the dotted line given, and bend them over there so as to form sharp corners. Cover the outer and inner sides of the ten pieces with shirting, and overseam the double material of the parts together at the outer edges. Always join one piece cut from Fig. 29, according to the corresponding figures, with four pieces cut from Fig. 30. To the upper inside edge of one (the under) half of the basket paste a strip of card-board three-fifths of an inch wide, so that it projects three-tenths of an inch. Then line the inner side of this half of the basket with blue silk (the latter must also cover the edge of the card-board on the inner and outer side), and sew through the inner and outer covering and the pasteboard at the same time, along the dotted lines given, so that the edges are marked on the inner side, taking care not to let the stitches show. Make the two holes indicated on the under half, excepting the middle hole, passing through the material several folds in thickness; run through each of these holes a piece of coarse blue silk cord eighteen inches long; untwist one end of this cord about four-fifths of an inch long, and spread it out on the outside of the basket next the hole, paste it there with mucilage, and fasten it also with a few stitches. The inside of the upper half of the basket is also lined with blue silk. Cover the pieces cut from Fig. 30 on the outer side of each half with white velvet, worked in point Russe embroidery with blue silk, as indicated on diagram of Fig. 30, Supplement. The threads spread out are braided, as shown by Fig. 1, so that a kind of wheel is formed. The still free parts of the under half of the basket are covered with two ribbons of blue satin of the requisite length and width, which cross each other at the middle of Fig. 29. Furnish the still free parts of the upper half with two ribbons of the same kind, allow them to project two inches and two-fifths at the under edge of this half, hem them down on the under side, and trim the sides and ends with blue velvet ribbon two-fifths of an inch wide. Trim the latter with steel beads as shown by Fig. 1, and furnish the under edge of each of the four ends of ribbon with a fringe of small and large steel beads, as shown by the illustration. Finally, make the three holes indicated on Fig. 29 in the upper half of the basket, and trim each hole all around with steel beads as shown by Fig. 1. When using the basket, the working thread is passed through the hole at the middle. Pass the still free ends of the cords through the two other holes, as shown by the illustration; lay the latter together as shown by Fig. 1, pass them through two ring-shaped slides made of steel beads, and furnish each end of the cord with a tassel of blue chenille and steel beads.

Footstool with Crochet Cover.

THIS round footstool is eighteen inches in diameter, and five inches and one-fifth high; the bottom and the sides are covered with black enameled cloth, and the top is furnished with a crochet cover of blue, red, green, white, black, and maize zephyr worsted. Begin at the middle of this cover with the blue worsted, making a foundation of 6 st. (stitches); close these in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and on this crochet four rounds of sc. (single crochet), always going forward; in the three first rounds work always 2 st. on each 1 st. of the preceding round, in the fourth round work alternately 1 sc. on the first st., 2 sc. on the following st., so that this round counts altogether 72 st. 5th round.—Alternately 2 sc. on the first 2 st., 5 sc. on the following st. 6th–8th rounds.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round, but 5 sc. on each middle st. of the 5 sc. worked on 1 st. 9th round.—Like the 6th–8th rounds, but work 4 instead of 5 st. on the middle of each 5 st. worked on 1 st. Cut off the blue thread at the end of the 9th round, and fasten it. 10th round.—Lay the white worsted on the point of the first scallop, and with this work 2 sc. on the 3d of the 4 sc. worked on 1 st. of the preceding round, then 1 sc. on each of the following 9 st.; work off the last of these st. with red worsted, which is here laid on anew, instead of with the white. * Pass over the two following st. of the preceding round (these form the hollow between two scallops), and work with red worsted 1 sc. on each of the following 9 st., 2 sc. on the following st.; work off the last of these 2 st. with the white worsted, which has been continued to this place on the under side of the work. Work with white worsted 2 sc. on the first st., 1 sc. on each of the following 9 st. Work off the last of these nine white st. with the red worsted, which has been continued on the under side. Repeat from *. At the end of the round join on the first st. of the same round with 1 sc., and work the first st. of the following round on the same st. It is to be observed that 1 sc. must be worked at the end of each round, and that the sc. of each preceding round is always left unnoticed. 11th–13th rounds.—Like the 10th round, thus always passing over the two st. in the hollow between two scallops (this kind of narrowing also takes place in each of the following rounds), and widening 2 st. at the point of each scallop; besides this the white st. must always come on the white, and the red st. always on the red st. of the preceding round. In this manner widen also in the 14th–20th rounds; work the 14th round only with blue, the 15th round with maize, the 16th round with blue, the 17th–20th rounds with red and white worsted like the 10th–13th rounds, but now work always the first 11 st. with red, and the following 11 st. with white worsted. 21st and 22d rounds with green worsted; in the 21st round widen 3 st. at the point of each scallop instead of 2 st., and in the 22d round again only widen 2 st. each, working on the point of each scallop 3 st. on the middle st. there. In the 23d and 24th rounds widen as in the 22d round, and work the 23d round with corn-colored, and the 24th round with green worsted. 25th round with green worsted, but widen 3 st. at the point of each scallop instead of 2. 26th–29th rounds like the 10th–13th rounds, but instead of working 11 white and 11 red st. always work 12 white and 12 red st.; widen and narrow as in the 10th–13th rounds. 30th round with blue worsted, but widen 4 st. at the point of each scallop, working 3 st. each in the red and white st. there. 31st round with corn-colored worsted without widening, but observing the narrowing previously done. 32d round with blue worsted, widening 3 st. at the point of each scallop. 33d–36th rounds with red and white worsted like the 17th–20th rounds, but widen at the point of each scallop, so that from one point to the other always 13 red st., 13 white st. are worked. 37th–41st rounds like the 21st–25th rounds. 42d–45th rounds with black worsted; widen 2 st. at the point of each scallop. Then embroider little dots with black worsted on the squares of one-half of each scallop, and work dots with corn-colored worsted on the black strips at the outer edge of the cover; fasten small green worsted tassels to the hollow between every two scallops. Finally, sew the completed cover on the footstool. Sew a few stitches with twine through the middle of the footstool so that a hollow is formed, and furnish this hollow with a flat ball of worsted.

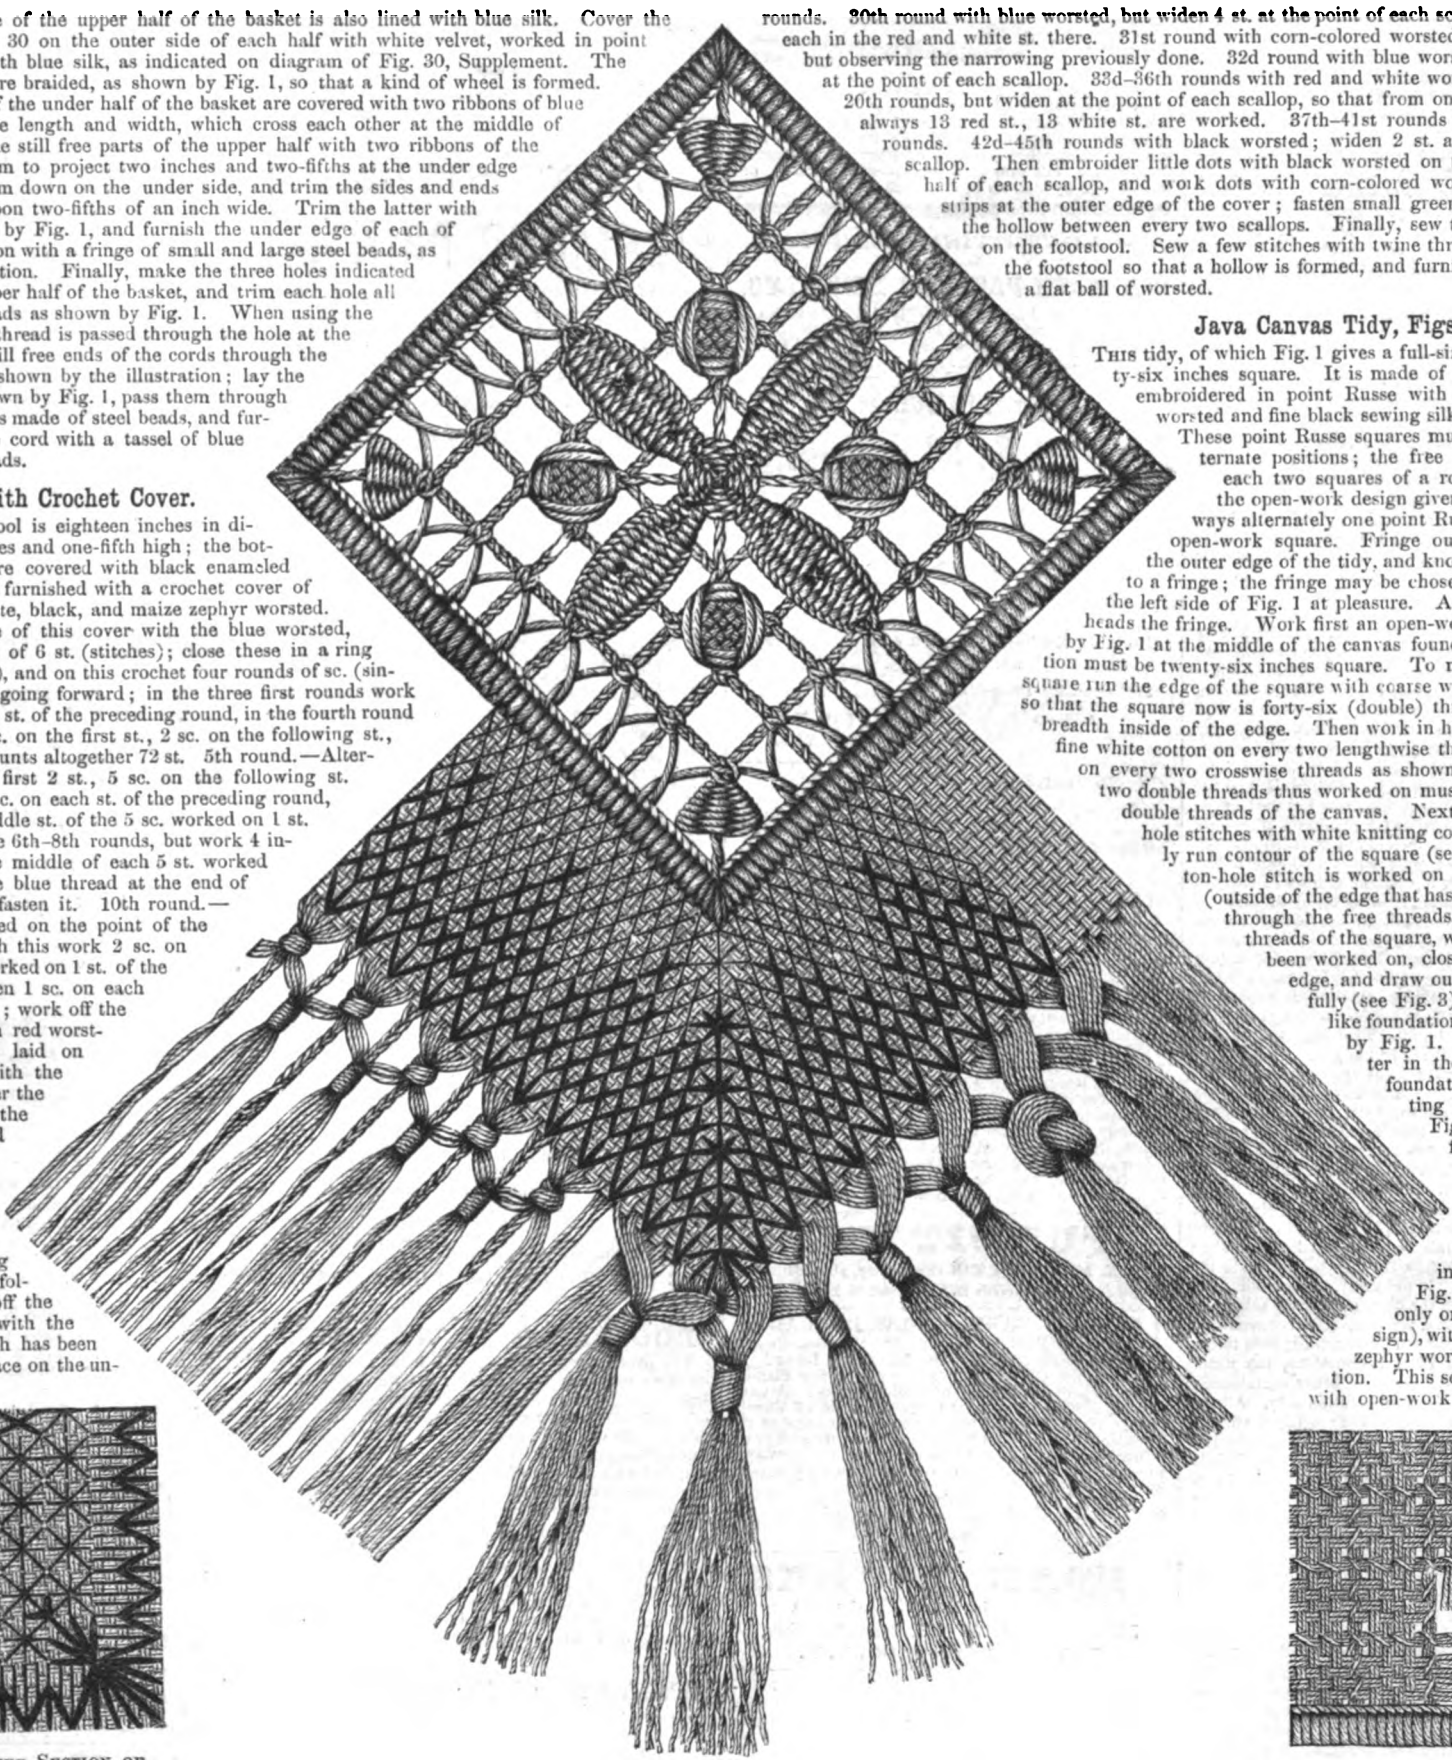

Fig. 1.—SECTION OF JAVA CANVAS TIDY.—FULL SIZE.

Java Canvas Tidy, Figs. 1–3.

THIS tidy, of which Fig. 1 gives a full-sized section, is twenty-six inches square. It is made of white Java canvas, embroidered in point Russe with black split zephyr worsted and fine black sewing silk in a square design. These point Russe squares must be worked in alternate positions; the free foundation between each two squares of a row is ornamented in the open-work design given on Fig. 1, thus always alternately one point Russe square and one open-work square. Fringe out the foundation at the outer edge of the tidy, and knot the projecting ends to a fringe; the fringe may be chosen of the right or of the left side of Fig. 1 at pleasure. A point Russe border heads the fringe. Work first an open-work square as shown by Fig. 1 at the middle of the canvas foundation; this foundation must be twenty-six inches square. To make the open-work square run the edge of the square with coarse white knitting cotton, so that the square now is forty-six (double) threads in length and breadth inside of the edge. Then work in half cross stitch with fine white cotton on every two lengthwise threads, and then also on every two crosswise threads as shown by Fig. 3. Every two double threads thus worked on must be divided by four double threads of the canvas. Next work close button-hole stitches with white knitting cotton on the previously run contour of the square (see Fig. 1); each button-hole stitch is worked on four double threads (outside of the edge that has been run); then cut through the free threads, between every two threads of the square, which have previously been worked on, close to the button-hole edge, and draw out these threads carefully (see Fig. 3), so that the trellis-like foundation is formed as shown by Fig. 1. Ornament the latter in the manner of a net foundation with white knitting cotton according to Fig. 1, which gives the full size of the foundation. All around and in connection with this square work four point Russe squares in the design given on Fig. 2 (the latter gives only one quarter of the design), with black silk and split zephyr worsted on the foundation. This square is again edged with open-work squares. Continue in this way until the tidy counts twenty-five squares altogether (12 point Russe and 13 open-work squares). Then edge the outer row of squares all round with the point Russe border shown by Fig. 1; fringe out the still free edge of the tidy, and with the projecting threads form one or the other of the fringes shown by Fig. 1. The illustration plainly shows how to make the fringe. Draw some of the canvas threads, which have previously been drawn out, through the corners of the tidy, so as to form small stars.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EMMA.—The Apron-Polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., the Postilion-Basque Suit in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., and the Short-Sacque Suit in No. 17 are all stylish models for black silk suits.

MOLLIE.—A solid brown over-skirt will look well with your dress. Trim the lower skirt with bias bands of solid brown.

KITTY STUART.—As you do not care to buy silk as costly as that you now have, get a long apron-polonaise of black and white striped silk, such as costs $1 25 or $1 50 a yard, trim with ruffles, and wear over your black silk skirt. Later in the summer you might wear black grenadine and white muslin over dresses. The cut paper pattern of Apron-Polonaise, illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., costs 25 cents.—We do not give addresses.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Put tapes in the seams of your skirt, or else loops, and fasten over buttons on the belt to drape it. Read "Girls' White Dresses" in Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV. Cut linen ruffles straight, and lay in flat pleats.

MOLLIE.—Send your money by postal order. We know nothing of the paste you mention, and do not commend cosmetics. Let your mole alone, or you may have something worse to deal with. The cheap silks are in all colors. Black and white are prettiest for suits. The stripe is the width of a pencil stroke.

STELLA.—Trim with bias folds of the same shade, piped with a darker shade. Two shades are prettier than three in a suit. There is no substitute for a black silk skirt under white muslins. Alpaca or tamise will not answer. The curls should not be made very wet, if you do not want them to curl tightly when dry. Make a postilion-basque of the organdy you mention, forming it of lengthwise puffs.

L. R. C.—Trim your checked silk with bands of maroon silk edged with narrow (imitation) black edging.

RUTH NONIS.—Get suits of summer silk like those described in New York Fashions of present Number. They are quite as cool as grenadine made over silk.

LAURA BLACK.—Iren barége or grenadine is the best thin material for mourning. Use the Apron-Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., and trim with folds of the same piped with mourning silk.

MENOY.—The suit you describe will be exceedingly pretty for a carriage costume in the city, and for watering-place wear. Chantilly lace is too pretty to be concealed under Valenciennes. Any ordinary blonde lace will do.

A CONSTANT READER.—For a white dress for your little girl to wear at a Sunday-school exhibition read "Girls' White Dresses" in Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV.

ZAYDEE.—Street dresses are worn moderately high at the throat. The standing collars pointed in front will remain in favor. Read "Tournures" in Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV.

MRS. L. R. A.—If your dress is for the house alone, a demi-train and basque are all that is necessary; if for both street and house, make a short skirt with over dress and postilion-basque. Use the cut paper pattern of Postilion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV.

INQUIRER AND OTHERS.—Correspondents frequently inquire how to preserve gold-fish in good health. In the first place let us dissuade any one from keeping gold-fish in a bowl with water only; this involves constant trouble in changing the water, the neglect of which causes disease and death to the fish, is any thing but pretty, and can offer little interest to the owner. Most people are alarmed at the name of an aquarium, but in reality the aquarium is far less trouble than the usual water globe. By those who have not the former, the latter can be utilized as an aquarium with little difficulty. Put about an inch depth of coarse, pebbly sand at the bottom of your globe. Procure a few weeds from a dealer in aquariums (who will tell you which are the best sorts), sink these, by means of a stone attached to the roots, in the sand, otherwise the movement of the fish may uproot them; then pour in the water; the sand should be well washed before being used. In a few days (generally less than a week) the weeds will begin to thrive; this will be recognized by their giving out little air-bubbles, which rise to the surface or cling to the leaves. Then only, and not before, is the time for putting in the fish. Of these the smallest are the best; the large ones are only suited for the large aquariums. The usual mistake is the overstocking of the globes. For the average-sized ones three, or at most four, small fish, about three inches in length, are sufficient. Fish require a certain quantity of air; this is supplied by the bubbles emanating from the plants. It is therefore evident that if more fish are put in than the plants can supply air for, the balance will be destroyed, the fish will perish, and the whole result be a failure. The usual mistakes are putting in the fish before the plants are ready for them, and then putting in too many. Never allow the bowl to remain long in the blaze of a strong sunshine. The best position is on a stand or table between two windows, or in a window not too much exposed to the sunshine. Following these instructions, the water never requires changing, a cupful being occasionally added to supply the loss by evaporation only. All the trouble of changing the water and feeding the fish is thus avoided, and the bowl and contents may be left to themselves. Avoid giving the fish bread, which is injurious. They require no food, but a thread of vermicelli, crumbled small, may be given them from time to time as a treat if desired. A bit of wash-leather tied to a stick should be used occasionally to clean the inside of the glass, and to remove the minute vegetation growing thereon. Some allow this to grow on the side turned to the light, to which it forms a natural screen and modification. A few water-snails will assist in keeping the interior clean. A fresh-water mussel may be added, and, if desired, one or two small water-beetles, procuring those only which are harmless to the fish. In bowls where the water has not been changed nor the fish fed for two years they are in excellent condition. A little care at first will insure success, and prevent all trouble afterward, except the occasional cleaning of the glass and addition of a little more water, as before stated.

E. J.—Make a black, brown, green, or plum-colored silk apron-polonaise to wear over your checked silk. See Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV.

A VIRGINIA SUBSCRIBER.—Make your blue muslin with a French waist, half-flowing sleeves, and demi-train trimmed with ruffles of the same. Plain belts will be more worn than sash ribbons. The Gored Wrapper pattern in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV., is used for thin wash goods. Read "Girl's White Dresses" in Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV. For a black net scarf get a yard and a quarter of net, gather it up together carelessly, almost forming a string, and wear it around your neck outside your collar and tie. Tuck the ends in your corsage if you choose. Some ladies use their black lace fichus and even small capes in this way.

OCCIDENTAL.—Read preceding answer. White muslin dresses have instead of sashes a sort of postilion of lace and muslin. See New York Fashions of Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV. White muslin over colored silk, with muslin flounces on the silk, either embroidered and gathered scantily, or else pleated and with lace, will be worn.

BLACKWOODS.—Get the new otter alpaca for your suit, and make by pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. Get a Swiss muslin over-skirt with bretelles to wear with silk dresses. For grenadine suits read Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV.

P. K.—Read "Piqué Suits" in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV.

DILEMMA.—The Worth Basque cut high in the neck, or the Postilion-Basque Suit, illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., will answer for your gray pongee. We can not from your description decide about your shawl.

DIAMOND D MOHAIRS.

LADIES,

It is a constant complaint among those who have traveled in Europe that they can not obtain an Alpaca which would wear like those they purchased in the Old Country. Such goods are not brought here, but, instead of them, inferior makes manufactured expressly for the American market, to look cheap under a high duty—fineness and weight produced by cotton and dressing, and lustre by hot pressing. You can not be blamed for selecting such goods. You have had almost nothing else offered you; and on a retailer's counter they are scarcely to be distinguished from the best goods; but they are scarcely out of the dressmaker's hands before the color is lost and the lustre gone. You need complain of this no more. In the Diamond (D) Mohairs you are offered the best Alpaca made in Great Britain. They only cost a few cents more than the trash that has hitherto been foisted on you. Made of the best wool, they do not lose their color or lustre. There is no dressing in them, and they will not crease. Water will not injure them, and they may be sponged off when soiled. Observe the Trade-Mark, and see that you get the right goods. Try this make, and you will find that for once you have a handsome dress that will remain handsome.

Sewing Machine Sales for 1870.
THE SINGER STILL TRIUMPHANT!

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY, at the World's Fair—constituted by the homes of the people—received the great award of the highest sales, and have left all rivals far behind them; for they sold, in 1870, one hundred and twenty-seven thousand, eight hundred and thirty-three machines, being more than forty thousand in advance of their sales of the previous year, and over forty-four thousand more than the sales of any other Company for 1870, as shown by the following figures from SWORN returns of the sales of Licensees:

THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY sold over the Florence Sewing Machine Co. . . .	110,173	Machines.
Sold over the Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine Co. . . .	98,943	do.
Sold over the Weed Sewing Ma. Co.	92,881	do.
Sold over the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Co. . . .	70,431	do.
Sold over the Howe Machine Co.	52,677	do.
Sold over the Wheeler & Wilson Manufacturing Co. . . .	44,625	do.

All of which is mainly owing to the popularity of what is known as the "NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE," which is now fast finding its way into every well-regulated household. For Circulars giving full particulars of Machines, their Folding Cases of many varieties of wood and finish, their Attachments for numerous kinds of work, which, till recently, it was thought that delicate fingers alone could perform, as well as particulars about all articles used by their Machines, such as Twist, Linen Thread, Spool Cotton, Oil, &c., &c., apply to any of their Authorized Agents, or to

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

APRIL, MAY, and JUNE purify the blood and beautify the complexion by using HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

In the Spring and Summer months the system undergoes a change. This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

A DESIRABLE HISS.

There is the hiss of ridicule, the hiss of scorn, the hiss of snakes in the grass; but the most delightful hiss is that of in the sparkling goblet, giving assurance to the invalid that his thirst will be deliciously assuaged; that his stomach will be refreshed and purified; that if he is feverish his body will be cooled by healthful evaporation; that if he is constipated the difficulty will pass away without a pang; and that if the condition of his general health is impaired it will be speedily restored. Of course, he will take care to procure none but the genuine.

FACETIÆ.

CAT music is done purpuss-ly, isn't it?

DRAWING-ROOM — Apartment of a dentist.

WICKED WASTE — Burning a candle at both ends.

Is it better for a man to die without a will or against it?

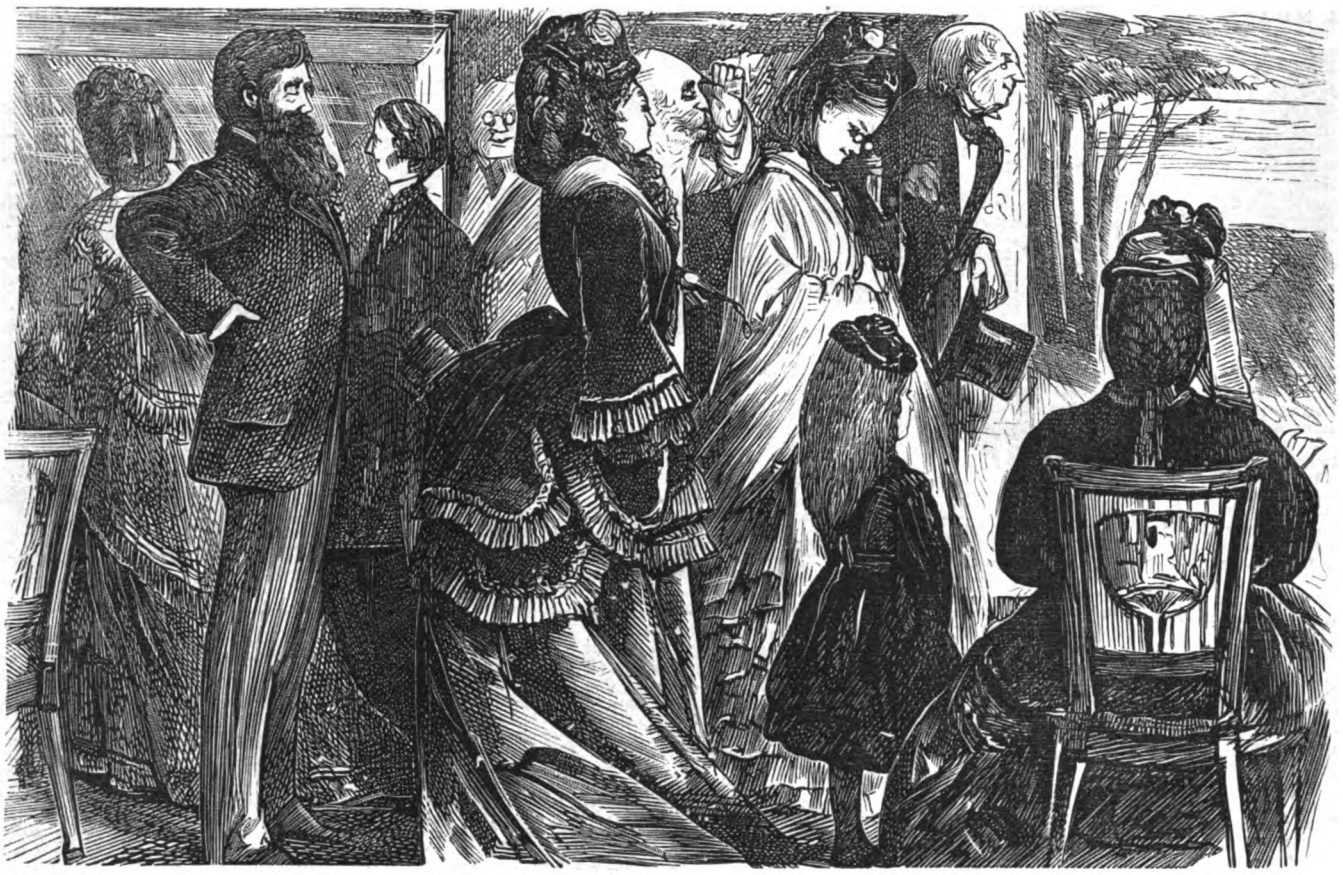
IN TERROREM.—The present state of affairs at Paris may be described as the Reign of Error. But it should be remembered it is within a "t" of being identical with the Reign of Terror.

FIRE OF IMAGINATION.—An enthusiastic young artist of our acquaintance never permits a fire to be lighted in his studio, because the warmth of color infused into his sunsets always keeps him in a glow.

A FAIR OFFER.—A quiet person, afflicted with a fearful cough, would be glad to part with it to any advocate for the "Redistribution of Property," and would willingly forego any claim to his share.

AN EYE TO BUSINESS.—Our doctor's front-door has not been properly painted, and ought, as his friends and patients tell him, to be done over again. But he declines to let it be touched, assigning as his reason that it looks professional, being "blistered."

A SEA OF TROUBLE.—A telegram from Paris, the other day, stated that "The exodus of families continues on a grand scale." We wish the people of the Parisian Exodus well out of their Red Sea.



THE "ROUND OF THE STUDIOS."

MALE DILETTANTE, No. 1 (making a telescope of his hand). "What I Like so much is that—er—that—"
DITTO, No. 2 (with his nose almost touching the canvas). "I know what you Mean—that broad—er—"
FEMALE DILETTANTE, No. 1 (waving her hand gently from right to left). "Precisely. That sort of—er—of er—of er—"
DITTO, No. 2. "Just so. That general sort of—er—of er—"
DITTO, No. 3. "Oh yes!—quite too Lovely—that particular kind of—er—of er—"

[And so forth.

IT'S ALL STUFF.—What is? Why, dyspepsia.

MAID OF MONEY—A spinster heiress.

FITS PECULIAR TO PROFESSIONAL PEOPLE — Benefits.

CAUTION TO THE FAIR SEX.—Ladies, when they lose their temper, are apt to show their age.

A DEPENDENT POSITION.—To be a great orator is a great distinction, but a successful public speaker pays heavily for his popularity, for how uncomfortable it must be for him when a whole assembly hangs upon his lips!

NEW MODE OF COLLECTING DATA.—An enthusiastic student of history, ancient and modern, who is determined to be well "posted" in chronology, is about to take a journey to the East to pick up dates.

HOW TO CHOOSE A PUPPY.—Sportsmen assure us that, in order to make choice of a puppy from a LUMBER of others, it is better to leave the choice to the mother herself. In carrying them back to their bed the first the mother takes up will be the best.

A HONEY-MOON BY PROXY.—There was a brilliant wedding the other day, and all parties accompanied the happy couple to the dépôt, where the new husband tenderly bade his wife farewell for the time, and she started off on a wedding-tour with her uncle. The gentleman's business would not permit his absence at this season of the year without incurring possible losses, and losing important business opportunities!

OUR PARISH FASHIONS.

1. Chapeau à la Butter-boat, with Parsley Trimming.
2. Chignon à la Rosbif.
3. Leather-Bag Panier (very useful to Traveling Ladies).
4. Neat Thing in Back Hair (a Chaste and Elegant Design, suggested by an Ornament for a Fire Stove).

THE MAN MOST LOOKED UP TO—The man in the moon.

MAIDEN RESOLVES — Dress, balls, courtship, and matrimony.

NATURAL SELECTION.—"Development of species!" said an old bill-discounter. "Don't talk to me about development of species. The only thing worth studying is development of specie!"

WAIT FOR AGES.

TOMPKYNS (who has three maiden cousins staying with him, and wants to fill up the census). "Come, ladies, I have been waiting an hour. Can't you contrive to remember your birthdays yet? Virgil was clearly wrong when he said, 'Facilis de-census.'"

RUDENESS.

YOUNG LADY. "You're the mail boy, aren't you?"
IMPUDENT YOUNG RUFFIAN. "Sure, miss, and it isn't the faymale boy you think I am?"

THE "DEAR" WILL KNOW.—"A Telegraphist" sends us the following: "Not long ago a respectable lady handed in at the head office in M—— a telegram for transmission to her absent partner. The message was found to contain twenty-two words. The clerk observed that by omitting two words the charge would be reduced nine-pence, and respectfully suggested that 'Dear Husband,' with which the telegram was prefaced, might be struck out. After some considerable hesitation the lady acquiesced, remarking, with real feminine penetration, 'Strike your pen through them, then; he will see at once that I have had the words written down.'"

CASE OF CENSUS CONSCIENCE.

CONSCIENTIOUS HEAD OF FAMILY (an old lady, giving the paper to English census enumerator). "Here is the paper, Mr. Accumulator, but I want particular to say something for the information of her Majesty, bless her heart, likewise her family. Which you see it says 'slept or abode'—and I wouldn't deceive her Majesty and her government on no account, and the fact is, that I didn't sleep a wink all the blessed night by reason of a tooth, which I hope you'll explain to the Queen, and say I couldn't have it took out on Saturday, as my dentist is of the Jewish persuasion, which I don't blame him for, quite the reverse, but I am going to him to-day to have it extricated, and so please to say that I only 'abided,'" etc., etc., etc.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.

What is the Matter? Why, Clara's new Chignon has come home half an hour before the Doddleson's Dance, and it is at least Five Shades Lighter than the Rest of her Hair.

A BIRD OF ILL OMEN—A swallow of brandy.

THE BEST REVOLVER OUT—The world.

"THE PACIFIC MAILS"—Quiet husbands.

What is that which must play before it can work?—A fire-engine.

The greatest "pain annihilator" in existence is said to be a boy who has smashed 1000 windows this year.

DINING AND READING.—A Jerseyman recently entered the dining-room of a first-class New York hotel, and on being presented with a bill of fare, said he would "eat his dinner before taking a read."

A paper recording the leasing of certain premises to a lady during the term of her natural life provides that she shall pay a certain rent yearly, and shall quit and deliver up "the premises to the lessor, or his attorney, peaceably and quietly at the end of the term."

A famous judge had a habit of begging pardon on every occasion. At the close of the assize, as he was about to leave the bench, the officer of the court reminded him that he had not passed sentence of death on one of the criminals, as he had intended. "Dear me," said his lordship; "I really beg his pardon. Bring him in."

MISAPPLICATION.

CLERGYMAN'S WIFE (who takes great interest in her Industrial School). "Jane Brown, I'm Sorry to Hear from your Mistress that you are not Diligent at your Needlework! Now, you Know who it is that 'Finds Work for Idle Hands to do?'"
JANE BROWN (artfully thinking to propitiate). "If you please, 'M, yeou dew, 'M!"

THE FATHER OF ALL CORN—Pop corn.

VISIONARY FRUIT — The apple of the eye.

A PLEA UNHAPPILY APPLICABLE.—Even the derided organ-grinder has his good points. He supplies to the pent-up poor one of the greatest luxuries of life—a change of air.

ECHO ANSWERS.—If all the world's a stage, and men and women merely players, where are the audience and orchestra to come from?

ARISTOCRATIC COLLECTOR OF ARTICLES OF VIRTU (to unsophisticated though wealthy parvenu). "Mrs. Figgins, this is a remarkably fine bust of Marcus Aurelius!"
MRS. F. "Is that the present marquis, my lord, or 'is father?"

A neighbor fairly posed us the other night by asking us the simple question, "When is a fish crazy?" and assured us it was only when the aforesaid fish was in-seine. We immediately left.

A young lady with a very pretty foot, but rather large ankle, went into a Broadway shoe-store to be measured. The admiring clerk, who is of Gallic extraction, complimented her in the following queer way: "Madame, you have one bootiful foot, but ze leg commence too immediately."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 21.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADIES' TRAVELING SUIT.

THIS light and tasteful costume is an admirable traveling, morning, or business suit, being easily put on and off, and unencumbered with over-skirt, belt, and elaborate trimming. It may be made of any material—serge, mohair, alpaca, poplin, cashmere, Japanese silk, linen, pongee, etc.—and consists of a skirt trimmed with folds of the material, and a tight-fitting over dress prettily draped at the sides and trimmed with folds and fringe. A graceful little pelerine, which may be worn or not at pleasure, serves to veil the figure. The illustrations show the suit with and without the pelerine. A linen duster, made from the pattern of Waterproof Cloak in Bazar, Vol. IV., No. 11, forms a useful adjunct to this convenient costume.

The cut pattern of this suit is published, as usual, in nine sizes—the even numbers only from 30 to 46 inches, bust measure. This measure is taken by passing a tape measure entirely around the body, under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises two articles, viz.:

tight-fitting over dress with pelerine, and short six-gored walking skirt.

OVER DRESS WITH PELERINE.—This pattern is in six pieces—front, side form, back, sleeve, pocket welt, and pelerine. The fronts are fitted with two darts and cross basque seam from the back dart to the seam under the arm. The back has side forms, and a seam in the middle, which extends down the entire length of the skirt. The over dress is fitted tight to the figure, and is nine inches shorter than the walking skirt in the back and eleven inches in front. To make it longer or shorter, add to or take from the bottom as much as may be needed, taking care not to alter the shape. The extra fullness in the skirt at the waist line at the seam under the arm is laid in small pleats turning under. The three pleats in the same seam, about eight inches below the waist, are laid in a cluster, one pleat overlapping the other. The perforations show where the pleats should be laid. The perforations in the front breadths show where to cut the slits for the pockets. The pocket welt is gathered into a narrow band at the top and bottom, thus forming a puff. The fronts are cut high and buttoned down the whole length. The coat sleeves are sewed plainly into the armholes. The perforations in the fronts, shoulders, under the arms, and pelerine show where the seams should be sewed. The over dress and pelerine are trimmed round the bottom with fringe and a bias fold of the material an inch and a half wide, with a narrow fold half an inch wide on each edge. This fold is set on an inch from the edge of the garment. The hem in front is allowed. An outlet of an inch is given for the seams on the shoulder and under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for the other seams. Baste up, and try on wrong side out before sewing the seams. Put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper.

Quantity of material, three-quarters of a yard wide, 8 yards.

Extra for folds, 1½ yards.

Fringe, 6 yards.

Buttons, 22.

SHORT SIX-GORED WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, two side gores, and full breadth for the back. Only half the pattern is given. The skirt is trimmed on the bottom with two folds, two inches wide, like those on the over dress. Lengthen or shorten the skirt at the bottom, taking care not to alter the shape. The notches show how to put the skirt together. Always join a straight with a bias edge.

Quantity of material, three-quarters of a yard wide, 8 yards.

Extra for trimming, 1½ yards.

ISLE OF YEW.

NAY, it may not be otherwise, darling,
For this chart of our life is true,
And every ship that saileth
Must touch at the Isle of Yew.

I know not when we shall reach it,
In a stormy day or fair,
Nor what of our priceless cargo
We shall under the yew-tree bear.

We shall land on the desolate island
Where only the yew-tree grows,
And our souls must bow in the shadow
That only the yew-tree throws.

"Certain?" Yes, darling, certain,
For this chart of our life is true,
And whoso hath said, "I love you,"
Hath sailed for that Isle of Yew.

MAY-DAY.

"IT is not always May." Nor is it always the poetic May in the calendar May. It depends very largely upon where you are, as well as upon when you are, as to what May shall mean to you. It is one thing in England; it is another in America. It is one thing in the country, and another thing in the city. It is one thing in any other city; it is another thing in New York. The climate of England makes the 1st of May appropriate for floral festivities. So, from CHAUCER, who, in the "Knight's Tale," says,

"Fourth goeth al the courte, both moste and leste,
To feche the floures freshe, and braunche and blome," to TENNYSON, who puts into the mouth of one of his little heroines this request to her mother, on the eve of the May-day,

"You must wake and call me early, call me early, mother dear;
To-morrow'll be the happiest time of all the glad New-year;
Of all the glad New-year, mother, the maddest, merriest day;
For I'm to be Queen o' the May, mother, I'm to be Queen o' the May,"

the English poets have glorified the beautiful month which one branch of the Christian Church has still further beautified for itself by consecrating it to remembrances of the Virgin Mother.

To those young people who have always lived in the country, and read English poems and English stories, May-day is associated with wreathed poles and arches and morris-dances, and the utmost hilarity and gayety. In some parts of America attempts have been made at imitations of these festive floralities. Schools go a-Maying; picnics and fêtes champêtres are in vogue; and for weeks pleasant anticipations are entertained of the delights of the coming May-day, on which eventful date some young germs of the sweet passion bud and burst.

But quite another thing is May-day in New York. It is the day of general moving. A large majority of people in this city live in hired houses; indeed, almost no one owns the house he occupies. Of those who are proprietors, some want to sell occasionally, and the day of transfer is usually the 1st of May, because, unless the purchaser be a foreigner or be boarding, he will have hired the house he now occupies until "the 1st of May." Houses in New York are ordinarily rented from May to May.

Two months before the moving-day your landlord desires to know whether you will continue. Of course he raises the price. Of course you do not wish to give more this year than you did last. You do not give an immediate answer. He affixes a card to the house, announcing that it is for rent. You cast about to see whether you can procure any thing so much cheaper as to compensate for the wear and tear of your furniture and the expense of removing. Perhaps you can not. Your landlord knows your difficulties. You must wear out your shoes and your patience in the search. In the mean time you must let your house be visited by hundreds and thousands of people, if your landlord's seductive advertisements bring so many to your door. They examine it all over carefully. Your inmost chamber must be as much laid open to inspection as the hall at the door. The fact is, you have your house eleven months, and endure torments one month, to make out the year. Then the servants are generally changed. They liked your house. It was near their church and convenient for their sweethearts, and had other attractions. But the house you have selected for another year has no such charms for them. Perhaps, therefore, they will hire themselves to your successor, and you may be able to stipulate with the domestics of your predecessor; but, as a general thing, every thing is astir, and the servants take a few wild days before settling down.

Then comes the fatal day, on which, almost invariably, it rains. As far as practicable you have arranged your drays and trucks for removal. You are up all night nearly, preparing for the exodus. After a short, hurried sleep, you find that day has begun to break, and so has every thing else. You are moving out; others are moving in. Your servants are crusty with the servants of the new-comer, and his truckmen quarrel with yours. Every body is nervous. Every body is hurrying. Your furniture is pitched about. Drays and wagons and trucks run against one another. Here is a crash, and there is a smash. There is enough loss of property in New York on the 1st of May to support a small village a year.

It is a day of worry, confusion, wretchedness. It stands midway between the month in which you have had weary searching for a house and the month in which you are to settle down into your new abode. It is a day of darkness and horrors, with no redeeming feature except in the discipline there may be in it to wean one from a world in which "we have no continuing city," and to make one long for the "everlasting habitations."

Those few people who have never moved—are living in the houses occupied by their fathers and grandfathers—know nothing of the distresses of our migratory population. We have told our sorrows, that our friends in the rural districts may have keener relish of their comforts. SHAKSPEARE never could have said about May all the beautiful things he has written if he had lived in New York, nor would MILTON have written his sonnet to May-Morning, and said,

"Hail! bounteous May, that dost inspire
Mirth and youth and warm desire."

We undertake to say that less courting is done in New York on the 1st day of May than on any other in the whole year. Lovers must keep away from their sweethearts who are then "moving," and perhaps no one in the whole city could honestly adopt the closing words of MILTON'S sonnet, and say,

"Thus we salute thee with our early song,
And welcome thee, and wish thee long!"

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Canaries and Hawks.

MY DEAR TIMOTHY,—If your wife keeps canaries in a cage in the dining-room, and has a flower-stand in a south window full of geraniums and azaleas, and other beautiful, odorous plants, with a superb calla standing in the centre, supremely pure, above them all; and if into this fragrant thicket, flooded with spring sunshine, she suffers her birds to fly at will as you breakfast on these lovely mornings, what a fairy scene it must be as the golden birds dart hither and thither—now pecking in the rich earth at the foot of a sturdy rose-bush, and now hopping from tender little branch to branch of geranium, and now pouring out an exquisite and penetrating song from the edge of a flower-pot! What emblems of delicate grace and beauty! what golden-winged songs they are! I hope, my dear boy, that you can spare time from the other warblers in the morning papers to observe them, and that the queen of your household has ordained that the breakfast is a feast which shall be consecrated to the family, and to fairy inspirations such as I have mentioned.

If you have faithfully observed the little songsters, and have been reproved in your soul by seeing what a sweet and simple and joyous life they lead, I fear that you have, on the other hand—for such is the weakness of human nature—taken great comfort in remarking upon other occasions that these graceful beauties, these golden-winged songs, fall into such quarrels, and ruffle up that brilliant plumage so sadly, and peck at each other so ferociously, that even the newspaper warblers seem no more discordant and disagreeable than they. I was recently in the room with such a bickering pair of songsters; and as one swelled upon the perch, and with ugly, fluttering wings looked down upon the party of the second part at the bottom of the cage, that wretched party seemed only less a termagant. And as the daughter of my hostess saw the vicious aspect of the upper bird she exclaimed, "Oh, mamma, Dicky looks just like a hawk, and not like a canary at all!" It was true. The absurd little bird had a ridiculous ferocity in his air and movement, and the lovely canary was quite lost.

But I went on thinking that if canaries could report all that they see, also, as they look out of the gilded wires of the cage or between the geranium leaves, they too could moralize. "We are poor little birds," they would say, perhaps. "We have nothing for it but to eat and drink and be as merry as we can, for to-morrow probably we die. But you people in muslin and broadcloth and tweeds down there at the breakfast-table, you make an immense assumption of something better than that. You have what you call minds and consciences, and moral laws, and aims in life, and characters, and a great many other fine-sounding things; but as we are veracious birds, if you sometimes think that we are hawks and vultures, so are you, much too often, bears and sloths and mules and wild-cats." Why, my dear Timothy, scarcely had the hostess's little girl remarked that the canary looked like a hawk than my young friend, the host, glared across the table at his wife, and said so sullenly that it was too bad he never could have sugar enough in his coffee that I was fain to be very busy indeed with my muffin, and not observe the family by-play.

But I could not help seeing his face, and I could no more recognize in it the usual good-humor of my friend than his daughter could discover the canary in the apparition of the hawk upon the roost. And on the very same day I was at another house, in another family, where I am quite at home, and suddenly, instead of my courtly friend—an accomplished man, whom I do not name—I saw a monkey grinning and chattering as if I had been in one of the African forests of which Mr. Du Chaillu tells us such interesting stories. If, then, a canary may conceal a hawk, what wild beast may not we conceal, Timothy? And if all is but as it seems, as many poets and philosophers assert, who is who, or, rather, who is what, and what is who? For which was the real thing upon the perch, the hawk or the canary? It is extremity and intense feeling that try us and reveal us. Do you remember those fascinating and haunting lines of the song in Dickens's "Little Dorrit?"

"Who passes by this road so late?
Compagnon de la Majolaine!
Who passes by this road so late?
Always gay!"

And the echoing answer of Jean Baptiste:

"Of all the king's knights 'tis the flower,
Compagnon de la Majolaine!
Of all the king's knights 'tis the flower,
Always gay!"

And in bonds and pain, and on the edge of horrible death, is the flower of the king's knights gay? Then he is the flower of knights—as Philip Sidney was, calling for music at the last. So, at sea, in the sudden and awful storm, if the cheerful friend is cheerful still, then it is the divine sun that has always shone in his face and in his ways. That canary, at least, is no hawk, and goes singing into rest because his soul as well as his body is golden. Or, to take it in quite the homeliest way in which quality is tried, if Alonzo, who is so attentive, so courteous, so kindly to the king and the queen, and the bishop and the lord chief justice, to Shakespeare and Raphael and Mozart, is equally gentle and thoughtful to Buttontwitcher, that horrible bore, he too is the flower of knights. He is not a hawk, but the canary he seems. For, Buttontwitcher is the test. If Alonzo really be a hawk, he will tear that hapless creature limb from limb.

So you see, Timothy, one of the most pleasing excitements of human intercourse is the wonder what we all are. Here is a very fine display of apparent ladies and gentlemen—at least men and women—but the point is to know where that appearance is a mere disguise. How many apparent gentlemen do I see on Broadway, and a glance informs me that they are professional scoundrels! How many richly dressed and graceful apparent ladies do I not meet—and they are not ladies—in every degree from vulgarity to sin! Really, my dear Timothy, if you sit at the breakfast-table and look long enough at the canary cage, life becomes a masquerade, beginning with that innocent little hawk upon the perch. And how constantly the consciousness of this fact is revealed in literature! What a pathetic story it is of the sweet young bride, so soft, so sinuous, so purring upon her husband's arm, when a mouse runs across the floor, and lo! my lady is on all-fours in a moment, and the hapless husband sees that he has married a cat! For many a month afterward he may see only apparent soft womanliness and confiding grace; but, alas! the softer she is, the more silently gliding, the more gracefully bounding, only the more fearfully feline, the more a cat is she!

And the other tale of Melusina, is it only a fable? She is a mermaid, who marries a man, and is a happy mother. Fancy the pleasant evenings, the round games—bezique, perhaps, or the simpler muggins. And she is careful of the dear children's clothes; and what fluffy hair they have! and what broad and beautiful ties behind! And how particular about the baths of the darlings! Water, water; they must have water—if they die for it, as I know, wicked Timothy, you think so many children do! Do you see the delightful household, the shaded lamp at evening upon the centre-table, the books all around the room, the happy father, the lovely mother, the eager children? And on one luckless Saturday what evil spirit brings the husband home before his time, and reveals to him his wife a mermaid—the partner of his bosom terminating in scales? I have never done lamenting with that unfortunate gentleman. I have no patience with the commentators who assert that the scales were only vocal, and that Melusina was not a mermaid, whisking a fish's tail, but only a prima-donna twirling a roulade. It is a mere subterfuge to declare that both would be equally appalling to the husband. My conviction is unshaken; for, Timothy, if a canary can be a hawk, and if some apparent women whom I know can be dolls and cats, why should not other women be mermaids once a week?

Or, to go back to Homer, what was Circe but a most maligned lady, and her house the palace of truth? Is she to be held up as a mythological monster because, under the strong cordial of her conversation, men appeared to be what they really are? Certainly, when I have sometimes been dining in company with Porcus, I have felt that it would be a very great relief to the general self-respect of the guests if he would only assume his real form, which was so caricatured by the clothes in which he was dressed. And when I have seen young Steadytoes bewitched by Papilla, and following her, fascinated, into every kind of folly, I have often wished that she would drop the human cocoon in which she is involved, and flutter away before him the light butterfly she really is. If Porcus and Papilla were the guests of Circe that transformation would occur, and the truth would appear. I know no lady more maligned than she. The story says, forsooth, that she tried her arts upon Ulysses, and could not degrade him to a beast. What bitter injustice! For what is plainer than that, perceiving him to be a man, and not a pig, nor a horse, nor an elephant, nor a dog, like so many who wore the form of men, she naturally loved him, and would fain have married him.

Well, my dear Timothy, when the canaries look out at us and we look in at them, if they pity us that, since we claim to be men and women, we are so often something very different, we can also pity them that, if they are really hawks and vultures, they can never divest themselves of that ferocity, and become only sweet little canaries. But we can. Even Porcus need not despair. If we are conscious that we are bears and tigers under our waistcoats, we can, by sturdy determination, make ourselves men and women only, so that, should the clothes suddenly be torn from us, no beast would be revealed. That feline bride might have conquered her taste for mice, and the moment of victory would have made her wholly human. And if the poor Melusina had only avoided baths on Saturdays, how the unhappiness of a worthy family would have been spared! You remember how it was in Circe's palace after Ulysses proved to be a man only. He besought her to restore his fellow-mariners to their human forms, and for love of him she did it. And what does that mean? It means that love undoes the beast in a man. It develops and exalts all that is most human and ennobling. And so, my dear boy, is it with all generous resolution and good purpose. Whenever the bear in you thrusts his muzzle out from your waistcoat, or the mule in you tries to plant his feet in place of yours, or the peacock would spread his tail and cry hoarsely to call attention, or when any other form of bird or beast insists upon appearing in your stead, then, my dear Timothy, with all your noblest force stand to yourself, and prove, by annihilating the beast, that it is not really you!

Your friend, and I had almost said, and pastor, AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

TRAVELING DRESSES.

LADIES are busily preparing outfits for the summer sojourn in the country, or for flitting about from one place to another in search of health and amusement. The traveling dress is one of the first necessities of a summer tour, and many things are to be taken into consideration in selecting it. In the first place, it must be made of a fabric that will not rumple easily, or be defaced by dust, or cockle from dampness; secondly, the design of the costume must be plain yet stylish, convenient to put on and off hurriedly, and capable of being adapted to different temperatures—for cool mornings and warm noons alike. Such a costume is illustrated on our first page. The plain skirt is trimmed with bias bands of the material or of silk, and the long over dress is of simple construction, without the elaborate drapery that is so easily crushed, hanging plainly and straight behind—a fashion that many modistes commend now for their choicest garments. This over dress has the waist fitted over a lining close to the figure, like an ordinary basque. It is furnished with whalebones, buttoned up the entire front, and dispenses with a belt and sash bow. A seam passes down the centre of the back; two buttons may be placed in the back on the seams of the side forms. The skirt of the over dress is not lined. Coat sleeves with plain bands around the wrist, or extending up the outer seam, are most suitable. The neck is cut high about the throat, and merely corded or bound, without a standing band. A straight opening trimmed with a band of silk, with the pocket set underneath, is the safest and most convenient pocket. The graceful little pelerine requires to be fitted with great care, or it will look either very dowdy or very prim. It should reach just to the waist in front, round up slightly above the elbows, and curve almost to a point behind, but must not be pointed straight like a kerchief. It should be lined throughout with some soft stuff, such as farmer's satin—the twilled lining seen in gentlemen's coats. The suit is complete without this pelerine, but it will be convenient for extra warmth on cool evenings, or to conceal the figure. Many ladies who always require some loose wrap on the street, having discarded loose paletots, are adding these pelerines to street suits. A costume of grisaille silk lately seen on Fifth Avenue was made like our model, the cape being ornamented by a suivez-moi of three streamers of gros grain ribbon, held by loops attached to the back of the neck. The Watteau fold is sometimes attached to pelerines, but this is not generally becoming, as it makes the figure look round-shouldered.

To return to fabrics for traveling attire, pongee poplins are found to be more serviceable than any other goods. Soil may be wiped off them, water does not cockle them, and it is scarcely possible to wear them out. English mohairs also wear well, and the chêné gray stuffs, that are of mixed wool and cotton, with a little silk to strengthen them, not worked up on the outside merely to give a glossy surface. The preference this year, however, is for soft, flexible stuffs that drape like cashmere. Thus twilled foulards, French merinoes, and cashmere over dresses of clear gray or Frou Frou brown, with black or brown silk skirts, are desirable traveling costumes for Northern trips, to the sea-side and mountains, or for long overland journeys. The twilled foulard is $1 25 a yard in various quiet shades. It is considered very stylish in tea-color and olive tints, but it is not so durable as the wool serges of light quality with broad twill, like the diagonal cloth worn by gentlemen. French poplins, the real India pongees, and the undressed silks described in last week's Bazar, are the materials for handsome traveling costumes for brides. For an ocean voyage suits are made of the English water-proof, far finer than that of American manufacture, of light quality yet impermeable, and in the stylish plum and brown shades.

Costumes for short trips and excursions are made of thick brown undressed linen, and of the lighter buff and gray batistes, with long over dresses trimmed with guipure lace of the color of the linen, or else with strips of white embroidery on jaconet or cambric. The skirt may be of the same material, or of black or brown silk.

Large overalls of dark gray or brown linen, worn to protect handsome traveling suits, are voluminous enough to entirely conceal the dress beneath them. The best model for these is the pattern of the water-proof cloak illustrated in Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV. These dusters cost at the furnishing houses $5.

Straw gypsies, colored gray or brown to correspond with the suit, gros grain ribbon trimming, and a long veil of Donna Maria gauze, are the bonnets chosen at present for traveling. In midsummer broad-brimmed flats will be adopted. The sides are bent down in gypsy style by ribbon strings that pass over the crown; the front and back stand out prominently. This shade-hat is serviceable, and is capable of looking very picturesque, though in many cases it is more like an absurd caricature, or a copy of the hats worn by our grandmothers.

Linen collars ornamented with beautifully shaded needle-work, done in French convents, and under-sleeves with square cuffs, fastened by three linen buttons, are the sets shown for traveling. The collars are the English style with standing band, pointed in front, and a modified sailor shape. A neck-tie of soft twilled silk of pale color, tied in a sailor knot, accompanies such collars. Kilt-pleated muslins are basted in the neck and sleeves of suits for very young ladies. These sheer muslins are more becoming to the complexion than linen, and are so neat and plain that they are not too dressy for traveling. Undressed kid gloves without fancy stitching, and with long wrists fastened by two or three buttons, complete the traveling attire.

A water-proof cloak, or an ottoman repped shawl in stripes of shaded gray or black and white, should always be carried by travelers. Leather straps with a handle are provided for holding these when compactly folded. Ladies who are fond of needle-work embroider these straps in gay-colored wools on black grounds. Light canvas bags, gilt mounted, with Russia leather handles of rich russet-color, are the favorite traveling sachels: they cost from $5 to $9. When leather bags are used, those of maroon-colors are preferred to the light cuir-color, which is so easily soiled, or to black, which is apt to turn rusty brown.

CRETONNE COSTUMES.

Cretonne costumes are the novelty of the season. These were introduced late last year at French watering-places, and are now brought out here at a French house. They are intended for country wear only, and are made of the chintz-figured cretonnes used for upholstering furniture. The grounds are black, olive, dove, or light buff, with large, brilliant-colored flowers and figures. They are made with a ruffled skirt and polonaise edged with white muslin pleatings, and caught up by large bows of black velvet. A single costume is marked $70.

PARASOLS.

The parasols used this year are umbrellas in size, large enough for protection against sun and shower. They are of silk or pongee, with merely a band of a darker shade bordering the edge, or else are deeply fringed. There is a fancy for white handles, either of enameled wood or of polished bone or fine ivory. Straight smooth sticks are used instead of the fancifully carved ones of last year. Rose-wood and partridge-wood sticks, with a knob or cross at the end, are also pretty. Carnelian handles are on the English umbrellas of blue and plum-colored silk. Louise blue and purplish plum-color are the favorite silk umbrellas with young ladies, especially blondes, and are much admired with black or white suits. They are used on all occasions except for full dress. They cost from $7 upward. Dove gray and brown silk umbrellas are used by ladies of more quiet tastes. The serviceable pongees, twilled like serge, are shown in buff, brown, tan, white, and all the various gray shades worn for costumes. The lining is of any becoming color, and the sticks are plain bamboo. Camel's-hair tassels ornament the top. These serge pongees may be scoured, but the plain foulard often sold for pongee is not serviceable, sometimes splitting in the gores before the first season is over. Plain buff cambric parasols, with scalloped edges and silk lining, are preferable to foulard, and are much used at the sea-side: price $3 50. Black silk parasols, with colored linings, are chosen by elderly ladies.

A novelty of the season is the Saratoga umbrella, with Alpine stick. The substantial handle is tipped with gilt or finished with ivory, and when the parasol is closed, serves as a walking-stick to assist the rambler in country excursions. Though designed for use out of town only, they already appear daily on the city promenade. Made of serge pongee, deeply fringed, with silk lining, and handle of dark wood tipped with ivory, they cost $7. Handsomer ones, in special shades of gray to match costumes trimmed with black, have black lining and handle, and cost $7 50. Plainer pongees, without fringe, have colored borders and whitewood or else bamboo sticks. They are also beautifully made in colored silk with Swiss muslin covers, edged with fluted ruffles, and sometimes with narrow lace. These are to be worn with the costumes of colored silks under polonaises of white muslin designed for the watering-places. With a Swiss muslin hat to correspond, this is a lovely suit for a fair young girl.

Small parasols of white silk under black lace covers are the choice for ceremonious visiting and other dressy occasions. The lining is of any becoming color, and the stick is of carved ivory, or else an imitation of it in bone or enameled wood. The lace cover may be bought separately, in llama or real thread, and the favorite design, a pyramidal figure in each gore, is seen in lace of all qualities. Reversible parasols, closing with two springs, so as to bring the lining on the outside if wished, are stylish and convenient. The lining is sewed smoothly into the seams with the outside; and the parasol is flat on the top, except in the centre, thus presenting a greater surface to the sun's rays.

PERSONAL.

THE "Hurricane" and "Briarfield" plantations in Mississippi, formerly occupied by JEFFERSON DAVIS and his brother, JOSEPH E. DAVIS, are now owned by BEN MONTGOMERY, the favorite freedman of the latter, who gave for them $300,000, payable at the end of ten years (January 1, 1876). BEN, who is very black, but well educated, welcomes guests of distinction and waits upon them at table, but does not take a seat himself. Last year BEN made 2500 bales of cotton and much corn. J. D.'s former slaves on these places greet him with all the warmth of affection they are capable of expressing.

—The art fever seems just now to be especially prevalent among our millionaires. Mr. CORCORAN, whose superb gift of an art gallery to Washington will forever keep his name in pleasant remembrance in that city, has found an emulator in Mr. T. M. ALLYN, of Hartford, who recently purchased for $10,000 CHURCH'S superb picture of Jerusalem, as the nucleus for an art gallery of imposing dimensions in Hartford, intending to make it one of the finest in the country.

—HEDWIG RAABE'S wedding with NIEMANN, the best tenor in Europe (he's coming here next autumn), had this pleasant little incident: the mighty Emperor of the Russians sent her, as a bridal present, a pair of bracelets worth 10,000 rubles.

—The Austrian Emperor made some of his loyal subjects feel spiteful because he refused to reverse the decision of his cabinet that no celebration in honor of the German victories should be had. "We are in Austria, not in Germany," said F. JOSEPH; "therefore we will not jollify."

—General CLUSERET, who was lately the prime agitator and leader of the Communists in Paris, has a peculiar talent for being in turmoils. While in this city he was always "at it." In 1864 he edited the New Nation, a paper published in the interest of General FREMONT, and wrote "slashing" articles in French, which were translated for that organ of opinion by the late Mr. LEANDER STARR. FITZ HUGH LUDLOW aided in making the paper; but as there wasn't enough necessity for it to live, it died. The General used to live in a cheap, Bohemian sort of way over the paint-shop at the corner of Fourth and Mercer streets.

—As evidence that Kaiser WILLIAM has feelings, this is said: After reading the dispatch announcing that the French Assembly had ratified the treaty of peace he whispered, with tears in his eyes, "This is the birthday of my mother, LOUISA!"

—The Countess DE MONTIJO, EUGÉNIE'S mother, is in Madrid, where many shoulders that are cold are turned toward her. Having no longer an empress-daughter, the Spanish aristocracy do not greet her with effusion, as they used to do.

—Hon. J. PROCTOR KNOTT'S humorous speech in the House of Representatives on Duluth has been so thoroughly appreciated by the citizens of that place that they have named one of its streets "J." Street, another, "Proctor" Street, and another, "Knott" Street. The force of naming could no further go.

—Mrs. FAWCETT, the young wife of the distinguished Professor of Political Economy at Cambridge, and M. P. for Brighton, is creating great enthusiasm on her lecture tour throughout England. She is beautiful, and possesses a voice so sweet that it can find its way beneath the "iron-clad diaphragm of a conservative." She has studied law, and knows law.

—The Rev. Dr. TYNG, of whose fiftieth anniversary as a clergyman we made a note two weeks since, has during his ministry delivered 10,000 sermons, received 3000 persons into the church by profession, and had 25,000 children under instruction in his Sunday-schools. He has prepared fifty young men for the ministry. His congregations have contributed over $3,000,000 for benevolent purposes, and paid $600,000 for building four churches and six chapels. Truly a remarkable man and a remarkable history!

—Miss HARRIET HOSMER is as successful as ever at Rome, and made much of by those who like clever people. Notwithstanding her professional chiselings and her love for horses, she is neither masculine in mind nor in personal appearance. She is young and attractive. Her fair hair, bright eyes, expressive face, and graceful figure would make her noticeable as a charming woman in any society. She is full of fun and witty sallies, frank and pleasant in her manners, looks so well, converses so well, and dresses so well that she wins the good opinion of every body.

—CHARLES TAPPAN, brother of LEWIS and the late ARTHUR TAPPAN, is now eighty-seven, and on a visit to Brooklyn. He trudges about with the elastic tread of a man of thirty; is a gentleman of fine culture, cheerful and happy, has remarkable social gifts, and as a teller of stories has few equals. He has been abroad several times, his last visit having been made a year ago. He made up his mind about it in five minutes, and started alone. After traveling several months he returned in fine health and spirits, and said he was ready for another journey around the world.

—An American gentleman who by chance saw LOUIS NAPOLEON on the occasion of his recent visit to Queen VICTORIA, says he was not a little surprised, after reading the lugubrious statements of newspaper correspondents describing him as broken completely in health and spirits, to see a quiet, gentlemanly man spring out of the car with an elastic step, bowing and smiling graciously to the few persons privileged to meet him, among whom were the Viscount SYDNEY, Lord Chamberlain, whom the Queen had deputed as her representative to receive him. He seemed in excellent health and spirits, and much younger in appearance than the American gentleman had expected. The American gentleman did not see the sinister expression of face so frequently attributed to L. N., nor any thing that indicated an unusually crafty, unprincipled, ambitious man.

—The daughter of THACKERAY, who still writes as a maiden, in the magazines, is the wife of Mr. LESLIE STEPHENS, editor of the Cornhill Magazine.

—Something new is on the tapis at Washington. BALTAZZI EFFENDI, the Turkish chargé d'affaires at Washington, has presented to President GRANT a magnificent carpet, manufactured expressly as a gift from the Sultan to this government, and designed for the East Room of the executive mansion. The present has been accepted. It was made at the imperial factory, and was a year in preparation. Red and blue are the prevailing colors. It weighs 1500 pounds, and is worth from $9000 to $10,000.

—The most pecunious of all the aspirants for the throne of France is the Duc d'Aumale, who has an income of about $500,000 per annum. This fortune he inherited from the Duc de Bourbon (father of the famous Duc d'Enghien, murdered, it is believed, by Madame DE FEUCHERS, who, being English, could not inherit her aged lover's landed property.

—Is there any body to believe this story, related in a private letter from London? About ten years ago a young American from New York—WALTER HASTINGS by name—dining in London in company with Lord C——, expressed the opinion that solitary confinement in a dark cell was not so dreadful a punishment as had been represented. His lordship—so goes the tale—offered HASTINGS £10,000 if he would undergo entire seclusion for ten years. The proposition being agreed to, a cell was fitted up in Lord C——'s town house. It was from twelve to fifteen feet square. The prisoner was to be allowed candles, a few books, writing materials, plain food—the latter served by a man who was not to be seen. In this way HASTINGS has been living for a decade of years, his term expiring about the 1st of the present month. He is now released, and has received, we suppose, his hard-earned money. He emerges from his dungeon in rather a dilapidated condition, appearing, though only thirty-five, like a man of sixty-five years of age, his frame stooping and his steps tottering, his face sallow, his hair and beard white, his voice tremulous, and his speech hesitating. The question is, who is WALTER HASTINGS? And why, during all this cheerful seclusion, has no relative of his ever been interviewed? and how has it been kept out of the papers?

—Mr. ROBERT LENOX, whose recent munificent bequest for a grand library far up town, has been recently made the topic of laudatory editorials, is utterly averse to having his house invaded by people, no matter how clever or famous, who are curious to inspect the treasures of his library in Fifth Avenue. An anecdote illustrative of this disinclination is told, in which the name of HENRY WARD BEECHER is mentioned. Some time ago this gentleman is said to have desired to gain admission to the library, to consult a rare volume which could only be found there. The person in charge told him that admission was impossible, and that the owner could not be seen by any body. BEECHER, however, desired him to take his card to Mr. LENOX, which was finally done. "BEECHER!" said the scholarly hermit, as he looked at the card. "Who is this man? I have never heard of him. Give him my compliments, and tell him the library is not open to visitors."

—Mr. Surrogate HUTCHINGS has quite opened the eyes of the bar by announcing that henceforth he will, excepting in cases where it would be obviously proper to do so, make no allowances to counsel employed to contest the probate of wills. His reasons, given in a recent decision in the TAYLOR will case, are clear and conclusive, and will, as they ought, have the effect to deter litigation on the part of persons who, not having been "remembered" in a will, choose to consider that the testator was therefore so far insane as to be incompetent to devise his estate.

—Colonel J. WARREN SCOTT, who died in New Brunswick on the 27th ult., at the great age of ninety-three, was, when in his prime, one of the remarkable men of New Jersey. He was the contemporary and peer, at the bar, of SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, THEODORE FRELINGHUYSEN, and other great minds of that State, and retained until quite recently his intellectual faculties unimpaired. He was a bright, cheerful, sunny-tempered man, of fine tastes and culture, and a thorough gentleman. He was a member, and for many years treasurer-general, of the order of the Cincinnati.

—Literary folk are waxing wealthy, especially some of the funnier ones. A few years ago Mark Twain, "John Paul" (alias WEBB), and Petroleum V. Nasby were poor but honest men, and industrious writers. Now they are opulent bond-holders. J. Paul is reported to have made several hundred thousand dollars by a few "little fliers" in Wall Street, to say nothing of his having won a very large fortune last year in—a wife. He now disdains to joke.

—A beautiful high-born Japanese young lady is said to pervade New York at the present juncture. Her complexion is a lovely transparent olive, her eyes dark and lambent, her features classical and aristocratic, her hair black, short, and curly. Her dress is a compromise between that of a Japanese lady and that of an American belle. She wears no panier or crinoline, and the fine outline of her vigorous limbs is defined through her clinging and graceful draperies. She walks proudly, and displays the most perfect self-possession in public. Who this lady is has not yet been revealed.

—Rather an industrious man is Bishop QUINTARD, of Tennessee. On Good-Friday last he officiated at seven services, preached five times, and baptized five persons. On Easter-Sunday he officiated at four services, administered baptism on two occasions, and held two confirmation services.

—Parson BROWNLOW, who has still four years to serve in the Senate, is looking more pale and feeble than usual; but he has looked for so many years like a man in extremis that he is quite likely to thwart for some time the pleasant wishes of certain Tennesseeans, who would be glad to write obituary notices of the old gentleman.

—Miss FRANCES WILLARD, president of the female college, Evanston, Illinois, thinks the true idea of woman's education will include croquet and calculus, tatting and Telemachus, Homer and home.

—A few days since Mr. A. T. STEWART, who owns the Utica Woolen Mills, was written to by his agent that the mills had 500 tons of coal to spare, which might be sold to advantage, as coal was scarce and prices high. Mr. STEWART replied, "Sell none; but, as the price is high and the article scarce, give away the whole to the working-people of the mills—share and share alike;" which was done. Mr. STEWART'S new hotel for women, at the corner of Fourth Avenue and Thirty-second Street, is rapidly progressing toward completion. Two millions of dollars have been appropriated for it, and another million will be required to complete it. This is the largest sum ever given by any one man for any one edifice for benevolent purposes.

TAPESTRY DESIGN FOR LAMBREQUIN.

Description of Symbols: ▨ 1st (darkest), □ 2d, ✕ 3d (lightest), Green; ⊘ 1st (darkest), ⊡ 2d (lightest), Fawn (the last silk); | White Wool.

Tapestry Design for Lambrequin.

LAMBREQUINS of this kind are suitable for ornamenting étagères, brackets, etc. The design is worked in cross stitch on canvas with zephyr worsted and filling silk. The worsted and silk used may be of the colors given in the description of symbols, or any other shades. After finishing the embroidery, line the lambrequin with muslin or silk, edge it with cord, and set a tassel on the under point of each scallop.

Standing Collars in Guipure Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

BOTH of these collars are made of fine linen, and ornamented with guipure embroidery.

Fig. 1.—To make this collar, first draw the outlines for the button-hole scallops, then stretch the thread bars as shown by the illustration, and work in satin and button-hole stitch.

Fig. 2.—This collar is also worked in guipure embroidery, in the manner shown by the illustration.

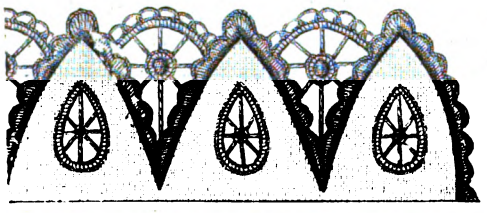

Fig. 1.—SECTION OF STANDING COLLAR IN GUIPURE EMBROIDERY.

Cover for Toilette Cushion, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS cover, of which Fig. 1 gives a fourth part in full size, is made of pink silk lined with net. For the middle of the cover work the design given on Fig. 2. For the dark lines of the design sew on gold cord with fine white silk. The gold threads stretched crosswise on the blossom leaves shown by Fig. 2 are also fastened with stitches of white silk. The design shown by Fig. 2 may be used for ornamenting pocket-books, albums, port-folios, etc.

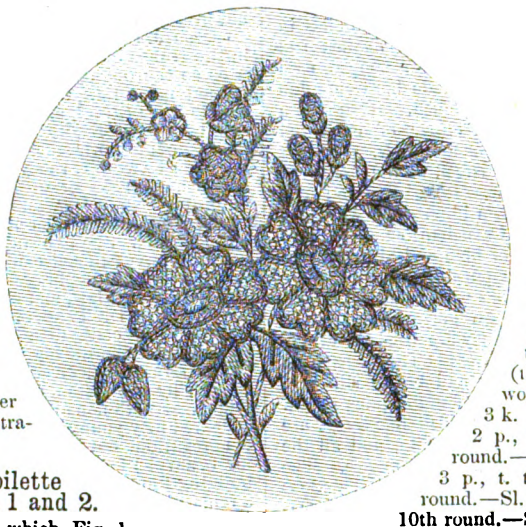

Fig. 2.—DESIGN FOR CENTRE OF TOILETTE-CUSHION COVER.

Cap Crown in Guipure Embroidery.

THIS cap crown, one-fourth of which is shown in full size by the illustration, is of cambric, worked in guipure embroidery with fine embroidery cotton and tatting cotton. Work the figures in satin and button-hole stitch with embroidery cotton, and stretch the thread bars shown by the illustration with tatting cotton. The wider parts of the design are underlaid several times with embroidery cotton. Under the embroidery the material is cut away.

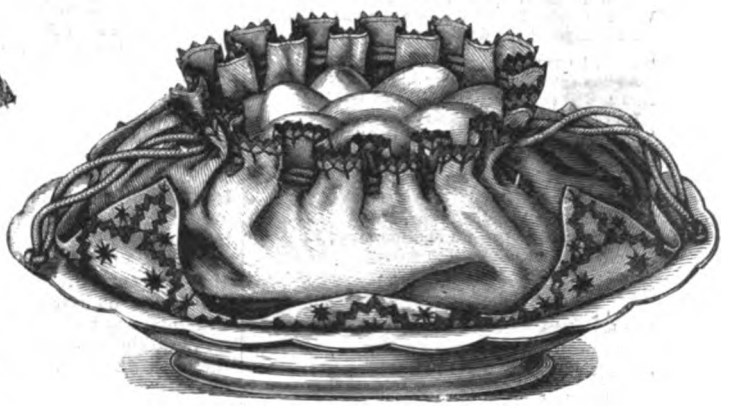
With the assistance of the description thus far given, and the illustration, the square may easily be completed; at the beginning and end of each of the following rounds denoted by even numbers work as at the beginning and end of the 56th, 58th, and 60th rounds; at the beginning and end of each round denoted by odd numbers work as at the beginning and end of the 57th and 59th rounds.

Net for boiling Eggs.

THIS net is worked with a double thread of medium-sized knitting cotton, on a mesh of one inch in diameter, as follows: Begin at the middle with a foundation of 8 st. (stitches), and work, always going forward, the 1st round.—On each of the foundation st. 2 st. (knots). 2d round.—Alternately 2 st. on the first st., 1 st. on the following (widened) st. of the preceding round. Work 13 rounds more, and widen 8 st. in each of these rounds, working always 2 st. on the st. after each widened st. of the preceding round. Now work 15 rounds more without widening. In the st. of the last round work for the border, on a mesh an inch and one-fifth in diameter, the 1st and 2d rounds.—1 st. on each st. of the preceding round. 3d round.—2 st. on each st. of the preceding round. 4th round.—Like the 1st round, but work off together always 2 st. of the preceding round with 1 st. 5th round.—3 st. on each st. of the preceding round. 6th and 7th rounds.—Like the 1st round of the border, but in the 6th round work off always 3 st. together of the preceding round with 1 st.; this completes the border. Now work the net in point de reprise with coarse knitting cotton, as shown by the illustration, so that eight gores are formed, draw the foundation st. together, fasten the thread, and cover the st. with a rosette of knitting cotton. Through the 1st and 2d rounds of the border pass two pieces of cord of the requisite length, so that they cross each other, and to the ends of the cord fasten the tassels. This net may also be used for holding vegetables, bread, etc.

Basket for Boiled Eggs.

THIS round basket is lined with red cashmere, wadded, and covered with white piqué. The piqué cover is lined with shirting, and ornamented with red worsted serpentine braid and twisted stitch embroidery; it is laid loosely on the wadding, so that it may be taken out and washed. For this cover cut of piqué and shirting a round piece of the requisite size for the bottom, then cut the edge of the cover in one piece with the scallops, also of the requisite length and breadth. Ornament the scallops with serpentine braid and red worsted in twisted stitch, and set it on the bottom, laying pleats in the edge at regular intervals. A piece of piqué, lined with shirting and embroidered, or a napkin, may be used to cover the eggs.



BAG FOR KEEPING BOILED EGGS WARM.

ROSETTE FOR CRAVATS, CAPS, ETC. WHITE EMBROIDERY.

Bag for Boiled Eggs.

THIS bag, which can be washed, is made of a double layer of white corded piqué, trimmed with red serpentine braid, and embroidered in point Russe with red split zephyr. For the bottom of the bag cut a piece of double material nine inches and three-fifths square. Trim one (the under) piece of material all around the outer edge with the serpentine braid and point Russe embroidery, and set the edge of this piece on the edge of the upper piece. For the bag cut a piece of corded piqué and shirting lining seven inches and three-fifths wide and twenty-four inches and four-fifths long, join the ends of these pieces, hem down one (the upper) side an inch and one-fifth, and at a distance of an inch from the upper edge make eyelet-holes at intervals of three-fifths of an inch each; through these holes two red worsted cords are afterward run crosswise. Furnish the upper edge of the bag with trimming as shown by the illustration, and sew the bag on the untrimmed part of the bottom so that the corners of the latter project equally. Fold these corners over on the outer side, and sew them on the bag; also fasten the edge of the bottom, between every two corners, at the middle, to the bag. In serving the eggs set the bag on a round dish or plate.

Rosette for trimming Cravats, Caps, etc.—White Embroidery.

See illustration on page 325.

THIS rosette, which may also be used for trimming lingerie, etc., is worked on cambric in half-polka, satin, knotted, button-hole, and ladder stitch. The open-work ring of the rosette is worked in the latter stitch.

Crochet Border for Window-Shades, etc.

See illustration on page 325.

THIS border is worked in chain stitch and double crochet; with the chain stitches in each round the same number of stitches of the preceding round are always passed over. For the border take finer or coarser knitting cotton. This design, if crocheted repeating several times, so that a foundation is formed, is also suitable for tidies, sofa covers, easy-chairs, etc.

TWO LOVERS.

A MAID was sitting in the sun,
And on either side was a lover;
But the eyes of the maiden saw but one,
And her pallid cheek flushed over,
As a cloud like snow will sometimes glow
With a sudden burst of glory;
While in sweet low words, like the coo of birds,
He whispered the deathless story.

"I will be true," she answered low,
As she softly nestled near him.
And the unseen rival cried, "Ho! ho!"
And laughed; but they did not hear him.
"I will be true, oh, my love, to you,
Forever and forever."
They did not hear; but the rival near
Said, "Nay, you shall wed him never!"

He lingered at her side alway,
And he wooed her eve and morning;
Nearer, nearer he drew each day,
Nor heeded her silent scorning.
Near, so near! and he smiled to hear
The impassioned lover pleading.
But her cheek grew white, and in sore affright
He saw that she was not heeding.

The maid lay on her snowy bed,
And two lovers crowded near her.
"Oh, live, my darling, live!" one said,
"My love, grown dear and dearer."
But the rival lover leaned fondly over,
And pressed his lips upon her.
She only heard his low-breathed word,
And the rival, Death, had won her.

DR. ARNOLD'S PRESCRIPTION.

"ONE, under the tongue; two, in the shoe; three, let it be; four, over the door," repeated Felicia, walking through the clover field with her eyes upon the ground. "If I could only find a four-leaved clover! Now I wonder who would come in under it; nobody, probably—there's nobody to come; but then, if I were in town, I shouldn't be likely to find the clover, so it's about even. There's a pretty view of the interval; I mean to sketch it." And then she sat down on a grassy knoll, opened her sketch-book, and attempted to carry her threat into execution. She worked away diligently for half an hour, when some one said, over her shoulder,

"You need somewhat heavier touches just there, if I may interfere. Don't you see how black the shadows fall?"

"Dr. Gray!" cried Felicia. "How you startled me! How dare you look over my shoulder, Sir? Don't you know how rude it is?"

"How rude is it?"

"So rude that if I weren't so glad to see you I should send you away. Where did you come from? Did you rain down with the sunbeams?"

The young man smiled, and stroked a fine mustache musingly.

"Just now," he answered, "I came from Shell Beach, where my mother and sister and a few friends are wasting the summer hours; and there I heard that you were here."

"How nice it is to see you! it seems like old times. I was just on the point of getting home-sick, and you have cured me. Sha'n't we go up to the house, so that I may introduce you to Aunt Sophy?"

"Unless you vote against it, I should rather stay here the little time I have to stay; I should have to divide you among so many up there."

"And I being so insignificant, you think there wouldn't be enough to go round? By-the-way, where do you mean to settle, doctor? When I last had the pleasure of talking with you, your mind was perplexed by the query."

"Yes. What would you advise? How would it do to settle hereabouts?"

"In this wilderness? Waste your sweetness on this desert sky and practice patience instead of medicine? Besides, I heard aunty say that there was a new doctor here already."

"Indeed. Did she mention his name?"

"Yes; it's Dr. Arnold morning, noon, and night. If I don't take his doses, I have a chronic dose of himself. She sings his praises loud enough to make his fortune. I dare say he has given up advertising. He cured aunty of a fever when the old doctor over at Shell Beach had given her up."

"Then you haven't seen him?"

"No: the truth is, I'm afraid to face such a paragon. He was here the first night I came, and aunty begged me to go down and see him, but I had a headache, you know; travelers always have headaches; it's one of their perquisites."

"And he might have cured it. So he was here the first day you came, eh?"

"Yes; and he was coming to-day, so I took my sketch-book and trudged out here. I don't care to see their old country doctors; they must be stupid enough."

"Oh! is he an old fellow?"

"I don't know; wears a scratch, perhaps, and green goggles, and takes snuff. He's a bachelor, at least; for aunty—dear old goose!—suggested that it would be ever so nice if he were to take a fancy to me, in order that we might live near her. It never occurred to her that I might have a word to say in the bargain. I laughed so heartily at the idea that Aunt Sophy was quite put out, do you know, and told me at last that there was no danger of my doing half so well as to marry a country doctor. I hope I sha'n't. See, I've found a four-leaved clover!"

"Which means good luck."

"Which means that I shall put it over the front-door, and trust to Fate."

"In the shape of Dr. Arnold?"

"The Fates forbid!"

"Ah, what prejudices you women cherish! According to your own acknowledgment you have not seen this worthy; according to the opinion of your friends he is worth seeing—"

"When one is ill."

"And yet you avoid and despise his shadow. I very much doubt if you do not have him in your cup yet, and to some purpose."

"Oh, you disagreeable man! You mean that when I do see him I shall fall in love with him. In that case I shall take infinite pains to avoid him. He's as bad as the Gorgon's head; for one would as soon be turned into stone, for all I know, as to fall in love with a man one hates. Besides, if he were Adonis himself, I should say, 'No, I thank you, my pretty man,' if he invited me to share this wilderness with him."

"Ah! And you would not consent to live here on any terms? How people differ! Now I like it."

"Oh, it does very well for a summer's vacation."

"And nothing more? You think that there isn't a possibility of my persuading any body to share my cottage, in case I should make up my mind to settle here?"

Who was he going to ask to share his cottage? How she envied the "gentle maid." For her part, she would have been glad to share any thing with him, any where—in the wilds of Australia, on the icebergs of the north, the mountains of the moon. But if he were intending to ask some one else!

"I dare say you might find some one who wouldn't—object."

"But not Miss Felicia Saxon. Well"—taking out his watch—"it's time I was off: five o'clock. Your bugbear must be gone before this, unless he stays to tea. By-the-way, send me word, will you? how you like him, and who comes in under the four-leaved clover." And then he mounted the horse which he had tethered to the fence, and rode away.

Felicia followed him long with her eyes, repeating, "But not Miss Felicia Saxon!"

"Why does he take it for granted?" she thought. "If he wanted to know, why did he not ask outright, without any beating about the bush? How could I tell him that I shouldn't mind if only he were here too? No, he must have been joking; he must have been thinking of some one else." And then she sighed profoundly, picked up her sketch-book, and went home, with the four-leaved clover carefully hidden between its pages.

"Where have you been, child?" asked Miss Sophy Saxon. "You always do contrive to hide yourself when the doctor's here. He wanted to see you, and asked if you were well; and I told him you were well enough to be galivanting over the neighborhood all the afternoon."

"He wanted to give me a dose of calomel, I suppose. I hate doctors' stuffs, and doctors—at least," remembering an exception—"at least most of them. I've been sketching the interval; I haven't been galivanting, and I don't know what it means."

"What do you call sketching? Those little daubs of lead-pencil marks? Looks as if the crows had walked over the paper. Dear me! is that the nonsense folks call sketching? You'd better been at home churning; it's a sight more profitable."

"I leave that for country doctors' wives. By-the-way, Aunt Sophy, your Dr. Arnold wears a wig, doesn't he?"

"My Dr. Arnold! When you see him you will wish he was yours. What if he does wear a wig, miss? Is there any thing disgraceful in that?" Miss Sophy wore a false front herself.

"Oh no; only it shows that he's no chicken, as they say; and for my part, I would rather be a young man's slave than an old man's darling."

"Which only shows your bad taste and inexperience. But you needn't worry; young or old, Dr. Arnold wouldn't waste a thought on such a chit as you—though you might thank your stars if he should—in spite of forty wigs." And Miss Sophy chuckled softly behind her tea-urn.

"If he wouldn't waste a thought on me, why in the world do you try to make my mouth water? I'm sure I don't want to lead him into any such extravagance."

Felicia placed her four-leaved clover over the front-door that very night, and sat down to await the movements of Fate, which we know are always stealthy and unexpected. Just now, certainly, Fate seemed in no hurry. A week passed without bringing any one in under the spell of the clover leaf. Felicia had begun to despair, when a perfumed note from Dr. Gray arrived, saying:

"DEAR MISS FELICIA,—Have you made the acquaintance of Dr. Arnold yet?—poor man. And how fares it with the four-leaved clover? I am delegated to present you with my sister's love—to which may I add my own?—and to request the pleasure of your company at Shell Beach any fine day this week. I should be most happy to call for you, but duty beckons in another direction. Yet I shall try to give myself a half-holiday should you consent to make it one.

"Hopefully yours,
"A. L. GRAY."

"Oh, I should so like to go!" cried Felicia. "But how to get there? I can't walk that distance, and all the farm horses are at work, I suppose. Dear me! where's my godmother that she can't make me a coach-and-six out of the squash vines and the squash bugs?"

"Where do you want to go?" asked her godmother in the shape of Aunt Sophy. For Felicia had not read the note to her aunt; it was too precious for profane ears or eyes; and, moreover, she was afraid of Aunt Sophy's opinion of the young man of the period. She would be sure to say, "In my day young men didn't write to their sisters' friends unless they had something particular to say for themselves; and young men didn't send their love in that off-hand manner, as if it wasn't of the slightest consequence." So Felicia answered,

"Mrs. Ames, a friend of mine and mamma's, wishes me to spend the first fine day with her at Shell Beach."

"Perhaps Dr. Arnold will happen along, and take you in. He drives from Dan to Beersheba on his visits, and wouldn't think any thing of doing a body a good turn," said her aunt.

"I'd rather stay at home," sulked Felicia.

"You're a very silly girl."

"Perhaps so; but silly girls are just the ones who like to have their own way. Can't you send me to Shell Beach?" coaxingly.

"Well, perhaps Jones will harness old Jolly and drive you over, if you're set upon it, and are up early enough. And there's the stage—go over in the stage, and I'll send Jones and Jolly to fetch you home. That 'll be handiest."

"Oh, thank you; you are the best of aunts, after all, if you have gone wild over that old Dr. Arnold. I dare say you can't help it; he's bewitched you."

"Just wait till he bewitches you."

So the next fine day found Felicia on the road to Shell Beach, where Mrs. Gray and Mrs. Ames were waiting to welcome her, and where, toward noon, they were joined by Dr. Gray. They sat on the veranda, and watched the bathers, and rode on the beach. Felicia, mounted on Dr. Gray's roan, of which, to tell the truth, she was mightily afraid, was only comforted by the delight of being cared for by the doctor, who made her forget danger by the glance of his eye.

"And have you not met Dr. Arnold yet? And has the fated fairy prince not entered beneath the four-leaved clover?" he laughed. "How do you know what will happen while you're away?"

"When the fairy prince comes, may I be there to see! No, I haven't met the tiresome old doctor yet, though aunty suggested that if he happened along I might ride over here with him."

"But he didn't happen along?"

"No, thank goodness! I took the stage over. Mr. Jones is coming to take me home."

"Mr. Jones? Ah! I don't remember hearing you mention him before. A particular friend of yours? Lawyer, doctor, merchant, thief? He's a thief, if he comes with intent to steal my little friend Felicia," said Dr. Gray, with ill-concealed curiosity.

"Jealous, eh?" thought Felicia, delightedly—"at least this savors of it." Then, "Mr. Jones and I are on very good terms—that is, as good as the circumstances demand," laughing.

"Indeed! May I ask if he is a resident at Farmfield?"

"Oh yes."

"Then, of course, he can have no hope."

"He doesn't seem to be despairing, however."

"Hoping against hope, perhaps. I heard of a Mr. Jones who is teaching drawing in the West Parish—not wearing a wig, but whose locks are silvered with the frosts of many winters, to put it poetically; perhaps this is your friend?"

"On the contrary, Mr. Jones, my friend, as you choose to call him, is not over thirty, with hair of your color and a golden mustache."

"'Distrust that man, although he be your brother, Whose hair is one color and his mustache another.'"

"Be still! I won't have Mr. Jones slandered. He has a figure like a Titan; he has big blue eyes. Don't you like blue eyes?"

"No; they remind me of crockery."

"They remind me of sapphires and turquoises. However, he has an aquiline nose."

"And a bad temper, of course. In short, I don't fancy any thing I hear about this Mr. Jones."

"That doesn't signify," continued Felicia, emboldened by success, "so long as my aunt Sophy does."

"Oh! Then he is her admire—"

"He is one of her farm hands, if you please."

"Cruel girl! I sha'n't forgive you in a hurry. Jones is a great burden off my mind. What possessed you?"

"One likes to make believe have a lover once in a while, you know."

"What's the use of making believe when the reality's staring you in the face?"

"Oh! make-believe lovers aren't so troublesome as real ones."

"I suppose not," with a sigh. "They don't ask you to live in the backwoods with them."

"I hope not." Why was he always harping upon living in the country?

"I suppose, now, that no one could persuade you to such a sacrifice?"

"I hope no one will try," she answered, loftily, greatly wondering if he had any such intention.

"Well," he said, after a pause, "when I marry I hope my wife will love nature."

"I should rather she would love me, if I were you," archly. "But wasn't it a joke? My drawing-master used to say to me, 'You are de most great big lover of de nature, Mess Felicité, she do have; you do show of it in de every touch!'"

"He was a flatterer," said Dr. Gray.

"I thank you. Nobody can bring such an accusation against you."

No one spoke for a full minute.

"I think we had better go back to your mother," said Felicia then, somewhat crest-fallen. "It must be almost time for Mr. Jones to come for me."

"Oh, not so bad as that, I hope. I should give myself the pleasure of taking you home, but I have an engagement."

"What a pity!" said Felicia, quite forgetting herself. "Where are you going?"

"To see Miss Atherton."

"Oh!" cried Felicia, sharply, involuntarily, as if some one had struck her a blow, and biting her lips hard to keep the pain in. Miss Atherton had been a college flame of Dr. Gray's, which his mother had succeeded in quenching; and here she was at Shell Beach, and here he was making engagements with her.

"Is she—is she as beautiful as ever?" Felicia managed to ask.

"Quite as beautiful."

Oh, how horrible it was! How she wished that she had not come to Shell Beach to spend the day, and to be made miserable! She would have been happier at home with her dream, though it were nothing but the dream of a dream.

"I am quite anxious about her," Dr. Gray pursued.

Was he going to make her the confidante of his love? It was more than flesh and blood could bear. "I thought," she faltered—"I thought that was all over," referring to his youthful fancy.

"No, there has been a relapse," said the doctor, gravely, "and that, you know, often proves fatal."

What was the matter with Felicia? She could not see the way before her. Dr. Gray's face was far off in a mist; he was speaking, but his voice was inaudible to her. Presently the mist cleared away; the setting sun was illuminating the sails of a pleasure-boat, till they looked like the two pink wings of the spoonbill; a wave was idly breaking about the horses' feet; a little beach bird skipped along the sand; some gulls were screaming and flying low. A little while ago it had all been so beautiful, and she had wished

"That life might at a stand remain eternally."

Now she cared for nothing but to go away and hide herself from this man who loved another.

She went home broken-hearted. Aunt Sophy declared it didn't do her any good to go junketing over to the beaches. She left her books unread, her sketching untouched, Aunt Sophy's dainties untasted; she even forgot the four-leaved clover. She began to wonder if she should be an old maid, like Aunt Sophy, and find her happiness in looking after the parish poor, and sending butter and eggs to market.

"The child's sick," thought her aunt. "Like as not her liver's out of order; folks' livers is the peskiest things to keep a-running. I don't like to have nobody's life on my mind; so I'll just send round for Dr. Arnold, and he'll do the right thing for her."

Felicia had a headache, alias heart-ache, and was lying on the lounge, with her Tennyson in her hands, open at "Locksley Hall," and was beginning to find an echo in her soul, when some one opened the door, and Aunt Sophy flew in from the kitchen, crying,

"O the dreary, dreary moorland! O the barren, barren shore!"

"There! Dr. Arnold, I'm right glad to see your face and eyes. I've been worried out of my night's sleep along of this child, and her folks a hundred miles away. I've given her herb tea and peppermint, and they didn't do her no more good than so much water. Law bless you, if she was lovesick she couldn't be worse off, with no relish for her victuals. Ever since she went over to the beach to see them Ameses, whoever they may be—" And Aunt Sophy might have run on forever, like Tennyson's brook, but that Felicia, thinking to escape Dr. Arnold by bolting through a side-door while her aunt detained him in the hall, was skimming across the room like a piece of thistle-down, when she felt herself suddenly detained by a firm grasp on her shoulder, and turning about, she found herself confronting Dr. Gray.

"Whither away, Miss Felicia," said he, "before I've so much as felt your pulse? Come, how do you like Dr. Arnold, at your service? What do you think of his green goggles? How does his wig fit, think you?"

"Dr. Gray!" cried the amazed Felicia, "Dr. Arnold! Which! How! I don't understand. I thought—"

"Dr. Arnold Gray, you little goose," Aunt Sophy said; "I thought every body knew that. You see, there's an old Dr. Gray over to Shell Beach, and he isn't no sort of a favorite, and so we've got into the way of calling this one Dr. Arnold to distinguish, so when we send for the doctor they sha'n't get the wrong one. There, I believe to my heart I smell my sass a-burning; just like Mary Jane to be talking to the men folks out the window and letting every thing go to ruin! You'll prescribe all right for her without me, doctor?"

"Yes, if she'll take my prescription."

"What is it?" asked Felicia, coloring under his eye, and wondering if he guessed her trouble.

"It is myself. You see, I shouldn't dare to prescribe so boldly, but that I am convinced I'm your Fate. I came in under the four-leaved clover."

"So you did," laughed Felicia. "Has Miss Atherton—" remembering herself, and drawing away from the doctor's arms.

"Yes, she has quite recovered; she rode out to-day for the first time."

"Then she has been ill?"

"After getting over a fever she had a relapse. I believe I told you before," impatiently.

"I believe you did; but I thought—I thought that it was you who had a relapse. Thank you, Dr. Arnold, I will take your prescription."

A FRENCH HOME.

See illustration on page 328.

OUR illustration represents a French home in the suburbs of Paris, to which its inmates have just returned after the siege. Five months of devastating warfare have transformed the once smiling abode into a scene of ruin. The mother sinks, half fainting, at the sight of her desolated fireside, while the husband sadly sustains her, and nerves himself to bear the calamity as best he may. The little girl in the foreground is weeping over her headless doll, while her brother brings forward a shattered vase, which perchance was once a cherished treasure. And this picture is no fancy sketch; it is one that is multiplied a thousand times in the region about Paris laid waste to satisfy the grasping ambition of a tyrant. A letter lately received from a lady whose name is familiar to our readers—Madame Emmeline Raymond—depicts a scene which might almost be the counterpart of our engraving. She says: "I have just returned from a visit to my country house, a few miles from Paris, and I can not describe to you the desolation that met my eyes. This cherished abode is in ruins. On every side I saw nothing but great trees cut down, vines uprooted, fences broken, furniture demolished, pictures and works of art destroyed—wanton destruction every where." Such are the results of arbitrament by the sword. It seems but yesterday that we were enduring the same calamities, and the memory thereof should make us sympathize with the homeless and houseless on the other side of the ocean.

LOOKING FOR A PATTERN.

See illustration on page 329.

THIS picture needs no explanation at our hands, and we suspect is a familiar one in the homes to which we are a weekly visitor. It is evident that the whole family, from the oldest to the youngest, expect to find what they want in the Bazar, and we trust that they will not be disappointed. Even the little puss in the corner is carefully balancing her doll on a chair, and glancing from her to the paper with a critical eye to see if her habiliments are in the latest fashion. Well, we do not forget the little folks, not even the dolls, and hope that as the year goes round each one will find the very thing she most needs in our columns.

LILIES.

EVERY body admires these flowers, and with many they rank next to the rose as favorite plants for garden cultivation, as they combine elegance of form and habit, brilliancy and delicacy of color and fragrance, with hardiness and easy cultivation. Within the past few years many new species and varieties have been introduced into or originated in our gardens, some of them of superlative beauty; and the number has become so great that many cultivators, both amateurs and professional florists, make a specialty of growing them. With few exceptions, they will grow in any good garden soil with the simplest cultivation, there being but one or two special points to be attended to, and that is not to allow crude manure to come in contact with the bulb, as that causes it to canker and decay. The roots of lilies generally are of two kinds—those which emanate from the base of the bulb, and those which are thrown out from the flower-stalk near the surface of the ground. These latter need manure to enable them to produce strong, well-developed flowers; hence it is best to slightly fork in some well-rotted manure early in the spring to make a good rich surface soil, or, better, to throw a forkful of manure on the surface of the soil over the bulbs in the autumn, when the tops have died down. The winter rains and thaws leach the soluble matters out of the manure, and these are taken up by the soil. The bulbs should not be taken up oftener than once in every three or four years, as nearly all this family are very impatient of removal.

For the guidance of our readers we will give a list and short description of some of the leading species and varieties, or those which can be most readily obtained. As nearly all are of comparatively slow propagation, the new species bring high prices, which, however, decrease from year to year. It is well, however, to ascertain the prices from some well-known florist before purchasing them. We select only such as will grow in any good garden soil, and do not require any special art in their cultivation. Many species, including nearly all of our native ones, require more or less of peat soil or moist situations to grow them well; all such we omit.

Lilium candidum, the common White Lily, should be in every garden, as few of the tribe surpass it in beauty. There are three varieties besides the original species to be found in the catalogues. One has the leaves striped with yellowish-white, and is very desirable. Another is called the Double-flowered White Lily, but does not produce double flowers in the ordinary acceptation of the term. Botanists tell us that flowers are only transformed leaves. In this variety the different parts of the flower are not duplicated or transformed, but a plume of white leaves, from twelve to eighteen inches long, is produced instead, and has an elegant appearance. The third variety has flowers striped with pale purple. It is apt to have a faded appearance, as the color runs into the white ground without being distinctly marked or defined.

L. longiflorum is a native of Japan, grows from nine to fifteen inches high, and produces from two to five trumpet-shaped flowers, six to eight inches long, pure white at the mouth, but of a greenish-white on the internal base of the tube; very fragrant. The flowers of this species, when cut and put in water, will remain fresh for eight or ten days.

L. eximium—a Japanese species, similar to the above, producing larger flowers, but only one to three on a stalk. The flower is also pure white to the base of the tube. Two other species lately introduced from Japan, viz., L. takesima, or Jama-juri, and L. liu-kiu, appear to be but intermediate forms of L. longiflorum and L. eximium, and are not sufficiently distinct from them to be worthy of general cultivation.

L. Brownii—probably a native of Corea. It grows from three to four feet high; flowers from one to four, three times as large as those of the white lily, very long, pure white on the inside, the exterior washed and striped with a peculiar rusty deep violet or purple color. This elegant species should be planted where it will be partially shaded during the intense heat of the day; the soil should be well drained and somewhat sandy.

L. auratum.—This magnificent lily is a native of Japan, from whence it was introduced about ten years ago, and sold at forty dollars per bulb, but now can be purchased for a dollar. It is the most beautiful of all the lily family, growing from two to four feet high, and bearing from one to eighteen or twenty flowers on a single stem, or stalk, according to the strength of the plant. The flowers are often twelve or more inches across, pure white, with a broad golden yellow band down the centre of each petal, the whole flower being spotted with purple. Although varieties of it may be found in the catalogues, we have not seen any that were sufficiently distinct to be worth naming, except two, one of which is pure white, and another in which the yellow band is replaced by a crimson-purple one. The flowers are deliciously fragrant.

L. speciosum of botanists, or L. lancifolium of horticulturists, is also a native of Japan, and is now pretty well known to amateurs. It grows from eighteen inches to three feet high, producing from three to twelve very fragrant flowers from four to six inches in diameter, with strongly reflexed petals dotted with papillæ, which, in the colored varieties, are of a darker shade of color than the petals. The varieties are numerous, the type species being pure white. The varieties run through various shades of red from pale blush, flesh-color, rose, to deep crimson or carmine. In another set of varieties the flower-stems become flattened in the way of a cockscomb, and thus produce a flattened corymb of flowers, as many as twenty or more being produced on a single head. They are, however, much smaller than the other varieties, but run through the same shades of color, and are very curious and pretty.

L. martagon.—The Martagon Lily grows from fifteen to thirty inches high, producing from three to twelve and sometimes twenty flowers, with reflexed petals of a violet rose color, strongly spotted with carmine on the interior. There are many varieties of it to be found in the catalogues, but the most distinct are the purple martagon and the white. The latter is somewhat delicate and not very easy to propagate, and for this reason is not often seen.

L. chalcedonicum, or L. byzantinum, the Turk's Cap, Turban, or Scarlet Martagon, grows from thirty inches to four feet high, producing from one to six flowers, of a deep scarlet or tomato red color, spotted on the inside with blackish spots. The flowers when cut keep well in vases.

L. tigrinum.—The well-known Tiger-Lily, still one of the very best of the species with reflexed petals. Two new varieties have lately been introduced, one, L. tigrinum splendens, grows much taller and stronger than the type species, and produces flowers of larger size and with larger spots. The other is double-flowered, having from twenty to thirty petals, and is very fine. Both these varieties are quite new, and sell at high prices.

L. testaceum, also known as L. excelsum, L. isabellinum, and L. peregrinum, is a strong-growing species, from five to six feet high, flowers nankeen-color, from one to eight in number. Except when in bloom this species might be taken for the white lily, it resembles it so much in foliage and habit.

L. crocosum, known also as L. umbellatum, is a very hardy, robust-growing species, growing from two to three feet high. The flowers, from three to fifteen, are produced in an umbel, and are from three to four inches in diameter, of a saffron or orange-red color, with purple spots. The varieties of this species are very numerous, running through all shades of color from pale yellow, citron, orange, to bright, dazzling red, with the spots of greater or less intensity of color from pale purple to black. This species and its varieties are much used in Europe for planting on lawns in masses, where they are very effective.

L. bulbiferum is also known as L. croceum and L. humile. It very much resembles the preceding species, but has more angular stems, smoother leaves, and produces bulblets at the base of the leaves. The flowers, from two to ten, are borne in a sort of paniculated umbel, and are of a saffron-yellow or bright orange-red color. This showy species does well in the shade or in situations where there is not much or any sun.

L. fulgens, or L. sanguineum, is a Japanese species of great beauty in the richness of the color of its flowers. It grows from eighteen inches to two feet high, having from two to six bright red flowers in an umbel. There are several varieties, varying from the original in the intensity of the color or in the spots. It is a very hardy and showy species.

L. buschianum is an early-blooming, dwarf-growing species from Japan, growing from six to eight inches high, producing one or two bell-shaped flowers about four inches in diameter, of an orange-red or pale yellow color.

L. thunbergianum is also a Japanese species. It grows about twenty inches high, producing from one to three flowers, but in the numerous varieties of it this number is increased to eight or ten. The flowers are orange-red in color, with small purplish spots; but in the varieties they vary from pure yellow to nankeen, orange to deep red and fiery red, with orange, brownish, and black spots.

USEFUL RECIPES.

RICE GRIDDLE CAKES.—Two cups of cold boiled rice slightly mashed, 1 cup of flour, and the same quantity of corn meal, mixed with cold milk enough to form a stiffish batter, a little soda dissolved in the milk, and nearly twice the quantity of cream of tartar in the flour.

STRAWS (very nice).—Nearly 1 quart of flour, in which mix well 1 tea-spoonful of cream of tartar; in this cut finely a piece of butter the size of an egg; break 3 eggs in, and add two cups of sugar. Dissolve 1 tea-spoonful of soda in 1 cup of milk; and add it to the flour, etc. If not stiff enough, more flour can be added, or if too stiff, more milk; but they are much nicer just to get the right proportion, and not have to add at all. Cut them out about as thick as doughnuts, and fry in hot lard.

NEW YORK TEA-BISCUIT.—Nearly 1 quart of flour, in which thoroughly mix two tea-spoonfuls of cream of tartar; add one large coffee-cup of sugar—light brown does very well; cut finely half a cup of butter; make a hole in the middle of the flour, and pour in a coffee-cup of milk, or about half a pint, and in this drop a tea-spoonful of finely powdered soda; stir all well together with a knife, flour the board and pin, and roll out about half an inch thick. Cut into cakes, and bake in a quick oven about fifteen minutes.

RUSK.—Three pounds of flour, 1 of butter, 1 of sugar, 1 quart of milk, 8 eggs. Melt the butter in the milk. When tepid, pour it slowly on the flour, so that it will not be lumpy; stir it well; then add the sugar, break the eggs, beat well a few minutes, and add a tea-cup of yeast. It is best to mix overnight; and when light have the pan well greased, grease a spoon, and drop them in, a spoonful at a time. When nearly done, sift sugar over them, and when taken out of the oven, brush with white of egg, and sift sugar again on them.

SALLY LUNN.—Three pints of sifted flour, 1 of new milk, in which has been dissolved a quarter of a pound of butter, 3 eggs broken into it, 2 tea-spoonfuls of sugar, 1 gill of home-made yeast. The flour should be well stirred in before the eggs are added; about a tea-spoonful of salt. This should be baked in two "Turk's-heads."

TO KEEP SMOKED HAMS.—During the hot summer weather it is often difficult to keep them; but by making a sack of coarse cotton cloth a little larger than the ham, and after putting one in, filling around closely with chopped hay, there will be no trouble. They should hang either in a smoke-house or a cool, dark, dry place.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

A FEW years ago the work-house at Liverpool, England, in consequence of the ignorance and inefficiency of the nurses, and the general bad management of the institution, had become a public disgrace. Some of the trustees resolved upon a reform, and consulted with Miss Florence Nightingale concerning the measures best to adopt. She proposed that Miss Agnes Jones, a co-laborer with herself, who had been thoroughly trained at the preparatory school for nurses, should be put into the work-house, with a staff of assistants, and allowed to reorganize the entire department. Brave and philanthropic, Miss Jones immediately entered upon her arduous duties, and threw all her energies into the work. The two years which followed were memorable for the sickness and destitution which prevailed. Diseased persons crowded into the work-house. Soon she had under her charge over fifty nurses and nearly fifteen hundred patients. She had a most difficult place. Besides the care of the sick, she had to disarm all sectarian jealousy. But she soon won all hearts by her gentleness and skill, and wrought a great reform in a great public institution. In the midst of her usefulness, however, her strength failed, and she died, crowned with love and honor. The work of her hand and heart yet remains, showing what one woman can accomplish when she has a willing disposition, energy, and preparatory training.

Two thousand different shades of color can be readily dyed at the present time; and even this number gives but a faint idea of the effects that might be produced by admixture of one hue with another. In royal blue there are this season from twenty-four to thirty-eight varieties in the light middle shades. Scarlet has from thirty to forty shades; crimson the same number. Yellow has from forty to fifty shades.

It is often observable that there are many more bonnets than bare heads at church of a Sunday. It has, therefore, been proposed to revive an old custom spoken of by Sir Walter Scott, as being in use in some of the out-of-the-way kirks in Scotland—namely, to let the men smoke. This would fill the church in a double sense.

The "Woolwich Infant" is the nickname given to a monster gun of thirty-five tons' weight, which has been recently completed at the royal gun factory, England. This huge weapon is not merely an experimental production, or a curiosity for exhibition, for ten pieces of ordnance of similar weight and power are being rapidly constructed for the government.

At a recent "golden wedding" in Kentucky there were present twenty guests who witnessed the marriage ceremony fifty years ago. Among them were the bride-maid and groomsman. The average age of these twenty persons was seventy-one years and six months.

Various personal peculiarities are thought to be indicative of character. The color and fineness of the hair, the shape of hand and foot, the color of the eye, the shape of the finger nails, and the form of nose and chin, are all supposed by some investigating persons to reveal something of the individual's peculiar disposition and temperament. One poet is of opinion that

> A gray eye
> Is still and sly;
> A roguish
> Is the brown;
> The eye of blue
> Is ever true;
> But in the black eye's
> Sparkling spell
> Mystery
> And mischief dwell!

We have known, however, these signs to be false in many instances.

The friends of Hiram Powers, the sculptor, are making efforts to save his early home at Woodstock, Vermont, from the progress of the age. The owner of it has intended to tear down the old mansion soon and build a new one.

Children will imitate their elders. Harry is no exception. One day he was much interested in watching the process of "picking a chicken" for dinner. Next day mamma was very busy, Harry very quiet, and so long so that she mistrusted mischief. She quietly went down stairs and found him with the kitten in his arms, who was vainly striving to free herself. The boy was persistently diving into kitty's sides.

"What are you doing, Harry?" asked mamma.

"Why, I am picking the fedders out," was the reply.

A simple preventive to most of the accidents from kerosene lamps is to fill them in the morning. When the oil burns down in the lamp a highly inflammable gas gathers over its surface, which increases as the oil decreases. A slight jar will then often produce an explosion.

The Paterson Guardian (New Jersey), after giving some items of interest respecting the success of women who have been employed in connection with that paper, states that, as a rule, it has found that female compositors "do not care to earn beyond a certain amount, and when that figure is reached they seem to have all the money they require, and are perfectly careless of any thing extra. They may not advance so far in rapid type-setting; but it is a fact that generally girls will reach in three weeks a position to which a boy will take six to attain. In an office they are more agreeable, less disposed to go from place to place, and as a general thing are more reliable than male compositors. To be sure, they must have their own; but they seldom want more than is right." The Guardian goes on to say: "Our entire newspaper is the work of young ladies, and every type is set by them, advertisements and all, and the 'make-up' is a young girl; and we have no foreman in the newspaper-rooms, a young lady acting in that capacity."

Edmund Spenser, of "Faerie Queen" celebrity, and Sir Philip Sidney were warm friends. It is related that the friendship commenced by the poet presenting Sidney with the ninth canto of the "Faerie Queen" as a sort of introduction to him. Sir Philip, having read some stanzas, called his steward and ordered him to give the person who brought the verses £50; but upon reading the next stanza he ordered the money to be doubled. The steward thought it his duty to make some delay in executing so sudden and lavish a bounty; but upon reading one stanza more Sir Philip raised his gratuity to £200, and commanded the steward to give it immediately, lest, as he read further, he might be tempted to give away his whole estate.

The library of the Soldiers' Home, Dayton, Ohio, now contains 4000 volumes, nearly all of which were presented by Mrs. Mary L. Putnam, of Boston, in memory of her son, who fell at Ball's Bluff.

Fifty years ago a gentleman from Ohio saved the life of a Massachusetts gentleman by dragging him out of a river. A short time ago—long after he had forgotten all about it—he received a service of silver from the man he saved, in memory of his brave act.

Women can keep secrets—until they want to tell them. In proof whereof is the story of one whom we will call Mary Smith, although that is by no means her real name. When the war broke out she was employed in a farmer's kitchen in Ohio, and her father's family moving to Iowa, she was left there to finish her engagement, and follow them later. She was a large, healthy girl of eighteen, and some strange freak induced her to assume man's apparel and enlist in the army. She performed her duties faithfully, and was so handy in cooking and nursing that she became a general favorite, while no suspicion of her sex was excited. She voted for President in 1864, and was mustered out of the army with her comrades at the close of the war. She then resumed female dress, and procured work in Illinois for six months, until the tan of a five summers' campaign wore off, when she presented herself at her father's house, where she was received with open arms. She, however, refused to inform them of her whereabouts for so many years, only replying to all questions that she had been honestly employed. She had saved some money, which she invested in land in Iowa, which rapidly rose in value. A few months ago a worthy man—who by chance had been, unknown to himself, in the same regiment with her—made her an offer of marriage. Then she thought she should reveal to him her previous life before bestowing her hand. Such a strange tale the would-be husband could scarcely believe, and the lady's family were no less incredulous. But its truth was proved, and in no wise lessened the regard which she had won. The marriage took place about three months ago.

The Scotsman shows its sympathy with the lady students of the medical school at Edinburgh by putting the following quotation from Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe" in a prominent part of that paper:

"Rebecca lost no time in causing the patient to be transported to their temporary dwelling, and proceeded with her own hands to examine and to bind up his wounds. The youngest reader of romances and romantic ballads must recollect how often the females, during the Dark Ages, as they are called, were initiated into the mysteries of surgery. The Jews, both male and female, possessed and practiced the medical science in all its branches. The beautiful Rebecca had been heedfully brought up in all the knowledge proper to her nation, which her apt and powerful mind had retained, arranged, and enlarged in the course of a progress beyond her years, her sex, and even the age in which she lived. The attendant proceeded to uncover Ivanhoe's side, and the lovely Jewess satisfied herself that the bandage was in its place and the wound doing well. She performed her task with a graceful and dignified simplicity and modesty which might, even in more civilized days, have served to redeem it from whatever might seem repugnant to female delicacy."

Parents and teachers may learn a valuable lesson from a remark once made by the Duke of Gloucester, the third son of the Prince of Wales, father of George III. He was a dull child, and his mother used to cause him great distress at times by jeering him, on account of his dullness, in the presence of his brothers and sisters. On one particular occasion she told them to laugh at the fool. The sensitive child held down his head and said nothing; upon which the princess changed her tone, and accused him of sulkiness.

"No," he said, "I was not sulky; I was only thinking."

"And pray what were you thinking of?" inquired the princess, with increasing scorn in her manner.

"I was thinking," said the poor child, "how I should feel if I had a son as unhappy as you make me."

Prince Puckler-Muskau was without the vanity so common among a certain class of authors. He died a short time ago at his superb estate in the province of Brandenburg, near Kottlus. In his will was found the following passage: "I have very little cash left, I think; but my heirs will honor my memory if they will use part of my money in buying all the copies of my works they can find, and destroying them at once."

Circumstantial evidence is often greatly at fault. A couple of weeks ago a woman was on trial in Reading, Pennsylvania, for murdering her son, a boy of ten years old. The circumstantial evidence was strong against her. Fortunately it was unexpectedly proved that the boy was alive and well.

FLOWER OF MAY?

BENEATH my window stands
A figure fair and slender,
With soft coquettish hands
And features gay and tender.

Around her naked feet
How freshly starts the grass;
Faint wafts of odors sweet
Are in the airs that pass.

Her cheek is touched with flame
As I push up the glass,
And whisper down, "Your name,
My captivating lass?"

"My name is April, Sir, and I
Often laugh, as often cry;
And I can not tell what makes me,
Only as the fit o'ertakes me
I must dimple, smile, and frown,
Laughing, though the tears roll down;
But, 'tis nature, Sir, not art,
And I'm happy at my heart.

"Now, Sir, if your toilette's made,
May I ask your company
To the blooming mornlit glade?"
Frank and modest little maid,
With a pretty white and red
Playing chase
O'er her face
At the sweet bold thing she said.
"May I ask your company?
I know where the flow'rs lie hid,
'Neath the forest's brown eyelid,
Some for you and some for me."

So I followed her, and saw
All the frosty earth in thaw
Quick'ning underneath her tread;
While the countless buds o'erhead,
Dipping down the beamy air,
Blushed against her shining hair.

Then spoke April, soft and shy,
Casting down her dewy eye:
"There's one trick I love to play
On my brilliant sister May;
There's one flow'r she calls her own,
Thinks it blooms for her alone,
Calls it by her name; yet she
Owes that little flow'r to me.
Flower of May!
Prove what I say.

"Was it May's or April's breath
Waked you from a winter's death?
Made your veins and fibres dance
To electric touch and glance?
Was it May's or my caress
Stirred you into loveliness?
May is coming, April's going;
Tell the secret of your blowing:
Quickly say,
Yea or nay."

April ceased, a farewell grace
On her tearful, smiling face.

Then a very tiny creature,
Exquisite in form and feature,
Suddenly before us stood,
Mantled like an elfin queen
In a glist'ning robe of green,
In the bosom of the wood;
With her face, just touched with color
Through the mist of dew upon it,
Peeping from a pink silk hood,
Like a floral wee Maud Muller,
In the coyest cottage bonnet,
In a merry, morning mood.

Fluttering her fragrant head,
Thus the little creature said:

"People call me 'Flower of May,'
But it is not truth they say:
April's fingers, light and bold,
Found me in the leafy mould;
Fed me morning, noon, and night,
Choicest bits of spring delight.
Thirst could never parch the lip
Having April's tears to sip.
Of her smile she made a lamp
For my toilette in the damp;
And each morn her warm caress
Wrought new beauties in my dress
She did all the work; the play
And reward are given to May.

"People say I'm passing fair;
Tell them it is April's care
Nursed me into graces rare.
Many call me, far and near,
Sweetest flow'r of all the year;
Tell them April's smile and tear
Made me hardy—made me sweet—"

"Hush!" sighed April; "May's light feet
Glow along the forest way;
I can see her golden hair,
Shedding blossoms on the air.
Shut your eyes, my darling; seem—
Never mind what people say—
First to waken from your dream
At the laughing voice of May."

HOW KAISER WILHELM'S SISTER WAS WON.

IT will be remembered that the Emperor William the First of Germany, immediately after the preliminaries of peace had been signed at Versailles, sent to St. Petersburg a telegram in which he expressed to the Czar his gratitude for the friendly attitude which Russia had maintained during the progress of the Franco-Prussian war, and in which he frankly admitted that Germany was indebted to this sincere friendship of her powerful Eastern neighbor for the comparatively limited dimensions of the gigantic conflict. Unquestionably the political interests of Russia, and, above all, her well-known policy in the Eastern question, have mainly contributed to her partiality for Prussia; but not an insignificant share in this partiality must also be attributed to personal considerations—to that near relationship which for upward of half a century has existed between the dynasties of Russia and Prussia; for Alexander the Second, the present Emperor of Russia, is a son of the Princess Charlotte of Prussia, the sister of the present Emperor of Germany.

The betrothal and marriage of this princess with Nicholas, who was then only a grand duke, but became afterward Emperor of Russia, forms one of the sweetest and most romantic love episodes in the world of European courts, which is usually so devoid of love and romance, and would, on that account alone, deserve being remembered, quite regardless of the historical interest which will henceforth adhere to all the members of the family of the conqueror of France.

Princess Charlotte was born in the year 1798, and was the eldest daughter of King Frederick William the Third of Prussia, and his beautiful and accomplished wife, Queen Louisa. Her early childhood elapsed amidst scenes of terror and humiliation for the royal family of Prussia, and nobody would at that time have ventured to predict for her the brilliant career which Providence kept in store for this child, born and brought up under such fatal auspices. We might, indeed, make an exception in favor of her mother, who, with that prophetic intuition which seems to have been the distinguishing feature of that high-minded woman, wrote one day to her father, the Duke of Mecklenburg, the following lines about her daughter:

"Charlotte is given to silence and reserve, but under her apparent coldness she conceals a warm and loving heart. Her indifference and pride are but the dull outside of a diamond of the purest water, which some day will shine forth in its brilliant lustre. Her bearing and manners are noble and dignified. She has but few friends, but these few are warmly attached to her. I know her value, and predict for her a brilliant future, if she lives long enough."

The young princess was, indeed, a very frail and delicate creature—one of those tender flowers which seem to wait for the kind hand of the gardener to transplant them into a warmer clime. She was charming and handsome; but her beauty was rather that of a pale lily than that of a blooming rose.

Charlotte was just sixteen, when, in the year 1814, the Grand Duke Nicholas, on his way to the camp of the allied armies in France, passed through Berlin, and was warmly welcomed as an honored guest at the royal palace.

The description which those who saw and knew the grand duke at that time have given of the incomparable graces of his person and mind makes it easy for us to imagine that the heart of a young girl just budding into womanhood was captivated and charmed by him almost at first sight. Well he might have said, like Cæsar, "I came, I saw, I conquered." The princess fell in love with him, and, fortunately for her, the young grand duke returned her love fully as passionately.

The Grand Duke Nicholas had the reputation of being one of the handsomest, if not the very handsomest man of his times; and his majestic and stately form, which measured no less than six feet and two inches, was considered unequaled in beauty, not only in Russia, but in all Europe. He was vigorous, strong, full of life and health, with broad shoulders and chest, while his small hands and feet were of the most aristocratic elegance; his whole figure realized the perfect model of manly and commanding beauty which the divine art of a sculptor of antiquity has immortalized under the features of the Apollo Belvedere. His features were of the Grecian cast—forehead and nose formed a straight line—and his large blue, sincere eyes showed a singular combination of composure, sternness, self-reliance, and pride, among which it would have been difficult for the observer to name the predominant expression. Those who would have looked closely and attentively into those remarkable eyes would have easily believed that their threatening glances would suffice to suppress a rebellion, to terrify and disarm a murderer, or to frighten away a supplicant; but there would have been but few to believe that the sternness of these eyes could ever be so entirely softened as to beam forth nothing but love and kindness. Among these few was, however, the young Prussian princess, who had drunk deep in their intoxicating fervor. It is true that she was the only person in the world in whose presence the Olympian gravity of his features gave way to a radiant cheerfulness, which made his manly beauty perfectly irresistible. In such moments his magnificent brow, always the seat of meditation and thought, exhibited the serene beauty and Attic grace of a young Athenian—the serious Pericles seemed, by the invisible wand of a magician, to have been transformed into the youthful Alcibiades.

Such is the flattering portrait which his contemporaries have drawn of the personal appearance of the Grand Duke Nicholas at the time of his arrival at Berlin.

At that time, however, the matchless personal charms of the grand duke were not enhanced by political prospects of the most exalted character. He was not even eventually considered an heir to the imperial crown of Russia. It is true, Alexander the First, his brother, had no children, but in the case of his death, which could not be expected soon, the Grand Duke Constantine was to inherit the throne of Peter the Great, and leave to Nicholas at best but the position of a first prince of the blood. Nevertheless, Frederick William, charmed alike by the beauty and intellect of his guest, and by the hope of uniting the sovereign houses of Prussia and Russia by the close ties of a family union, greeted the prospect of a marriage between the grand duke and his daughter with enthusiasm, especially when he discovered that the young folks themselves were very fond of each other.

The king then delicately insinuated to his daughter that if she had taken a liking to the grand duke, and had reason to believe that the prince entertained similar feelings toward her, their marriage would meet with no objection on his part.

But the young princess, although secretly delighting in a hope which so fully responded to the secret wishes of her heart, was either too proud or too bashful to confess to her father her love for the grand duke, who had not yet made any declaration to her.

In this manner the day approached on which the grand duke was to leave Berlin. On the eve of his departure a grand gala supper was given in his honor at the royal palace, and, by way of accident or policy, the young Princess Charlotte was seated by the side of her distinguished admirer.

The grand duke was uncommonly taciturn during the evening. His high forehead was clouded, and his gloomy eyes seemed to follow in the space vague phantoms flitting before his imagination. Repeatedly he neglected to reply to questions addressed to him, and when he was asked to respond to a toast which one of the royal princes had proposed in his honor, he seemed to awake from a profound dream which had entirely withdrawn him from his surroundings.

Suddenly, as if by a mighty effort of his will, he turned to his fair neighbor, and whispered so as only to be understood by her,

"So I shall leave Berlin to-morrow!"

He paused abruptly, and looked at the princess as if he was waiting for an answer which expressed sorrow and grief on her part. But the princess was fully as proud as the grand duke, and, overcoming the violent throbbing of her heart, she said politely to him:

"We are all very sorry to see your imperial highness leave us so soon. Would it not have been possible for you to defer your departure?"

"You will all be very sorry?" muttered the grand duke, not entirely satisfied with the vagueness of sorrow which these words of the princess implied. "But you in particular, madame?" he added, after some hesitation. "For it will depend on you alone whether I shall stay here or depart."

"Ah!" replied Charlotte, with her sweetest smile, "and what have I to do to keep your imperial highness here?"

"You must permit me to address my admiration and homage to you."

"Is that all?"

"And you must encourage me to please you."

"That is much more difficult," said the princess, with a deep blush, but at the same time her eyes beamed forth so much affection and delight that the prince could see at a glance that his fondest hopes had been realized beforehand.

"During my short stay at Berlin," the grand duke continued, in the same tone of voice, "I have taken pains to study your character and your affections, and this study has satisfied me that you would render me very happy, while on the other hand I have some qualities which would secure your own happiness."

The princess was overcome by emotion, and in her confusion did not know what to answer. At last she said, "But here, in the presence of the whole court, at the public table, you put such a question to me!"

"Oh," replied the prince, "you need not make any verbal reply. It will be sufficient for you to give me some pledge of your affection. I see there on your hand a small ring whose possession would make me very happy. Give it to me."

"What do you think of? Here in the presence of a hundred spectators?"

"Ah, it can be easily done without being seen by any body. Now we are chatting so quietly with each other that there is not one among the guests who suspects in the least what we are speaking about. Press the ring into a morsel of bread and leave it on the table; I will take the talisman, and nobody will notice it."

"This ring is really a talisman."

"I expected so. May I hope to hear its history?"

"Why not? My first governess was a Swiss lady by the name of Wildermatt. Once she went to Switzerland in order to enter upon an inheritance which had been bequeathed to her by a distant relative. When she came back to Berlin, a few weeks afterward, she showed me quite a collection of pretty and costly jewelry, which formed part of the inheritance. 'This is a curious old ring,' said I to her, as I put this old-fashioned little ring on my finger. 'Does it not look queer and cunning? Perhaps it is an old relic or talisman, and may have been worn centuries ago by a pious lady who had received it from her knight, starting for the Holy Land.' I tried to take the ring from my finger again, but I could not get it off; for I was a little fleshier then than now," said Charlotte, smilingly. "My governess insisted on my keeping the ring as a souvenir. I accepted her present, and the ring has been on my finger ever since. Some time afterward, when I was contemplating its strange workmanship, I succeeded in pulling it from my finger, and was much surprised at seeing engraved on the inside some words which, though nearly rubbed out by the wear of time, were still legible. Now, your imperial highness, what do you think were the words engraved upon it? I think when you hear them you will take some interest in the ring."

"Ah! and pray what were they?"

"The words engraved upon the inside were, 'Empress of Russia.' This ring had undoubtedly been presented by an Empress of Russia to the relative of Mrs. Wildermatt, for I was told that both this lady and her mother had formerly belonged to the household of the czarina, your august grandmother."

"This is really remarkable," said the grand duke, thoughtfully. "I am quite superstitious, and am really inclined to regard this ring, if I should be happy enough to receive it from you as a pledge of your love, as an omen of very auspicious significance."

In answer to this second and even more direct appeal to her heart, the princess took a small piece of bread, played carelessly with it, and managed to press the ring deep into the soft crumbs. Then she dropped it playfully on the table quite close to the plate of her neighbor. And after this adroit exhibition of her skill as an actress she continued to eat as unconcernedly as if she had performed the most insignificant action of her life.

With the same apparent coolness and indifference the grand duke picked up the bread inclosing the ring, took the latter out of its ingenious envelope, and concealed it in his breast, for it was too small to fit any of his fingers. It was this ring—both the pledge of Charlotte's love and the auspicious omen of his own elevation to the imperial dignity—which Nicholas wore on a golden chain around his neck to the very last day of his life, and which, if we are not mistaken, has even descended with him into the vault of his ancestors.

Three years after, in 1817, Princess Charlotte, then only nineteen years of age, and in the full splendor of beauty and happiness, made her entry into St. Petersburg by the side of her husband, whose eye had never looked prouder, and whose Olympian brow had never been more serene, than at this happiest moment of his life. As he looked down upon the vast multitude which had flocked together from all parts of the vast empire to greet the young princess with shouts and rejoicings, and then again upon his fair young bride, perhaps the inscription of the ring recurred to his mind; for, bending his head quite close to the ear of Charlotte, he whispered, "Now empress of the hearts, and some day perhaps empress of the realm."

At this moment the procession reached the main entrance of the Winter Palace, where Alexander the First, the emperor, surrounded by a brilliant suite of generals and courtiers, came to meet his beautiful sister-in-law, and conducted her into the sumptuous drawing-rooms of the magnificent palace of the czars. Who would have believed that eight short years afterward the brilliant young emperor had breathed his last, and that Nicholas and Charlotte would succeed him on the throne of Russia? Truly the inscription of the engagement-ring had proven prophetic!

LIVING IN GERMANY.

MARKETING AND TABLE.

THE comparative poverty of the mass of the people in European countries compels an economy which we in the United States, with our common abundance, rarely approach. This is particularly so in the food and cookery. In Europe every where there is a nicety of adaptation of supply to demand, and an exhaustive use of material unknown to our prodigal larders and wasteful kitchens. There is enough thrown away or destroyed in the United States to sustain in health and vigor a population of many thousands. There are various articles of both animal and vegetable food which almost entirely support whole nations in Europe that our over-fastidious democracy will not deign to taste. Important, if not the chief, constituents of the daily soup and black bread which supply wholesome nourishment to the greater portion of the German people are swept away with the refuse of the mill, or cast into the dust-bin in America.

This economy of material and preparation is by no means confined to the poorest classes in Europe. The larders and kitchens of even the most luxurious livers are regulated with such a regard to saving that the humblest establishments with us might learn a lesson from them. The rich do not scorn to appropriate the benefits which the necessities of the poor have forced nature or art to disclose. There is, for example, that marvel of economical subsistence, that providential dispensation of strength, health, and life to the German soldier and laborer, the pea-sausage (Erbse-wurst)! Thus the most savory, nutritious, and wholesome food ever concocted is now almost universally adopted by all classes in Germany as an occasional article of diet, so that large families of dainty feeders can be daily seen feasting upon a soup of Erbse-wurst, the whole cost of which has barely amounted to a single half dime. Its excessive cheapness is undoubtedly a great commendation; but saving as the German people are of the contents of their purse, they are no less heedful about what they put into their stomachs, and take care to keep them well supplied with appetizing and substantial food. The soup, which supplies a large portion of the daily subsistence of all classes on the Continent, is not only a healthful and nutritious article of diet, but affords a ready means for the use of much animal and vegetable material which would be otherwise wasted, and is ordinarily with us cast into the swill-barrel. The mode of cutting the meat by the foreign butchers into smaller portions than is customary in the United States conduces greatly to economy in its use. The large joints which we deem essential to the dinner are expensive to cook, from the great fires they require, and the excessive waste they lead to in the consumption.

To derive the fullest benefit from the economy of life in Germany, it is necessary to conform more or less to the conditions upon which it depends. Americans, therefore, must not carry with them the habits acquired amidst the superfluous abundance and wasteful consumption of the prodigal establishments of their own country.

It is not only, however, that the mode of using food in Germany is favorable to economy, but most articles necessary for daily subsistence are generally cheaper on the continent of Europe than in the populous districts of the United States. For example, at Heidelberg, where our latest experience has been acquired, and the markets of which are by no means famous for their cheapness, as high prices are sustained by a constant influx of travelers, the average cost of all the necessaries of life is hardly more than half of that in New York. Beef of the ox, Ochsenfleisch, which is esteemed the best, is sold at thirteen or fourteen cents a pound. That of the cow, Rindfleisch, which is often good though less succulent and tender, costs only ten or eleven cents a pound; for cows, being used as beasts of burden, are, with the women, the hardest-worked creatures in Germany, and the texture of their flesh becomes necessarily coarse and tough. Mutton and pork sell at twelve cents, and veal, which is the favorite meat, costs but ten cents. Chickens, partridges, hares, and other varieties of game are abundant and cheap. Fish abounds in the Neckar, which flows through the city of Heidelberg, and the markets are always supplied with it at a very low price. Milk is three cents a quart, eggs sixteen cents a dozen, and butter twenty-four cents a pound; half a peck of potatoes costs twelve cents, and all other vegetables are to be obtained at equally moderate rates. Fruits are especially abundant at Heidelberg, and exceedingly good and cheap. Cherries in the height of the season are sold at the low price of two cents a pound; and pears, apples, and the smaller fruits seldom reach to a half of New York prices. Groceries are about as expensive as with us, but are generally used with stricter economy. The wines of the country are of so low a price that none need abstain from their use from motives of economy. A bottle of the finest of the whole duchy of Baden, of the choicest vintage, the Markgräfler costs but nineteen cents, and a very fair dinner wine can be had for ten cents. Nuts cost but six cents the hundred, and fair cigars can be bought for a dollar and a half the box; so the sybarite with the scantiest purse can indulge at Heidelberg in his wine and walnuts and cigar with a freedom of enjoyment that might be coveted in vain by the richest voluptuary of New York.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

CHAPTER X.

LADY LAURA'S PREPARATIONS.

After that interview between Mr. Fairfax and his betrothed there was no time wasted. Laura Armstrong was enraptured at being made arbiter of the arrangements, and was all haste and eagerness, impetuosity and animation. The wedding was appointed for the second week in September, about five weeks from the period of that garden tête-à-tête. Lady Geraldine was to go to town for a week, attended only by her maid, to see her father, and to give the necessary orders for her trousseau. The business of settlements would be arranged between the family lawyers. There were no difficulties. Lady Geraldine had nothing, and Mr. Fairfax was inclined to be very generous. There was no prospect of squabbling or unpleasantness.

George Fairfax was to be away during this brief absence of his betrothed. He had an engagement with an old friend and brother officer who was wont to spend the autumn in a roughly comfortable shooting-box in the north of Scotland, and whom he had promised to visit before his marriage, as a kind of farewell to bachelorhood and bachelor friendship. There could be no other opportunity for the fulfillment of this promise, and it was better that Mr. Fairfax should be away while Lady Geraldine was in London. As the period of his marriage became imminent he had a vague feeling that he was an object of general attention, that every feminine eye, at any rate, was on him, and that the watch would be all the closer in the absence of his betrothed. No, he did not want to dawdle away a week (off duty) at Hale Castle. Never before had he yearned so for the rough freedom of Major Beaman's shooting-quarters, the noisy mirth of those rude Homeric feasts, half dinner, half supper, so welcome after a long day's sport, with a quiet rubber, perhaps, to wind up, and a brew of punch after a recondite recipe of the Major's, which he was facetiously declared to bear tattooed above the region of his heart. Mr. Fairfax had been two months at Hale when Lady Geraldine left on that dutiful visit to her father, and necessary interviewing of milliners and dress-makers; and he was, it is just possible, a little tired of decorous country-house life, with its weekly dinner-parties, and perpetual influx of county families to luncheon, and its unfailing croquet; and he felt, too, that at such a time it would be, perhaps, safer for him to be away from Clarissa Lovel.

Was there any real danger for him in her presence? If he asked himself this question nowadays, he was able to answer boldly in the negative. There might have been a time of peril, just one perilous interval when he was in some danger of stumbling; but he had pulled himself up in time, with an admirable discretion, he thought, and now felt as bold as a lion. After that morning with Lady Geraldine in the garden he had never wavered. He had not been less kind or polite to Miss Lovel; he had only made a point of avoiding any thing like that dangerous confidential friendship which had been so nearly arising between them.

Of course every guest at the Castle knew all about the intended wedding directly things had been finally arranged. Lady Laura was not given to the keeping of secrets, and this important fact she communicated to all her particular friends, with a radiant face and a most triumphant manner. The two Fermor girls and Clarissa she invited to remain at Hale till after the wedding, and to act as bride-maids.

"My sisters Emily and Louisa will make two more," she said; "and that pretty little Miss Trellis, Admiral Trellis's daughter, will be the sixth: I shall have only six. We'll have a grand discussion about the dresses to-morrow morning. I should like to strike out something original, if it were possible. We shall see what Madame Albertine proposes. I have written to ask her for her ideas; but a milliner's ideas are so bornées."

Lady Laura had obtained permission from her sister to enlist Clarissa in the ranks of the bride-maids.

"It would look so strange to exclude a pretty girl like that," she said. Whereupon Geraldine had replied rather coldly that she did not wish to do any thing that was strange, and that Miss Lovel was at liberty to be one of her bride-maids. She had studiously ignored the confession of jealousy made that night in her sister's dressing-room; nor had Laura ever presumed to make the faintest allusion to it. Things had gone so well since, and there seemed nothing easier than to forget that unwonted outbreak of womanly passion.

Clarissa heard the approaching marriage discussed with a strange feeling—a nameless, undefinable regret. It seemed to her that George Fairfax was the only person in her small world who really understood her, the only man who could have been her friend and counselor. It was a foolish fancy, no doubt, and had very little foundation in fact; but, argue with herself as she might against her folly, she could not help feeling that this marriage was in somewise a calamity for her. She was quite sure that Lady Geraldine did not like her, and that, as Lady Geraldine's husband, George Fairfax could not be her friend. She thought of this a great deal in those busy weeks before the wedding, and wondered at the heaviness of her heart in these days. What was it that she had lost? As she had wondered a little while ago at the brightness of her life, she wondered now at its darkness. It seemed as if all the color had gone out of her existence all at once; as if she had been wandering for a little while in some enchanted region, and found herself now suddenly thrust forth from the gates of that fairy paradise upon the bleak outer world. The memory of her troubles came back to her with a sudden sharpness. She had almost forgotten them of late—her brother's exile and disgrace, her father's coldness, all that made her fate dreary and hopeless. She looked forward to the future with a shudder. What had she to hope for—now?

It was the last week in August when Lady Geraldine went up to London, and George Fairfax hurried northward to his friend's aerie. The trousseau had been put in hand a day or two after the final settlement of affairs, and the post had carried voluminous letters of instruction from Lady Laura to the milliners, and had brought back little parcels containing snippings of dainty fabrics, scraps of laces, and morsels of delicate silk, in order that colors and materials might be selected by the bride. Every thing was in progress, and Lady Geraldine was only wanted for the adjustment of those more important details which required personal supervision.

If Clarissa Lovel could have escaped from all this pleasant bustle and confusion, from the perpetual consultations and discussions which Lady Laura held with all her favorites upon the subject of the coming marriage—if she could by any means have avoided all these, and, above all, her honorable office of bride-maid—she would most gladly have done so. A sudden yearning for the perfect peace, the calm eventless days, of her old life at Mill Cottage had taken possession of her. In a moment, as if by some magical change, the glory and delight of that brilliant existence at the Castle seemed to have vanished away. There were the same pleasures, the same people; but the very atmosphere was different, and she began to feel like those other girls whose dullness of soul she had wondered at a little while ago.

"I suppose I enjoyed myself too much when first I came here," she thought, perplexed by this change in herself. "I gave myself up too entirely to the novelty of this gay life, and have used up my capacity for enjoyment, almost like those girls who have gone through half a dozen London seasons."

When Lady Geraldine and George Fairfax were gone it seemed to Clarissa that the Castle had a vacant air without them. The play still went on, but the chief actors had vanished from the scene. Miss Lovel had allowed herself to feel an almost morbid interest in Mr. Fairfax's betrothed. She had watched Lady Geraldine from day to day, half unconsciously, almost in spite of herself, wondering whether she really loved her future husband, or whether this alliance were only the dreary simulacrum she had read of in fashionable novels—a marriage of convenience. Lady Laura had certainly declared that her sister was much attached to Mr. Fairfax; but then, in an artificial world where such a mode of marrying and giving in marriage obtained, it would obviously be the business of the bride's relatives to affect a warm belief in her affection for the chosen victim. In all her watching Clarissa had never surprised one outward sign of Geraldine Challoner's love. It was very difficult for a warm-hearted, impulsive girl to believe in the possibility of any depth of feeling beneath that coldly placid manner. Nor did she perceive in Mr. Fairfax himself many of those evidences of affection which she would have expected from a man in his position. It was quite true that as the time of his marriage drew near he devoted himself more and more exclusively to his betrothed; but Clarissa could not help fancying, among her many fancies about these two people, that there was something formal and ceremonial in his devotion; that he had, at the best, something of the air of a man who was doing his duty. Yet it would have seemed absurd to doubt the reality of his attachment to Lady Geraldine, or to fear the result of an engagement that had grown out of a friendship which had lasted for years. The chorus of friends at Hale Castle were never tired of dwelling upon this fact, and declaring what a beautiful and perfect arrangement such a marriage was. It was only Lizzie Fermor who, in moments of confidential converse with Clarissa, was apt to elevate her expressive eyebrows and impertinent little nose, and to make disrespectful comments upon the subject of Lady Geraldine's engagement—remarks which Miss Lovel felt it in some manner her duty to parry by a warm defense of her good friend's sister.

"You are such a partisan, Clarissa," Miss Fermor would exclaim, impatiently; "but, take my word for it, that woman only marries George Fairfax because she feels she has come to the end of her chances, and that this is about the last opportunity she may have of making a decent marriage."

The engaged couple were to be absent only a week: that was a settled point; for on the very day after that arranged for their return there was to be a ball at Hale Castle—the first real ball of the season—an event which would, of course, lose half its glory if Lady Geraldine and her lover were missing. So Laura Armstrong had been most emphatic in her parting charge to George Fairfax.

"Remember, George, however fascinating your bachelor friends may be—and, of course, we know that nothing we have to offer you in a civilized way can be so delightful as roughing it in a Highland bothy (bothy is what you call your cottage, isn't it?) with a tribe of wild sportsmen—you are to be back in time for my ball on the twenty-fifth. I shall never forgive you if you fail me."

"My dear Lady Laura, I would perish in the struggle to be up to time rather than be such a caitiff. I would do the journey on foot, like Jeanie Deans, rather than incur the odium of disappointing so fair a hostess."

And upon this Mr. Fairfax departed, with a gayer aspect than he had worn of late, almost as if it had been a relief to him to get away from Hale Castle.

Lady Laura had a new set of visitors coming, and was full of the business involved in their reception. She was not a person who left every arrangement to servants, numerous and skillful as her staff was. She liked to have a finger in every pie, and it was one of her boasts that no department of the household was without her supervision. She would stop in the middle of a page of Tasso to enter with as much ardor into the discussion of the day's bill of fare with her cook; and that functionary had enough to do to gratify my lady's eagerness for originality and distinction even in the details of her dinner-table.

"My good Volavent," she would say, tossing the poor man's list aside, with a despairing shrug of her shoulders, "all these entrées are as old as the hills. I am sure Adam must have had stewed pigeons with green pease, and fricasseed chicken with mushrooms—they are the very A, B, C of cookery. Do, pray, strike out something a little newer. Let me see: I copied the menu of a dinner at St. Petersburg from 'Count Cralonzki's Diary of his own Times,' the other day, on purpose to show you. There really are some ideas in it. Do look it over, Volavent, and see if it will inspire you. You must try to rise above the level of a West End hotel."

In the same manner did my lady supervise the gardens, to the affliction of the chief official and his dozen or so of underlings. To have the first peaches and the last grapes in the county of York, to decorate her table with the latest marvel in pitcher-plants and rare butterfly-shaped orchids, was Lady Laura's ambition; to astonish morning visitors with new effects in the garden her unceasing desire. Nor within-doors was her influence less actively exercised. Drawing-rooms and boudoirs, morning-rooms and bed-chambers, were always undergoing some improving touch, some graceful embellishment, inspired by that changeful fancy. When new visitors were expected at the Castle Lady Laura flitted about their rooms, inspecting every arrangement, and thinking of the smallest minutiæ. She would even look into the rooms prepared for the servants on these occasions, to be sure that nothing was wanting for their comfort. She liked the very maids and valets to go away and declare there was no place so pleasant as Hale Castle. Perhaps when people had been to her two or three times, she was apt to grow a little more careless upon these points. To dazzle and astonish was her chief delight, and, of course, it is somewhat difficult to dazzle old friends.

In the two days after Geraldine Challoner's departure Lady Laura was in her gayest mood. She had a delightful air of mystery in her converse with Clarissa, would stop suddenly sometimes in the midst of her discourse to kiss the girl, and would contemplate her for a few moments with her sweetest smile.

"My dear Lady Laura, what pleasant subject are you thinking about?" Clarissa asked, wonderingly: "I am sure there is something. You have such a mysterious air to-day, and one would think by your manner that I must be concerned in this mystery."

"And suppose you were, Clary—suppose I were plotting for your happiness? But no; there is really nothing; you must not take such silly fancies into your head. You know how much I love you, Clary—as much as if you were a younger sister of my own; and there is nothing I would not do to secure your happiness."

Clarissa shook her head sadly.

"My dear Lady Laura, good and generous as you are, it is not in your power to do that," she said, "unless you could make my father love me, or bring my brother happily home."

"Or give you back Arden Court?" suggested Lady Laura, smiling.

"Ah, that is the wildest dream of all! But I would not even ask Providence for that. I would be content if my father loved me—if we were only a happy united family."

"Don't you think your father would be a changed man, if he could get back his old home somehow? The loss of that must have soured him a good deal."

"I don't know about that. Yes, of course, that loss does weigh upon his mind; but even when we were almost children he did not seem to care much for my brother Austin or me. He was not like other fathers."

"His money troubles may have oppressed him even then. The loss of Arden Court might have been a foreseen calamity."

"Yes, it may have been so. But there is no use in thinking of that. Even if papa were rich enough to buy it, Mr. Granger would never sell the Court."

"Sell it!" repeated Lady Laura, meditatively; "well, perhaps not. One could hardly expect him to do that—a place for which he has done so much. But one never knows what may happen. I have really seen such wonderful changes come to pass among friends and acquaintances of mine that scarcely any thing would astonish me—no, Clary, not if I were to see you mistress of Arden Court."

And then Lady Laura kissed her protégée once more with effusion, and anon dipped her brush in the carmine, and went on with the manipulation of a florid initial in her missal—a fat Gothic M, interlaced with ivy leaves and holly.

"You haven't asked me who the people are that I am expecting this afternoon," she said, presently, with a careless air.

"My dear Lady Laura, if you were to tell me their names, I don't suppose I should be any wiser than I am now. I know so few people."

"But you do know these—or at least you know all about them. My arrivals to-day are Mr. and Miss Granger."

Clarissa gave a faint sigh, and bent a little lower over her work.

"Well, child, are you not surprised? have you nothing to say?" cried Lady Laura, rather impatiently.

"I—I dare say they are very nice people," Clarissa answered, nervously. "But the truth is—I know you must despise me for such folly—I can not help associating them with our loss, and I have a kind of involuntary dislike of them. I have never so much as seen them, you know—not even at church; for they drive into Holborough every Sunday, and never come to our dear little church at Arden; and it is very childish and absurd of me, no doubt, but I don't think I ever could like them."

"It is very absurd of you, Clary," returned my lady; "and if I could be angry with you for any thing, it certainly would be for this unjust prejudice against people I want you to like. Think what a nice companion Miss Granger would be for you when you are at home—so near a neighbor, and really a very superior girl."

"I don't want a companion; I am used to being alone."

"Well, well, when you come to know her, you will like her very much, I dare say, in spite of yourself; that will be my triumph. I am bent upon bringing about friendly relations between your father and Mr. Granger."

"You will never do that, Lady Laura."

"I don't know. I have a profound faith in my own ideas."

CHAPTER XI.

DANIEL GRANGER.

After luncheon that day Clarissa lost sight of Lady Laura. The Castle seemed particularly quiet on this afternoon. Nearly every one was out-of-doors playing croquet; but Clarissa had begun to find croquet rather a wearisome business of late, and had excused herself on the plea of letters to write. She had not begun her letter-writing yet, however, but was wandering about the house in a purposeless way—now standing still for a quarter of an hour at a time, looking out of a window without being in the least degree conscious of the landscape she was looking at, and then pacing slowly up and down the long picture-gallery with a sense of relief in being alone.

At last she roused herself from this absent, dreamy state.

"I am too idle to write this afternoon," she thought. "I'll go to the library and get a book."

The Hale library was Clarissa's delight. It was a noble collection gathered by dead-and-gone owners of the Castle, and filled up with all the most famous modern works at the bidding of Mr. Armstrong, who gave his bookseller a standing order to supply every thing that was proper, and rarely for his own individual amusement or instruction had recourse to any shelf but one, which contained neat editions of the complete works of the Druid and Mr. Apperley, the "Life of Assheton Smith," and all the volumes of the original Sporting Magazine, bound in crimson Russia. These, with Ruff's Guide, the Racing Calendar, and a few volumes on farriery, supplied Mr. Armstrong's literary necessities. But to Clarissa, for whom books were at once the pleasure and consolation of life, this library seemed a treasure-house of inexhaustible delights. Her father's collection was of the choicest, but limited. Here she found every thing she had ever heard of, and a whole world of literature she had never dreamed of. She was not by any means a pedant or a blue-stocking, and it was naturally among the books of a lighter class she found the chief attraction; but she was better read than most girls of her age, and better able to enjoy solid reading.

To-day she was out of spirits, and came to the library for some relief from those vaguely painful thoughts that had oppressed her lately. The room was so little affected by my lady's butterfly guests that she made sure of having it all to herself this afternoon, when the voices and laughter of the croquet-players, floating in at the open windows, told her that the sport was still at its height.

She went into the room, and stopped suddenly a few paces from the door-way. A gentleman was standing before the wide, empty fire-place, where there was a great dog-stove of iron-work and brass which consumed about half a ton of coal a day in winter—a tall, ponderous-looking man, with his hands behind him, glancing downward with cold gray eyes, but not in the least degree inclining his stately head, to listen to Lady Laura Armstrong, who was seated on a sofa near him, fanning herself and prattling gayly, after her usual vivacious manner.

Clarissa started and drew back at sight of this tall stranger.

"Mr. Granger," she thought, and tried to make her escape without being seen.

The attempt was a failure. Lady Laura called to her.

"Who is that in a white dress? Miss Lovel, I am sure.—Come here, Clary: what are you running away for? Let me present you to my friend Mr. Granger.—Mr. Granger this is Miss Lovel, the Miss Lovel whose home and birthright fortune has given to you."

Mr. Granger bowed rather stiffly, and with the air of a man to whom a bow was a matter of business.

"I regret," he said, "to have robbed Miss Lovel of a home to which she was attached. I regret still more that she will not avail herself of my desire to consider the park and grounds entirely at her disposal on all occasions. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to see her use the place as if it were her own."

"And nothing could be kinder than such a wish on your part," exclaimed my lady, approvingly.

Clarissa lifted her eyes rather shyly to the rich man's face. He was not a connoisseur in feminine loveliness, but they struck him at once as very fine eyes. He was a connoisseur in pictures, and no mean judge of them, and those brilliant hazel eyes of Clarissa's reminded him of a portrait by Velasquez of which he was particularly proud.

"You are very kind," she murmured; "but—but there are some associations too painful to bear. The park would remind me so bitterly of all I have lost since I was a child."

She was thinking of her brother and his disgrace—or misfortune; she did not even know which of these two it was that had robbed her of him. Mr. Granger looked at her wonderingly. Her words and manner seemed to betray a deeper feeling than he could have supposed involved in the loss of an estate. He was not a man of sentiment himself, and had gone through life affected only by its sternest realities. There was something rather too Rosa-Matildaish for his taste in this faltered speech of Clarissa's; but he thought her a very pretty girl, nevertheless, and was inclined to look somewhat indulgently upon a weakness he would have condemned without compunction in his daughter. Mr. Granger was a man who prided himself upon his strength of mind, and he had a very poor idea of the aristocratic, exclusive recluse whose early extravagance had made him master of Arden Court. He had not seen Mr. Lovel half a dozen times in his life, for all business between those two that could be transacted by their respective lawyers had been so transacted; but what he had seen of that pale care-worn face, that fragile figure, and somewhat irritable manner, had led the ponderous, strong-minded Daniel Granger to consider Marmaduke Lovel a very poor creature.

He was interested in this predecessor of his, nevertheless. A man must be harder than stone who can usurp another man's home, and sit by another man's hearth-stone, without giving some thought to the exile he has ousted. Daniel Granger was not so hard as that, and he did profoundly pity the ruined gentleman he had deposed. Perhaps he was still more inclined to pity the ruined gentleman's only daughter, who must needs suffer for the sins and errors of others.

"Now pray don't run away, Clary," cried Lady Laura, seeing Clarissa moving toward the door, as if still anxious to escape. "You came to look for some books, I know.—Miss Lovel is a very clever young lady, I assure you, Mr. Granger, and has read immensely.—Sit down, Clary. You shall take away an armful of books by-and-by, if you like."

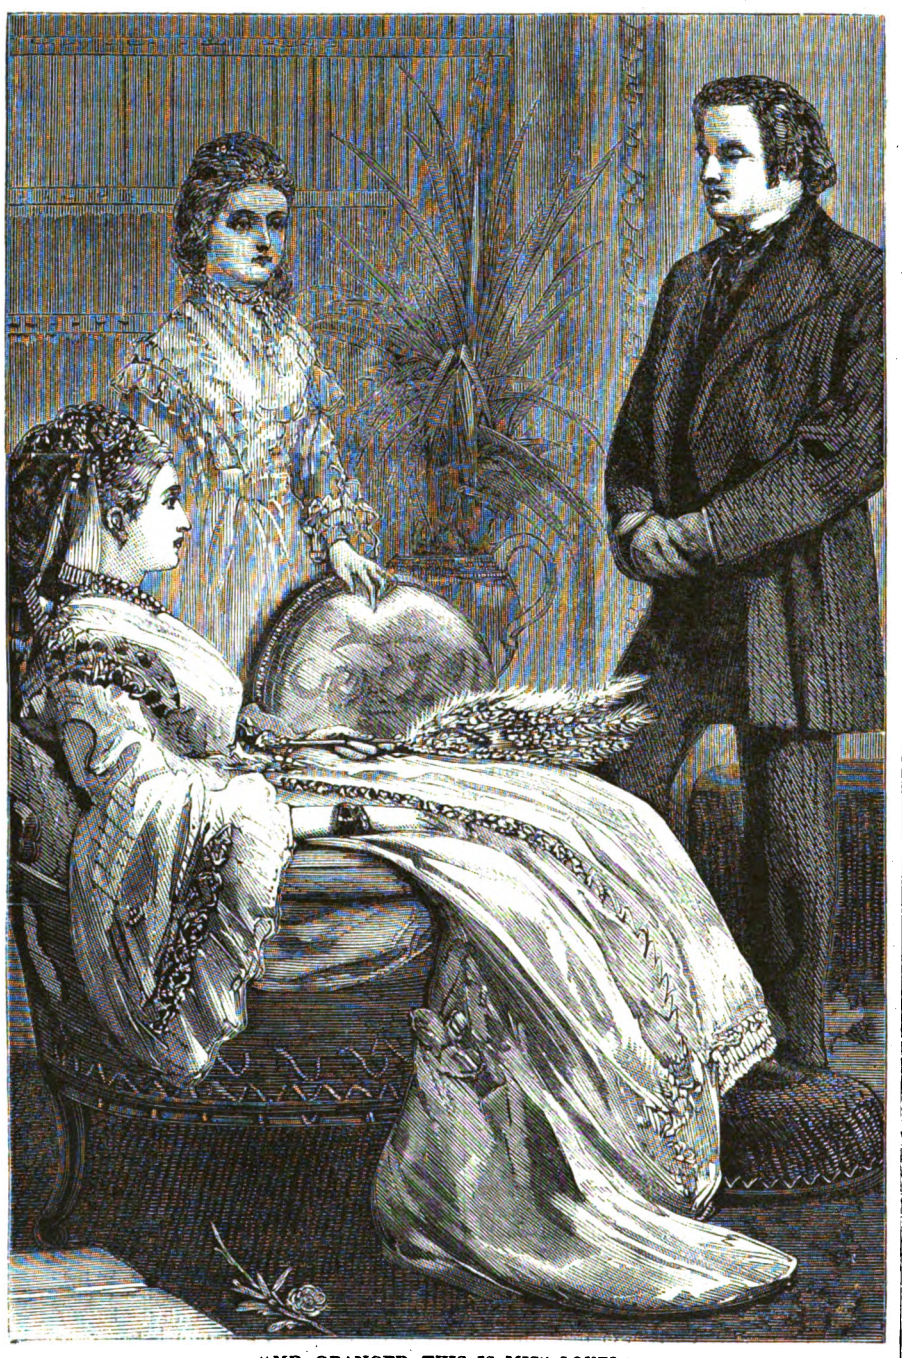
Clarissa seated herself near my lady's sofa with a gracious, submissive air, which the owner of Arden Court thought a rather pretty kind of thing, in its way. He had a habit of classifying all young women in a general way with his own daughter, as if in possessing that one specimen of the female race he had a key to the whole species. His daughter was obedient; it was one of her chief virtues; but, somehow, there was not quite such a graceful air in her small concessions as he perceived in this little submission of Miss Lovel's.

Mr. Granger was rather a silent man; but my lady rattled on gayly in her accustomed style, and while that perennial stream of small-talk flowed on Clarissa had leisure to observe the usurper.

He was a tall man, six feet high, perhaps, with a powerful and somewhat bulky frame, broad shoulders, a head erect and firmly planted as an obelisk, and altogether an appearance which gave a general idea of strength. He was not a bad-looking man, by any means. His features were large and well cut; the mouth firm as iron, and unshadowed by beard or mustache; the eyes gray and clear, but very cold. Such a man could surely be cruel, Clarissa thought, with an inward shudder. He was a man who would have looked grand in a judge's wig; a man whose eyes and eyebrows, lowered upon some trembling delinquent, might have been almost as awful as Lord Thurlow's. Even his own light brown hair, faintly streaked with gray, which he wore rather long, had something of a leonine air.

He listened to Lady Laura's trivial discourse with a manner which was no doubt meant to be gracious, but with no great show of interest. Once he went so far as to remark that the Castle gardens were looking very fine for so advanced a season, and attended politely to my lady's rather diffuse account of her triumphs in the orchid line.

"I don't pretend to understand much about those things," he said, in his stately far-off way, as if he lived in some world quite remote from Lady Laura's, and of a superior rank in the catalogue of worlds. "They are pretty and curious, no doubt. My daughter interests herself considerably in that sort of thing. We have a good deal of glass at Arden—more than I care about. My head man tells me that I must have grapes and pines all the year round; and, since he insists upon it, I submit. But I imagine that a good many more of his pines find their way to Covent Garden than to my table."



"MR. GRANGER, THIS IS MISS LOVEL."

Clarissa remembered the old kitchen-gardens at the Court in her father's time, when the whole extent of "glass" was comprised by a couple of dilapidated cucumber-frames, and a queer little green-house in a corner, where she and her brother had made some primitive experiments in horticulture, and where there was a particular race of spiders, the biggest specimens of the spidery species it had ever been her horror to encounter.

"I wonder whether the little green-house is there still," she thought. "Oh no, no; battered down to the ground, of course, by this pompous man's order. I don't suppose I should know the dear old place if I were to see it now."

"You are fond of botany, I suppose, Miss Lovel?" Mr. Granger asked, presently, with a palpable effort. He was not an adept in small-talk; and though in the course of years of dinner-eating and dinner-giving he had been frequently called upon to address his conversation to young ladies, he never opened his lips to one of the class without a sense of constraint and an obvious difficulty. He had all his life been most at home in men's society, where the talk was of grave things, and was no bad talker when the question in hand was either commercial or political. But as a rich man can not go through life without being cultivated more or less by the frivolous herd, Mr. Granger had been compelled to conform himself somehow to the requirements of civilized society, and to talk, in his stiff, bald way, of things which he neither understood nor cared for.

"I am fond of flowers," Clarissa answered, "but I really know nothing of botany. I would always rather paint them than anatomize them."

"Indeed! Painting is a delightful occupation for a young lady. My daughter sketches a little, but I can not say that she has any remarkable talent that way. She has been well taught, of course."

"You will find Miss Lovel quite a first-rate artist," said Lady Laura, pleased to praise her favorite. "I really know no one of her age with such a marked genius for art. Every body observes it." And then, half afraid that this praise might seem to depreciate Miss Granger, the good-natured châtelaine went on: "Your daughter illuminates, I dare say?"

"Well, yes, I suppose so, Lady Laura. I know that Sophia does some messy kind of work involving the use of gums and colors. I have seen her engaged in it sometimes. And there are scriptural texts on the walls of our poor-schools which I conclude are her work. A young woman can not have too many pursuits. I like to see my daughter occupied."

"Miss Granger reads a good deal, I suppose, like Clarissa?" Lady Laura hazarded.

"No, I can not say that she does. My daughter's habits are active and energetic rather than studious. Nor should I encourage her in giving much time to literature, unless the works she read were of a very solid character. I have never found any thing great achieved by reading men of my own acquaintance; and directly I hear that a man is never so happy as in his library, I put him down as a man whose life will be a failure."

"But the great men of our day have generally been men of wide reading, have they not?"

"I think not, Lady Laura. They have been men who have made a little learning go a long way. Of course there are numerous exceptions among the highest class of all—statesmen, and so on. But for success in active life, I take it, a man can not have his brain too clear of waste rubbish in the way of book-learning. He wants all his intellectual coin in his current account, you see, ready for immediate use, not invested in out-of-the-way corners, where he can't get at it."

While Mr. Granger and my lady were arguing this question, Clarissa went to the book-shelves and amused herself hunting for some attractive volumes. Daniel Granger followed the slender girlish figure with curious eyes. Nothing could have been more unexpected than this meeting with Marmaduke Lovel's daughter. He had done his best, in the first year or so of his residence at the Court, to cultivate friendly relations with Mr. Lovel, and had most completely failed in that well-meant attempt. Some men in Mr. Granger's position might have been piqued by this coldness. But Daniel Granger was not such a one; he was not given to undervalue the advantage of his friendship or patronage. A career of unbroken prosperity, and a character by nature self-contained and strong-willed, combined to sustain his belief in himself He could not for a moment conceive that Mr. Lovel declined his acquaintance as a thing not worth having. He therefore concluded that the banished lord of Arden felt his loss too keenly to endure to look upon his successor's happiness, and he pitied him accordingly. It would have been the one last drop of bitterness in Marmaduke Lovel's cup to know that this man did pity him. Having thus failed in cultivating any thing approaching intimacy with the father, Mr. Granger was so much the more disposed to feel an interest—half curious, half compassionate—in the daughter. From the characterless ranks of young-ladyhood this particular damsel stood out with unwonted distinctness. He found his mind wandering a little as he tried to talk with Lady Laura. He could not help watching the graceful figure yonder, the slim white-robed figure, standing out so sharply against the dark background of carved oaken book-shelves.

Clarissa selected a couple of volumes to carry away with her presently, and then came back to her seat by Lady Laura's sofa. She did not want to appear rude to Mr. Granger, or to disoblige her kind friend, who, for some reason or other, was evidently anxious she should remain, or she would have been only too glad to run away to her own room.

The talk went on. My lady was confidential, after her manner, communicating her family affairs to Daniel Granger as freely as she might have done if it had been an uncle or an executor. She told him about her sister's approaching marriage and George Fairfax's expectations.

"They will have to begin life upon an income that I dare say you would think barely sufficient for bread and cheese," she said.

Mr. Granger shook his head, and murmured that his own personal requirements could be satisfied for thirty shillings a week.

"I dare say. It is generally the case with millionaires. They give four hundred a year to a cook, and dine upon a mutton-chop or a boiled chicken. But really Mr. Fairfax and Geraldine will be almost poor at first: only my sister has, fortunately, no taste for display, and George must have sown all his wild oats by this time. I expect them to be a model couple, they are so thoroughly attached to each other."

Clarissa opened one of her volumes and bent over it at this juncture. Was this really true? Did Lady Laura believe what she said? Was that problem which she had been perpetually trying to solve lately so very simple, after all, and only a perplexity to her own weak powers of reason? Lady Laura must be the best judge, of course, and she was surely too warm-hearted a woman to take a conventional view of things, or to rejoice in a mere marriage of convenience. No, it must be true. They really did love each other, these two, and that utter absence of all those small signs and tokens of attachment which Clarissa had expected to see was only a characteristic of good taste. That which she had taken for coldness was merely a natural reserve, which at once proved their superior breeding, and rebuked her own vulgar curiosity.

From the question of the coming marriage Lady Laura flew to the lighter subject of the ball.

"I hope Miss Granger has brought a ball dress. I told her all about our ball in my last note."

"I believe she has provided herself for the occasion," replied Mr. Granger. "I know there was an extra trunk, to which I objected when my people were packing the luggage. Sophia is not usually extravagant in the matter of dress. She has a fair allowance, of course, and liberty to exceed it on occasion; but I believe she spends more upon her school-children and pensioners in the village than on her toilette."

"Your ideas on the subject of costume are not quite so wide as Mr. Brummel's, I suppose," said my lady. "Do you remember his reply when an anxious mother asked him what she ought to allow her son for dress?"

Mr. Granger did not spoil my lady's delight in telling an anecdote by remembering; and he was a man who would have conscientiously declared his familiarity with the story had he known it.

"'It might be done on eight hundred a year, madam,' replied Brummel, 'with the strictest economy.'"

Mr. Granger gave a single-knock kind of laugh.

"Curious fellow, that Brummel," he said. "I remember seeing him at Caen, when I was traveling as a young man."

And so the conversation meandered on, my lady persistently lively in her pleasant, commonplace way, Mr. Granger still more commonplace, and not at all lively. Clarissa thought that hour and a half in the library the longest she had ever spent in her life. How different from that afternoon in the same room when George Fairfax had looked at his watch and declared the Castle bell must be wrong!

That infallible bell rang at last—a welcome sound to Clarissa, and perhaps not altogether unwelcome to Lady Laura and Mr. Granger, who had more than once sympathized in a smothered yawn.

"I SHOULD LIKE ABOVE ALL THINGS TO GO WITH YOU THERE; BUT REALLY AND TRULY—I'VE NOTHING TO WEAR."

[The following popular poem, which originally appeared in Harper's Weekly for February 7, 1857, is here reprinted by request. The many readers who admire the style and wit of this sparkling satire will be interested to learn that Harper's Magazine for June will contain a new poem by Mr. BUTLER, entitled "GENERAL AVERAGE," with original illustrations. It is a humorous story of New York mercantile life; and the conductors of the Magazine believe its popularity will equal that of "NOTHING TO WEAR:"]

NOTHING TO WEAR.

AN EPISODE OF CITY LIFE.

BY WM. ALLEN BUTLER.

Miss FLORA M'FLIMSEY, of Madison Square,
Has made three separate journeys to Paris;
And her father assures me, each time she was there,
That she and her friend Mrs. Harris
(Not the lady whose name is so famous in history,
But plain Mrs. H., without romance or mystery)
Spent six consecutive weeks without stopping,
In one continuous round of shopping;
Shopping alone, and shopping together,
At all hours of the day, and in all sorts of weather;
For all manner of things that a woman can put
On the crown of her head or the sole of her foot,
Or wrap round her shoulders, or fit round her waist,
Or that can be sewed on, or pinned on, or laced,
Or tied on with a string, or stitched on with a bow,
In front or behind, above or below:
For bonnets, mantillas, capes, collars, and shawls;
Dresses for breakfasts, and dinners, and balls;
Dresses to sit in, and stand in, and walk in;
Dresses to dance in, and flirt in, and talk in;
Dresses in which to do nothing at all;
Dresses for winter, spring, summer, and fall;
All of them different in color and pattern—
Silk, muslin, and lace, crape, velvet, and satin,
Brocade, and broadcloth, and other material,
Quite as expensive and much more ethereal;
In short, for all things that could ever be thought of,
Or milliner, modiste, or tradesman be bought of,
From ten-thousand-franc robes to twenty-sous frills;
In all quarters of Paris, and to every store,
While M'Flimsey in vain stormed, scolded, and swore,
They footed the streets, and he footed the bills.

The last trip, their goods shipped by the steamer Ardgo
Formed, M'Flimsey declares, the bulk of her cargo,
Not to mention a quantity kept from the rest,
Sufficient to fill the largest-sized chest,
Which did not appear on the ship's manifest,
But for which the ladies themselves manifested
Such particular interest, that they invested
Their own proper persons in layers and rows
Of muslins, embroideries, worked under-clothes,
Gloves, handkerchiefs, scarfs, and such trifles as those;
Then, wrapped in great shawls, like Circassian beauties,
Gave good-by to the ship, and go-by to the duties.
Her relations at home all marveled no doubt,
Miss Flora had grown so enormously stout
For an actual belle and a possible bride;
But the miracle ceased when she turned inside out,
And the truth came to light, and the dry-goods bealde,
Which, in spite of Collector and Custom-house sentry,
Had entered the port without any entry.

And yet, though scarce three months have passed since the day
This merchandise went, on twelve carts, up Broadway,
This same Miss M'Flimsey, of Madison Square,
The last time we met, was in utter despair,
Because she had nothing whatever to wear!

NOTHING TO WEAR! Now, as this is a true ditty,
I do not assert—this, you know, is between us—
That she's in a state of absolute nudity,
Like Powers' Greek Slave, or the Medici Venus;
But I do mean to say I have heard her declare,
When, at the same moment, she had on a dress
Which cost five hundred dollars, and not a cent less,
And jewelry worth ten times more, I should guess,
That she had not a thing in the wide world to wear!

I should mention just here, that out of Miss Flora's
Two hundred and fifty or sixty adorers,
I had just been selected as he who should throw all
The rest in the shade, by the gracious bestowal
On myself, after twenty or thirty rejections,
Of those fossil remains which she called her "affections,"
And that rather decayed, but well-known work of art,
Which Miss Flora persisted in styling her "heart."
So we were engaged. Our troth had been plighted,
Not by moonbeam or starbeam, by fountain or grove,
But in a front parlor, most brilliantly lighted,
Beneath the gas-fixtures we whispered our love.
Without any romance, or raptures, or sighs,
Without any tears in Miss Flora's blue eyes,
Or blushes, or transports, or such silly actions,
It was one of the quietest business transactions,
With a very small sprinkling of sentiment, if any,
And a very large diamond imported by Tiffany.

On her virginal lips while I printed a kiss,
She exclaimed, as a sort of parenthesis,
And by way of putting me quite at my ease,
"You know, I'm to polka as much as I please,
And flirt when I like—now stop, don't you speak—
And you must not come here more than twice in the week,
Or talk to me either at party or ball,
But always be ready to come when I call;
So don't prose to me about duty and stuff,
If we don't break this off, there will be time enough
For that sort of thing; but the bargain must be
That, as long as I choose, I am perfectly free,
For this is a sort of engagement, you see,
Which is binding on you but not binding on me."

Well, having thus wooed Miss M'Flimsey and gained her,
With the silks, crinolines, and hoops that contained her,
I had, as I thought, a contingent remainder
At least in the property, and the best right
To appear as its escort by day and by night;
And it being the week of the Stuckups' grand ball—
Their cards had been out a fortnight or so,
And set all the Avenue on the tiptoe—
I considered it only my duty to call,
And see if Miss Flora intended to go.
I found her—as ladies are apt to be found,
When the time intervening between the first sound
Of the bell and the visitor's entry is shorter
Than usual—I found; I won't say—I caught her—
Intent on the pier-glass, undoubtedly meaning
To see if perhaps it didn't need cleaning.
She turned as I entered—"Why, Harry, you sinner,
I thought that you went to the Flashers' to dinner!"
"So I did," I replied; "but the dinner is swallowed,
And digested, I trust, for 'tis now nine and more,
So being relieved from that duty, I followed
Inclination, which led me, you see, to your door.
And now will your ladyship so condescend
As just to inform me if you intend
Your beauty, and graces, and presence to lend
(All which, when I own, I hope no one will borrow)
To the Stuckups', whose party, you know, is to-morrow?"

The fair Flora looked up with a pitiful air,
And answered quite promptly, "Why, Harry, mon cher,
I should like above all things to go with you there;
But really and truly—I've nothing to wear."

"Nothing to wear! go just as you are;
Wear the dress you have on, and you'll be by far,
I engage, the most bright and particular star
On the Stuckup horizon"—I stopped, for her eye,
Notwithstanding this delicate onset of flattery,
Opened on me at once a most terrible battery
Of scorn and amazement. She made no reply,
But gave a slight turn to the end of her nose
(That pure Grecian feature), as much as to say,
"How absurd that any sane man should suppose
That a lady would go to a ball in the clothes,
No matter how fine, that she wears every day!"

So I ventured again—"Wear your crimson brocade"—
(Second turn up of nose) "That's too dark by a shade."
"Your blue silk"—"That's too heavy;" "Your pink"—"That's too light."
"Wear tulle over satin"—"I can't endure white."
"Your rose-colored, then, the best of the batch"—
"I haven't a thread of point lace to match."
"Your brown moire antique"—"Yes, and look like a Quaker;"
"The pearl-colored"—"I would, but that plaguy dress-maker
Has had it a week"—"Then that exquisite lilac,
In which you would melt the heart of a Shylock."
(Here the nose took again the same elevation)
"I wouldn't wear that for the whole of creation."
"Why not? It's my fancy, there's nothing could strike it
As more comme il faut—" "Yes, but dear me, that lean
Sophronia Stuckup has got one just like it,
And I won't appear dressed like a chit of sixteen."
"Then that splendid purple, that sweet Mazarine;
That superb point d'aiguille, that imperial green,
That zephyr-like tarlatan, that rich grenadine"—
"Not one of all which is fit to be seen,"
Said the lady, becoming excited and flushed.
"Then wear," I exclaimed, in a tone which quite crushed Opposition, "that gorgeous toilette which you sported
In Paris last spring, at the grand presentation,
When you quite turned the head of the head of the nation;
And by all the grand court were so very much courted."
The end of the nose was portentously tipped up,
And both the bright eyes shot forth indignation,
As she burst upon me with the fierce exclamation,
"I have worn it three times at the least calculation,
And that and the most of my dresses are ripped up!"
Here I ripped out something, perhaps rather rash,
Quite innocent, though; but, to use an expression
More striking than classic, it "settled my hash,"
And proved very soon the last act of our session.
"Fiddlesticks, is it, Sir? I wonder the ceiling
Doesn't fall down and crush you—oh, you men have no feeling,
You selfish, unnatural, illiberal creatures,
Who set yourselves up as patterns and preachers.
Your silly pretense—why, what a mere guess it is!
Pray, what do you know of a woman's necessities?
I have told you and shown you I've nothing to wear,
And it's perfectly plain you not only don't care,
But you do not believe me" (here the nose went still higher),
"I suppose if you dared you would call me a liar.
Our engagement is ended, Sir—yes, on the spot;
You're a brute, and a monster, and—I don't know what."
I mildly suggested the words—Hottentot,
Pickpocket, and cannibal, Tartar, and thief,
As gentle expletives which might give relief;
But this only proved as spark to the powder,
And the storm I had raised came faster and louder,
It blew and it rained, thundered, lightened, and hailed
Interjections, verbs, pronouns, till language quite failed
To express the abusive, and then its arrears
Were brought up all at once by a torrent of tears,
And my last faint, despairing attempt at an obe-
Ervation was lost in a tempest of sobs.

Well, I felt for the lady, and felt for my hat, too,
Improvised on the crown of the latter a tattoo,
In lieu of expressing the feelings which lay
Quite too deep for words, as Wordsworth would say;
Then, without going through the form of a bow,
Found myself in the entry—I hardly knew how—
On door-step and sidewalk, past lamp-post and square,
At home and up stairs, in my own easy-chair;
Poked my feet into slippers, my fire into blaze,
And said to myself, as I lit my cigar,
Supposing a man had the wealth of the Czar
Of the Russias to boot, for the rest of his days,
On the whole, do you think he would have much to spare
If he married a woman with nothing to wear?

Since that night, taking pains that it should not be bruited
Abroad in society, I've instituted
A course of inquiry, extensive and thorough,
On this vital subject, and find, to my horror,
That the fair Flora's case is by no means surprising.
But that there exists the greatest distress
In our female community, solely arising
From this unsupplied destitution of dress,
Whose unfortunate victims are filling the air
With the pitiful wail of "Nothing to wear."
Researches in some of the "Upper Ten" districts
Reveal the most painful and startling statistics,
Of which let me mention only a few:
In one single house, on the Fifth Avenue,
Three young ladies were found, all below twenty-two,
Who have been three whole weeks without any thing new
In the way of flounced silks, and thus left in the lurch
Are unable to go to ball, concert, or church.

In another large mansion near the same place
Was found a deplorable, heart-rending case
Of entire destitution of Brussels point lace.
In a neighboring block there was found, in three calls,
Total want, long continued, of camel's-hair shawls;
And a suffering family, whose case exhibits
The most pressing need of real ermine tippets;
One deserving young lady almost unable
To survive for the want of a new Russian sable;
Another confined to the house when it's windier
Than usual, because her shawl isn't India.
Still another, whose tortures have been most terrific
Ever since the sad loss of the steamer Pacific,
In which were ingulfed, not friend or relation (For whose fate she perhaps might have found consolation,
Or borne it, at least, with serene resignation),
But the choicest assortment of French sleeves and collars
Ever sent out from Paris, worth thousands of dollars,
And all as to style most recherché and rare,
The want of which leaves her with nothing to wear,
And renders her life so drear and dyspeptic
That she's quite a recluse, and almost a skeptic,
For she touchingly says that this sort of grief
Can not find in Religion the slightest relief,
And Philosophy has not a maxim to spare
For the victims of such overwhelming despair.
But the saddest by far of all these sad features
Is the cruelty practiced upon the poor creatures
By husbands and fathers, real Blue-beards and Timons,
Who resist the most touching appeals made for diamonds
By their wives and their daughters, and leave them for days
Unsupplied with new jewelry, fans, or bouquets,
Even laugh at their miseries whenever they have a chance,
And deride their demands as useless extravagance.
One case of a bride was brought to my view,
Too sad for belief, but, alas! 'twas too true,
Whose husband refused, as savage as Charon,
To permit her to take more than ten trunks to Sharon.
The consequence was, that when she got there,
At the end of three weeks she had nothing to wear;
And when she proposed to finish the season
At Newport, the monster refused out and out,
For his infamous conduct alleging no reason,
Except that the waters were good for his gout;
Such treatment as this was too shocking, of course,
And proceedings are now going on for divorce.

But why harrow the feelings by lifting the curtain
From these scenes of woe? Enough, it is certain,
Has here been disclosed to stir up the pity
Of every benevolent heart in the city,
And spur up Humanity into a canter
To rush and relieve these sad cases instanter.
Won't somebody, moved by this touching description,
Come forward to-morrow and head a subscription?
Won't some kind philanthropist, seeing that aid is
So needed at once by these indigent ladies,
Take charge of the matter? or won't Peter Cooper
The corner-stone lay of some splendid super-
Structure, like that which to-day links his name
In the Union unending of honor and fame;
And found a new charity just for the care
Of these unhappy women with nothing to wear,
Which, in view of the cash which would daily be claimed,
The Laying-out Hospital well might be named?
Won't Stewart, or some of our dry-goods importers,
Take a contract for clothing our wives and our daughters?
Or, to furnish the cash to supply these distresses,
And life's pathway strew with shawls, collars, and dresses,
Ere the want of them makes it much rougher and thornier,
Won't some one discover a new California?

Oh ladies, dear ladies, the next sunny day
Please trundle your hoops just out of Broadway,
From its whirl and its bustle, its fashion and pride,
And the temples of Trade which tower on each side,
To the alleys and lanes, where Misfortune and Guilt
Their children have gathered, their city have built;
Where Hunger and Vice, like twin beasts of prey,
Have hunted their victims to gloom and despair;
Raise the rich, dainty dress, and the fine broidered skirt,
Pick your delicate way through the dampness and dirt,
Grope through the dark dens, climb the rickety stair
To the garret, where wretches, the young and the old,
Half starved and half naked, lie crouched from the cold.
See those skeleton limbs, those frost-bitten feet,
All bleeding and bruised by the stones of the street;
Hear the sharp cry of childhood, the deep groans that swell
From the poor dying creature who writhes on the floor,
Hear the curses that sound like the echoes of Hell,
As you sicken and shudder and fly from the door;
Then home to your wardrobes, and say, if you dare—
Spoiled children of Fashion—you've nothing to wear!

And oh, if perchance there should be a sphere,
Where all is made right which so puzzles us here,
Where the glare, and the glitter, and tinsel of Time
Fade and die in the light of that region sublime,
Where the soul, disenchanted of flesh and of sense,
Unscreened by its trappings, and shows, and pretense,
Must be clothed for the life and the service above,
With purity, truth, faith, meekness, and love;
Oh, daughters of Earth! foolish virgins, beware!
Lest in that upper realm you have nothing to wear!

"SEE THOSE SKELETON LIMBS, THOSE FROST-BITTEN FEET, ALL BLEEDING AND BRUISED BY THE STONES OF THE STREET."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. G.—Drape your skirt over a black silk skirt. It is not necessary to have a puff on the under-skirt. Sashes will be very little worn.

SHAGPOT.—Braid your little salmon-colored suit with white. A white straw turban or a cottage bonnet of white silk all studded with white field daisies with yellow centres would be pretty with this dress.

IMPATIENCE.—Your suggestions are good. Side pleatings of Swiss muslin edged with patent Valenciennes are more used on silk dresses than puffs of Swiss. A white chip gypsy trimmed with pale blue, and a long black dotted net veil.—We do not give premiums.

A SUBSCRIBER.—We always advise muslin in preference to tarlatan or grenadine for graduating dresses. Read Girls' White Dresses in Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV.

M.—Make a black cashmere suit by pattern of Short-Sacque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. The sacque and over-skirt of cashmere, the under-skirt of silk. Talmas will be worn in the street. Short basques are worn with long over-skirts.

H. K. D.—English mohair and yak cloth are as thick as alpaca, and are silky and dressy-looking. You can also have grenadines over silk. Cheap grenadines, black striped with white, are being made up at small cost. You will find piqué almost as warm as alpaca.

MOTHER.—Answers to all your queries about children's clothing are embodied in the New York Fashions of Bazar No. 18, Vol. IV.

HOBOK.—We think that the "Moon Hoax" was republished some time since, at the death of the author, Locke, but presume that it is now out of print. You can find it at the libraries.

CHERRY BLOSSOM.—You should take leave of your guests in the parlor, and not accompany them to the door, leaving other friends alone, even for a moment.

KNOW NOTHING.—If the asparagus exceeds fourteen inches and three-fourths in length, it should by all means be held between the finger and thumb and eaten gradually and gracefully. The head should not be thrown back at a greater angle than forty-five degrees.—The victim of a "surprise party" will doubtless manifest no surprise at supplementary calls. It is not necessary to make party calls on a gentleman unless he is out of employment.

"GEORGE ELIOT."—The author of "Adam Bede" is the wife of G. H. Lewes. Her maiden name was Marian Evans.

MOBILE, ALA.—The meaning of Mr. Nast's picture, "Marriage à la Mode," seems to us so obvious that he who runs may read. Every one knows how the King of Siam, when he wishes to ruin a man, presents him with a white elephant. The sacred animal, which can neither be killed nor sold, and which consumes daily as much as a small village, soon brings the unfortunate owner to poverty. It is a repetition of the old story of the girl who betrayed the gate of the city to the Roman soldiers for the ornaments, meaning the gold bracelets, they wore on their arms. Affecting to misunderstand her, they flung their bucklers on her in passing and crushed her to death.

LITTLE BROWN JUG.—It is not proper for a schoolgirl of fifteen to receive attentions from young gentlemen, and decidedly indecorous to allow them to kiss her hand. Indeed, the freedom of manners displayed by school-girls in this respect, and the waste of the precious time which should be devoted to their education prior to their entrance into society, make one wish at times to immure the whole race till they should have gained some education, with the wisdom and delicacy which spring from it.

WILL.—Have you not seen our refusal to instruct our readers in the art of handkerchief or other flirtations? Those who are not adepts already in this sort of knowledge will be none the better for the teaching.

ISABELLA S.—If you have not self-control enough to avoid disfiguring your nails by biting them, we advise you to get some kind friend to tie your hands till you are cured of this bad habit.—We do not vouch for the advertisements in our columns, and can tell you nothing about the article in question.

J. A. S.—If it is your engagement-ring that the lady has worn for eight or nine months, and then removed, we advise you not to take it for granted that the engagement is thereby broken without further assurance; and if the engagement-ring was placed on her finger by some one else, we really can not see how you are concerned in the matter.

POOR AND PROUD.—We think that ordinary aptness and a good common-school education would be sufficient prerequisites for the study of telegraphy. We can not tell you precisely how long it would take to learn it, or whether there is a school for ladies in Ohio. Address your questions to Harper & Brothers.

INVALID READER.—Helen and Iphigenia are the first two personages alluded to in Tennyson's "Dream of Fair Women."

MRS. PHILIP P. C.—You can order the binder from a stationer.

L. M.—We supply back numbers of the Bazar for ten cents a copy.

M. H. W.—Your summer serge polonaise can be stylishly trimmed with bias silk bands without fringe, and the polonaise costume is also worn in the house. See New York Fashions of Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV.

MRS. LAURA H.—If your letters have not been answered individually, and are not yet awaiting room for insertion, we have included replies in the New York Fashions.—Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., will tell you how to trim a lavender silk, and No. 17 will describe the lining and other details of grenadine suits.

J. N.—Make your suit by the apron-polonaise pattern sent you. Trim polonaise with two bias silk bands, and flounce the skirts.

A. B.—A visit to Niagara Falls is the favorite bridal trip.—The third finger of the left hand is the wedding-ring finger. Bride and groom wear gloves alike during the ceremony; gray or brown gloves for traveling. Bonnets are worn to church; hats are losing favor.

M. B. G.—Get gros grain to match your dress for an over-skirt. Striped linens are sold here for forty cents a yard. Get gray mohair or heavy undressed linen for your traveling suit, and make by pattern of Short-Sacque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. A black Neapolitan gypsy bonnet would be becoming and stylish.

L. W. K.—Your ideas about the braces are correct.

C. A. C.—Make little girl's merino dress with basque and two skirts like patterns in Supplement of Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV. Trim with bias silk bands. Make young lady's suit with short sacque and over-skirt by cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Young ladies wear straw gypsy bonnets and long black net veils.—Your patterns were sent on receipt of order. If they did not reach you, they must have been lost in the mails, for which we are not responsible.

ELLA D.—Long over-skirts and short basques will continue to be worn.

JENNIE S. D.—Black under-skirts and gray polonaises are still fashionable. Flounce the lower skirt, and put a plain bias silk band on the upper.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—For your black alpaca suit use cut paper pattern of Short-Sacque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Ruffles will be worn all summer.

MATTIE A.—It is not positively necessary to issue cards for a quiet wedding. New York Fashions of Bazar No. 14, Vol. IV., will enlighten you.—Get white organdy or else Chambery gauze.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Small checked silks are more stylish than the largest size of your samples; but stripes are preferable to any check.

BRUNETTE.—Carry your handkerchief in your pocket, except for full dress occasions, when a handkerchief chain is used.

MRS. S. L. G.—For making grenadine suit consult New York Fashions of the last Bazar.

R. T. D.—Make black suit by pattern sent you, trimming with ruffles and lace. To make a suit of your gray dress shorten the skirt, and trim with brown flounces of the same material. Then make apron-polonaise of the brown fabric, trimmed with ruffles of the same.

M. C. C.—A black Irish poplin for an elderly lady will look well made by pattern of Short-Sacque Suit in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Trim with bands of silk, fringe, and a deep flounce.

ALICE.—Trim your alpaca with bias gathered ruffles of the same. For the brown goods use bias bands piped with silk.

JANE.—Make your white alpaca with postillion-basque, simple upper skirt, and slight train. Trim with bias folds of the same piped with white silk. Cut the neck of the basque pointed, and put a standing quilling of lace inside.—We do not give addresses in this column.

MRS. M. L. P.—Make your pretty undressed cambric by pattern of Short-Sacque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Trim with scant, straight ruffles edged with narrow bias fluted ruffles of the same.

H. L.—For your black silk suit use the pattern of Postillion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. Trim with ruffles and thread lace. You should have a basque and long over-skirt for your green poplin. Bias bands of silk with fringe for trimming.

GYPSY JANE.—A traveling dress is most suitable to be married in at 8 A.M. Get gray poplin or silk pongee, and make by Short-Sacque Suit in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. A morning wrapper of pearl gray or drab will not be too conspicuous for a bride at a hotel.

D. E. F. G.—To improve your bad complexion we recommend plain diet and plenty of out-door exercise.

INQUIRER.—An entire suit of Scotch Cheviot, very dark ground with line stripes of white, is what you want for traveling. Light brown overcoat of summer cloth.

CONSTANT READER.—For an elegant suit of parlor furniture get red satin bordered with black velvet. The wood is black-walnut with gilt tracings. The mantel drapery, also of satin, should match the lambrequins. These will require an upholsterer.

HOUSEKEEPER.—For hints about hall furniture and carpets read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 19, Vol. IV.

DORA D.—Your English mohair is suitable for the street. Make by the Apron-Polonaise Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV. Trim with bias bands of brown silk. A suit similarly made of gray pongee will answer for traveling. Gray straw gypsy with grey ribbon and pink roses.

GEORGIANNA.—Make your white satin jean with apron-polonaise and single skirt. The silk is passée; but it is probable that robe flounces will be revived.

TAKE AYER'S PILLS for all the purposes of a purgative, for Constipation, Indigestion, Headache, and Liver Complaint. By universal accord they are the best of all purgatives for family use.—[Com.]

IF you would have no gray hairs use Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer, the only sure preventive.—[Com.]

To have elegant, light Biscuits, Rolls, Buckwheat Cakes, Fruit Dumplings, etc., you should use Dooley's Yeast Powder. Ask your Grocer for it. Prepared by DOOLEY & BROTHER, New York.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA will cure CONSUMPTION. Try it!—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

DIAMOND D MOHAIR.

It is an old maxim that a good article is always the cheapest in the end, and to nothing does this more fully apply than alpaca. Unfortunately, it is almost impossible for the consumer to know a good make from a bad one till worn, and the only safe course to pursue is to purchase a make that is known and guaranteed to wear well. The Diamond Mohair is one of the honest old original makes that first rendered the fabric popular for their brilliancy, color, and lasting qualities, and are as well made now as they were twenty years ago.

Retailers say they are difficult to introduce at first, ladies preferring heavier and more leathery goods. But these goods are warranted double warp, and are as heavy as an alpaca can honestly be made. The leathery goods are produced by elastic dressing and an undue quantity of cotton, and, of course, they soon get fuzzy, crease and wrinkle easily, and lose their color, and the dress is done.

The Diamond Mohairs, made only from the best alpaca yarn, are naturally brilliant, and will not lose their brilliancy; springy, and will not crease; and, having no dressing in them, are not injured by water.

Observe the brand, and do not be persuaded to take any other till you have tried these goods once, and you will find you have a handsome dress that will remain handsome.

Now to be had from nearly all first-class retailers.

APRIL, MAY, and JUNE purify the blood and beautify the complexion by using HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

In the Spring and Summer months the system undergoes a change. This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

Prescriptions accurately compounded. French, German, and Spanish spoken. Stores open all night.

P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

SECTS and CREEDS DIFFER,

But there are no dissenters from the general principle that a great medicine is a great blessing. We have many of these blessings, but among them all, in the province to which it belongs, no greater than

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

A column would not suffice to enumerate the ailments for which it is prescribed by physicians of the highest standing. It does not belong to the class derisively termed patent medicines, but is an article based on scientific analysis, and will stand the test of the sharpest and most rigid medical criticism as a cathartic, a stomachic, an anti-febrile preparation, and an admirable remedy for all bilious complaints.

Let there be no mistake. Secure the genuine article only.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

No more delightful travels are printed in the English language than appear perpetually in Harper's Magazine. They are read with equal interest and satisfaction by boys of every grade from eighteen to eighty. Its scientific papers, while sufficiently profound to demand the attention of the learned, are yet admirably adapted to the popular understanding, and designed as much to diffuse correct information concerning current scientific discovery as it could be if it was the organ of the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There are few intelligent American families in which Harper's Magazine would not be an appreciated and highly welcome guest. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

HARPER'S BAZAR.
Pleasure Instruction

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

This paper at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

FACETIÆ.

LADIES who faint in church are like good resolutions—they want carrying out.

ART DOGMA.—An artist's wife never admires her husband's work so much as when he is drawing her a check.

"Steam," said Dr. Lardner, "is the great annihilator—it annihilates time and space."

"Yes," said a listener, "and multitudes of passengers too."

MORE FROM MRS. MALAPROP.—Our esteemed friend has been spending a few days in the country, which, she says, is looking dutiful. Spring flowers are springing up in most luxurious confusion. Bandylions are abundant in the meadows at the back, and her front garden is full of scarlet agapemones.

THE BEST WAY TO MAKE A RICE-PUDDING—The milky way.

A POSTHUMOUS CHILD (generally)—Appreciation.

A TEMPTATION.—A book, by a delightful writer, is announced, with the title of "My Study Windows." Has the author well considered what he is doing? Has he reflected on the consequences of such a provocative title, on the number of imitations it is sure to engender, such as "My Parlor Fire-Place," "My Drawing-Room Ceiling," "My Kitchen Chimney," "My Front-Door Knocker," "My Nursery Cupboard," "My Library Wainscot," etc.?

A FLATTERING REQUEST!

LADY OF THE HOUSE. "Oh, Signor Bernolski, I am so Glad you've Come! we're all so dreadfully Dull! Now do Sit down and Play us that lovely Sonata of yours. They'll never Begin to Talk till they hear the Piano going!"

"A MEMORY KEAN."

UNCLE OLDSORT. "You! recollect Edmund Kean, Sir! Pack of nonsense—boy like you!"

YOUNG ONE-O'CLOCK. "By Jove, I do, though: Fact is, you're always jawing about him so that nobody can ever forget him."

THE HAPPIEST AGE FOR YOUNG WOMEN—Marriage; at least so they think.

A gentleman was observed the other day beating a retreat. On being caught he said, by way of an excuse for his conduct, that it had struck him suddenly. The matter is still under investigation.

A SHINE.—A young fellow who had been married for a twelvemonth said it was all sunshine, the next twelvemonth was all moonshine, and the later period of his matrimonial career was without shine at all, except when his better half took it into her head to "kick up a shine!"

A WOODEN MAN—An alderman.

"MY MOTHER BIDS ME BIND MY HAIR."—Your mother gives you good advice. "Safe bind, safe find," you know. April breezes have sometimes the force of Indian scalping-knives.

THE CORRECT CUT.

YOUNG LADY. "You will pardon the remark, Mr. Splashbrain, but what a gorgeous shirt front!"

MR. S. "Ya-as; I may say it has been my sole study this month past."

YOUNG LADY. "What a pity you are not a shirt-maker!"

ONLY RIGHT SHE SHOULD.

REVEREND GENTLEMAN. "You don't come to Church as often as you used to, Mrs Chops."

MRS. CHOPS. "No, Sir, I knows I don't, but I oughter, I'm sure, 'cause you has a deal o' Meat of us."

HINTS ON GARDENING:

ESPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR YOUNG BEGINNERS.

Clearing the Ground.—This is the first operation. Gather together all the sticks and stalks and rubbish which have littered your garden throughout the winter, and put them in a heap to burn. The best day to select for the fire is your wife's washing-day. As soon as the linen is in the garden set light to your pile, taking care to burn a few sheets and things. This will probably result in the washing being put out in future—at any rate, if the washing isn't, your wife will be. Besides, she is sure to come out to converse with you the moment your bonfire blazes up, and it is pleasant to have a chat in the garden on a fine morning.

Digging.—If the weather is wet or chilly, this is done easiest by hiring a man—say at $2 a day—to do it for you, stopping in bed yourself. You'll find it cheering to the spirits to lie snug and warm in bed, and hear somebody else at work in the damp garden. Directly the sun comes out, it is a good plan to walk up and down the path, smoking a meerschaum and looking on while your deputy perspires over his spade. It will give you an appetite for breakfast. Try it.

Sowing.—When your ground is all prepared, then is the time usually chosen to put in seeds. Don't do this on any account. It is a great bother, and difficult to accomplish without getting your hands dirty, and making your back ache. A better plan by far is to wait till somebody brings the plants in pots to your door, all a-blowing and a-growing, and then buy them, and place them in your garden, pots and all. But if once you put seeds in the ground, it is not always easy to find them again, especially the little ones.

Pleasures of Gardening.—These are enormous. Every day the attentive gardener will find something fresh to attract his notice and employ his mind. To-day some extraordinary growth (probably a rank and noisome weed) appears. To-morrow some cherished plant disappears—some one has got over your wall and "requisitioned" it. Rare forms of animal life, too, show at frequent intervals—slugs, lice, caterpillars, sow-bugs, and your neighbors' chickens and cats—all these make things lively for you, and you throw half bricks and probably swear at these last in the most unaffected manner. In short, there is no form of relaxation open to a busy man which, for placid comfort and quiet interest, can be compared to a garden.

A PACKING CASE.

MARY. "What, Tommy! Eaten Five Buns and want another?"

TOMMY. "Yes, please, Mary. I'm not a bit Uncomfortable—YET."

Many years ago, in the so-called "good old times," a gentleman, having set foot for the first time in Ireland, repaired to a hotel for something to eat, and was accommodated with a roast fowl. He was proceeding to eat it when his plate divided with a sharp crack, and the wing, to which he had just helped himself, flew up to the ceiling. Soon afterward an excited waiter rushed into the room, crying, "He's safe, he's safe!"

"Who's safe?" inquired the bewildered traveler.

"Mr. O'Musgrave, Sir," said the waiter, in explanation: "the captain fired in the air!"

It thus became apparent to the gentleman that a duel had been fought in the room beneath, and, without stopping to finish his repast, he ordered his luggage to be packed, and left Ireland immediately.

A GOOD WAY TO EXPAND YOUR CHEST—Carry a big heart in it.

TO A YOUNG BEGINNER.—Mock-turtle is not made out of tortoise-shell cats—as a rule.

People who are always fishing for compliments do not need very long lines. They will get their best bites in shallow water.

LADY GARDENING.—Make your beds early in the morning; sew buttons on your husband's shirts; do not rake up any grievances; protect the young and tender branches of your family; plant a smile of good temper in your face; carefully root out all angry feelings, and expect a good crop of happiness.

VERY ACCOMMODATING!

PORTER. "Werry sorry, Sir, but this yere's the Ladies' Compartment."

CALM BEING. "Delighted, ah'm shaw! Show 'em in! And, I say (aside), the Youngest for Preference!"

Lord Seaforth, who was born deaf and dumb, was to dine one day with Lord Melville. Just before the time of the company's arrival, Lady Melville sent into the drawing-room a lady of her acquaintance who could talk with her fingers to dumb people, that she might receive Lord Seaforth. Presently Lord Guildford entered the room, and the lady, taking him for Lord Seaforth, began to ply her fingers very nimbly; Lord Guildford did the same, and they had been carrying on a conversation in this manner for about ten minutes when Lady Melville joined them. Her female friend immediately said, "Well, I have been talking away to this dumb man."

"Dumb!" cried Lord Guildford; "bless me, I thought you were dumb!"

COURT-PLASTER—Kisses.

"THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN SLEEP!"—Bad habits are hard to overcome. How true this is is shown in the case of those who live too rapidly, for even when they go to rest they are known to be fast asleep.

A man, commenting upon the ruins of Pompeii, said that it was a very imposing city, but very much out of repair.

In reply to a young friend leaving a town because some things in it were not exactly to her taste or content, an old lady of experience said, "My dear, when you have found a place where every body and every thing are always pleasant, and nothing whatever is disagreeable, let me know, and I'll move there too."

the fronts (Figs. 1 and 2). Hem down the extra material at the right underlapping front (Fig. 1), and furnish it with button-holes. At the front edge of the left underlapping front only from the upper edge to the end of the waist the extra material is left for a fly. Furnish the latter with buttons, and hem down the extra material of this front from the end of the waist to the bottom. Cord the top and bottom of the fronts (Fig. 1). Sew up the back from 6 to 7, and baste the underlapping fronts (Fig. 1) to the under side of the fronts (Fig. 2), according to the corresponding figures and signs. Face the bottom of the waist and the front edges of the fronts (Fig. 2) with a strip of gray lustring an inch and a half wide, at the same time sewing a fly furnished with eyes to the left front from the neck to the beginning of the underlapping front. Furnish the right front with the requisite hooks. Cord the neck, and trim the waist as shown by the illustration and indicated on Fig. 2. Cut the sleeve from Fig. 20, No. V., of Supplement to Harper's Bazar, Vol. IV., No. 20, but two inches and two-fifths longer than this pattern. To the bottom of the sleeve sew a gathered ruffle twenty-four inches long and ten inches wide, which is sloped toward the ends to a width of six inches. The ruffle is edged with lace. The seam made by sewing on the wide ruffle is covered with narrow box-pleated ruffles; between the latter is a fold edged at both lengthwise sides with a cording of gros grain. Finally, sew the sleeve into the corded armhole.

Fig. 3.—GRAY SILK SKIRT AND VELVET BASQUE. For this basque cut of net, stiff interlining, and silk lining two pieces from Fig. 5, of velvet, stiff interlining, and silk lining two pieces from Fig. 6, one piece from Fig. 7, and the sleeves from Fig. 8, observing the contour of the under part of the sleeve. Cover the fronts from the front edge to the straight line with black gros grain, and the remainder with velvet, and sew up the darts in the fronts. Face the right front with a strip of silk an inch and three-fifths wide, and work button-holes on it. On the left front set a fly furnished with buttons. Cut a slit in the back along the double line on Fig. 7 from the under edge to ∗, and join the back, side forms, and fronts according to the corresponding figures. Run the material and lining together along the under edge of the basque, including the slits, and cord the neck. Trim the waist with a fold of gros grain as shown by the illustration; this fold covers at the same time the seam made by sewing the gros grain to the velvet. Sew up the sleeves from 16 to 17 and from 18 to 19, run the material and lining together at the bottom, set on the fold, and sew the sleeve into the armhole, according to the corresponding figures. In doing this lay a pleat, bringing × an ●.

Fig. 4.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD. Dress of brown cashmere. Jacket of black velvet trimmed with white swan's-down. The skirt is cut out in tabs, as shown by the illustration, and trimmed with black velvet. Below the tabs a side-pleated ruffle of cashmere. A similar ruffle forms the trimming for the sleeve. Figs. 9 and 10 give the pattern for the jacket.

Fig. 5.—SUIT OF BLACK BEAVER MOHAIR. This trained skirt is trimmed with three folds of brown gros grain. The high-necked, plain, straight waist and the sleeves are trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with folds of the material, which are edged with a cording of brown gros grain, and furnished with brown silk fringe.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Work out of Sight.

MY DEAR EUGENE,—It is the inevitable condition of our journey that we should see each other very closely. We can not help it. We are necessarily so near that if my neighbor has a cast in his eye I can not escape remarking it; and if Edwin speaks harshly to Angelina I am compelled to observe it. Yet we are singularly unconscious of this very evident truth, or if not unconscious, we are very careless; and I know of nothing that would mend our manners more surely than a closer attention to it. I was reminded of it the other morning, when, having gone to pass a day in the country, I was talking of travel with Daniello. We were crossing a deep and picturesque gorge upon a light bridge, and I remarked to him that it was curious what sense of security was given to us by a mere hand-rail; and that I, who am always giddy upon any exposed height, found my nerves so steadied by the slight barrier that I walked as if upon the firm ground. Then I remembered that when I was ascending the highest spire of the Milan Cathedral my head swam so that I was obliged to sit down and close my eyes.

"And I," said Daniello, "when I was upon the Milan Cathedral I lost myself, as you lost your head, and wandered about for a long time in that glittering wilderness of sculptured marble before I could find my way down. But wherever I went every thing was as carefully finished as if it had been intended to be constantly seen. And you also must have remarked," he continued, "that the most inaccessible and hidden points and parts are as elaborately wrought as the most conspicuous."

Of course I had remarked it, Eugene; for you have perhaps observed that one traveler has always seen what another saw in the same place. But I confounded Daniello by saying that not only had I seen it in the Milan Cathedral, but that I had remarked it in many of my fellow-travelers. And I hope you have also; for as there is no architecture so wonderful as a human life, so that is finished in the noblest specimens with all the conscientious care of any Greek temple or Gothic cathedral. The finished detail which is so satisfactory and delightful shows itself in a hundred ways. Yesterday I was reading a charming criticism of the poetry of the minne-singers and the life of that age. "They must have been happy times, those times of the Crusades!" says my author, and I can see the sweet smile upon his face as he writes the word, and lifts his eyes and looks out of the window far away. He did not think only, you see, of the horrible wars and ignorance and suffering; of superstition and degradation; of Gurth the swineherd lying upon the English hill-sides with a graven collar about his neck, "born thrall of Cedric the Saxon." He did not think only of the discomforts and tragedies of the time, but he remembered that there were other things. He reflected that the sky was as blue and sparkling, the air as cool and inspiring, the flowers as sweet and fair; that the men were as honest and brave, the women as beautiful and true, in those old days as in the very day upon which he sat writing of them; that they loved and wept and sang with the old, old feeling forever new; and the sympathies of that critic were so sensitive to all that old life that he could not help exclaiming, "They must have been happy times!" The feelings that were turned to those times, usually so inaccessible to our imagination and sympathy, were as fresh and generous as those with which he touches the life of to-day. They were spires and cornices out of sight wrought with all the elaborate care of those that are to be constantly seen.

Look at the same principle in another way, dear Eugene, and tell me how many of us could bear to be tested by it in the details of daily life. When Pater was deciding to send Filius away to school, he went quietly to the school itself, at an hour when he knew that Dr. Magister was engaged with his classes, and tutor Ferule showed him through the building. But first he went to the bedrooms and the washrooms. "If they are neat and spacious," said Pater, "I shall know that I need not trouble myself about the rest." If you are well gloved and booted, say the French, it is enough. It is not enough; but you see what the remark suggests. Now which of us, Eugene, can endure the ordeal of an unexpected examination of our bureaus and closets? You know, with all the world, how exquisitely Mrs. Mechlin is always dressed. Her toilettes, as the young people say, are superb. Yet are we quite sure that if she had not the most orderly of maids we should not find her room in the wildest confusion?

I remember when I was a very little boy—but little boys observe closely and remember forever—I was sent one day by my lovely young aunt to her room to bring something which she had forgotten. She was very beautiful, and she dressed herself so as not to sacrifice any advantage, and especially this day she had taken particular care, for her lover had come, and she was very happy, and with fine instinct she had made herself resplendent. I bounded up the stairs and burst into her room. I am an old gentleman, Eugene, but I remember, as of yesterday, the clothes upon the floor, the slippers and the rest scattered about, the bureau drawers open, and the contents carelessly tumbled together, the chaos of the wardrobe, and the consternation of my mind as I beheld it, not knowing why I was so troubled.

But when, after much searching, I could not find what my lovely aunt wanted, and descended to tell her so, although she was as beautiful as ever and as charmingly arrayed, there was a curious shade upon the splendor. Now my aunt's lover was one of the best of men, and one of the most orderly; and often through their married life, when I have remarked a little alienation of feeling, enough sometimes to make them unhappy, it has involuntarily occurred to me that his wife's habit of carelessness in little details was like a thorn in his shoe. Love idealizes. The lover believes no ill of his beloved. And I suppose that my feeling of disappointment when I descended from the unavailing search in my aunt's room was that the impression of her beauty was not quite honest. It implied more than the truth. One side of the spire was exquisitely wrought, but the other was coarse, unhewn marble. It was not, like the old temple and the cathedral, a work of conscience.

In the same way you may observe the manners of many persons, Eugene. They are soft and gentle and persuasive. Some that I might mention are so captivating that I forget myself, and imagine that I am in the highest society. But the pretty sculpture is all upon the front. It is a work of the decline of art. The voice that is so very sweet to me is very harsh to somebody in the other room—wife, husband, child, servant, I know not. But I perceive with every sound that it is not a wilderness of conscientious sculpture in which I find myself, but only a counterfeit. It is veneer and paint, while I thought it real marble. For, my dear Eugene, a manner which is only a manner is repulsive. It is like the rouge of which I was speaking the other day. If the color is that of rosy health, it is beautiful. If it is paint, it is shocking. There are people who have feline manners—who are so gentle and soft that you expect to hear them pur in the pauses of conversation. They are much praised for the smoothness and ease of their address. But it is all external. The moment that you discover the manner is like a glove, which is put on and off, you are painfully anxious to know what it covers. And when you discover, it is as when you ascertain that the carved stone which has charmed you is not a work which the artist has wholly informed with life, but which has been cut upon one surface by a stone-cutter.

I know, Eugene, that you will ask me if it is not better to have the outside of the cathedral carved than to have all unsculptured. It is undoubtedly very pleasant to perceive how much conscience went to the work of the old architects, but is not the rule universal that half a loaf is better than no bread? Or, to put it pointedly, as I know you prefer, my dear young friend, I hear you asking me if it is not better that the coat of my fellow-traveler should be well brushed, even if his linen be soiled, than that coat and linen together should be unsightly? Yes, my boy; but we are looking for rules. And the rule for the architect is that every part of his work shall be finished with equal conscience and care. All, indeed, are not equally important; but the care with which each should be wrought in its degree is equally important. The artist's own soul would have been dissatisfied if, as he looked upward at his great cathedral, he knew that heaven with all its eyes beheld a fault which not a single human eye could see. His soul, loftier than the proudest pinnacle or spire, worked not for the human eye alone, but for its own supreme satisfaction. And his rule must be our traveling regulation. Let us be sure, Eugene, that so far as depends upon us, our lives and habits are symmetrical—that what is not seen and seldom known except to ourselves is as worthy approval as we try to make what is most conspicuous.

There was Cinderella, who had in her soul all the grace and loftiness and charm that her sisters assumed to have, but of which they had only the plumes and the train. And by-and-by the fairy godmother touched the pumpkin and the rats and mice and poor Cinderella herself, and off she rolled in splendid state to the royal ball. The prince, delighted—and with the sure princely instinct which detects a pea under twenty beds of down—perceives that this is a queenly lady, and must share his throne. The magic hour begins to chime, and away she flies, and reaches home a Cinderbreech. Then comes the prince's page to test the feet of beauty—the humblest test for highest place—and Cinderella's foot alone is fitted by the slipper, and she becomes the royal bride. But what is it that the fairy godmother does? She merely shows the hidden side. She reveals the graces and the beauties that only Heaven has known. Indeed, what was seen hardly hinted the beauty and the charm. The exaltation of Cinderella was only the presentation to the world of the perfect symmetry that the world had not suspected. It was the discovery, as upon the great temple and cathedral, that the character was fully rounded.

For I hope, my dear Eugene, you do not imagine that Cinderella sitting by the kitchen fire was not really beautiful and bewitching. You might as well suppose that the exterior of the Milan Cathedral is not glittering and beautiful because those details high up on tower and roof are so exquisitely wrought. And I say again, as I said to Daniello, happy is he who finds many Cinderellas among his fellow-travelers.

Your friend always,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

WORKING, TRADING, AND CHEATING.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

THE problems of life are harder to solve than any to be found in books, and the powers we bring to the solution are not often so well trained as those which grapple with the higher mathematics. Yet failure to solve them aright is sometimes more productive of unhappiness than is an ignorance of the multiplication-table. So we go on trying, cast down, but not destroyed; bruising our heads against blank walls, but never ceasing for that to beat against blank walls.

"Ten years ago," says my friend the mechanic, "a young man worked for me who never could have made a mechanic; but he found he could buy and sell, and he went into the business of selling leather. Report has it that he made ten thousand dollars last year. I don't believe that a single man that worked at making that leather made a thousand dollars. During the ten years I have worked steadily, adding to the wealth of the world, and haven't been able to accumulate a thousand dollars in all that time.....Skill in trading, in taking advantage of others, is the road to success."

This is undoubtedly a fair statement, except, perhaps, the implied identity of "trading and taking advantage of others;" but what then?

"Why, then," says my friend, intensifying his hardships by repetition, "I think I am as intelligent a man as he. I know that I have got as much education, and I know I am a first-rate workman at my trade; yet he makes ten thousand a year, and I with difficulty get a respectable living."

That may be, but whose fault is it? How shall we induce him to assume your difficulty and relinquish to you his income?

"There is no remedy," says my friend, with the energy of despair. "The Creator of the world when he made it established this law. The strong shall consume the weak, and the strong have been robbers and thieves from that time to this. The poor and weak don't like it, and I can see but one way of escape: that is, become strong themselves, become robbers and thieves, for that is what it amounts to."

Now here, under a rough shell, lies a kernel of truth, and of ultimate truth. Not by complaint, petition, or declamation can the weak escape the penalties of weakness, but by becoming strong. Strength is not plunder, but it is power. The weak are not necessarily victims, but they often are sufferers. Who is the robber when the trader gets ten thousand a year and the workman barely one? The young man confessedly could not be a mechanic, and could buy and sell. Was he wrong, or did he wrong any one, when he ceased trying to do what he could not do, and began doing what he could do? One man is as good a workman as another is a trader; but which demands the most or the highest skill? The workman works on dead matter, however skillful he is—works by routine. The laws of wood and water, and metal and fire, are well known and unchangeable. The work to be done to-morrow is the same that was done yesterday. But the trader deals with what are to human vision uncertainties. He must look the world over. He makes ten thousand this year, but he may lose twenty thousand next year. The ambition of a foreign emperor, nay, the advent of a little caterpillar, may overthrow all his plans and baffle all his calculations. His mental faculties must be perpetually on the alert, and a single error of judgment may precipitate fatal disaster. The workman may go on if he choose thinking of nothing, noting nothing, but the material that lies before him. Is it robbery, is it unjust, that the strain and stress of all the powers should receive a larger remuneration than the partial employment of a few? that the absorption of mental faculties should be counted a thing of far greater value than the occupation of physical faculties? When the trader loses ten thousand a year, does the workman complain that he loses nothing, or that his loss is as small as his profit in proportion to his employer's?

And, again, if the young trader makes ten thousand to the workman's one, why does not the workman turn trader? The trading thief or robber can not prevent him. If he choose to leave his bench and set up a counting-room, the world is all before him where to choose. The successful trader began on as small a capital as the unsuccessful workman. He has no power to force men to buy or sell. He may, of course, lie; doubtless he often does lie; but it is not an inherent part of the business. Trading is not necessarily taking advantage of others, any more than it is taking advantage of yourself, unless it means that every thing ought to stay where it is forever. The trader may be just as much a benefactor as the workman. If a poor widow kills her cow, or loses it by accident, she is far better off to have the leather-dealer's money than she is to retain the cow's hide. He does not rob her by buying it. He does not even take advantage of her any more than he gives advantage to her. He may, owing to her ignorance, put her off with half price; but that is cheating, not trading. So the shoe-maker puts cheap leather in one shoe and good leather in the other; but that is not a part of shoe-making, it is cheating. When the leather-dealer sells his leather he is not the benefactor or the beneficiary of his purchaser. In fact, I can not see why the leather-dealer is not adding as much to the wealth of the world as the leather-maker. Leather laid up on the shelf is not wealth; it is leather in circulation that is wealth. Take away leather-selling, and leather-making would quickly follow. Take away leather-sellers, and leather-makers would have a far harder time than they have now. It is because long trial has established the fact that, on the whole, it is better for producers to appoint some person to carry their produce to market than it is for each producer to leave his work and trot off to market himself that these middlemen exist. It is because, on the whole, good middle-men are more rare than good workmen that middle-men are paid so much more than workmen. That workmen do not ostensibly appoint traders does not affect the case. The supply of trade comes at the demand of work. One workman is just as free to leave his bench and turn trader as another. If he can not do it —if he does not like it or does not feel able to succeed in it—it is no fault of the trader. It is a matter that lies between him and his Maker. A man may just as well complain of being robbed of his just rights because he has not the strength of a horse, the buoyancy of a bird, the swiftness of the wind, as because he has not the breadth of vision, the keenness of perception, the rapidity and correctness of judgment, necessary to constitute a successful trader. If these are to be compassed by his own efforts, it is his own fault that he has them not. If they depend upon the Creative Will, who is to blame for the deficiency?

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

LINGERIE.

THE word lingerie is now applied not to linens merely, but to laces, muslins, and the many washing garments of a lady's outfit. In examining the lingerie stock we find that collars and cuffs of finest linen, plainly made, are used on most occasions in preference to those more fancifully trimmed. First, there are collars of but one thickness of sheer linen, bordered by a hem or band of linen stitched near the edge. For ladies with short necks, an admirable shape is turned down flatly all around, quite narrow behind, and sloped to broad points before; the shape most generally worn, however, has a standing band behind and turned-over points in front. When worn, the front points are not laid smoothly over the neck-tie beneath, but are made to stand almost erect, like the English collar worn by gentlemen. This takes away the primness, and may seem a small matter to relate, but on this the "style" of the collar depends. Such collars are 25 cents each. The cuff to match is square, and fastened by three linen buttons: price 60 cents. These fit far better when attached to an under-sleeve, and the open-wristed sleeves of dresses make an under-sleeve necessary. A novelty in imported linen sets is the "favorita," a low-throated linen collar with deep points, bordered with a percale band of scarlet, blue, mauve, or black, to match the dress with which it is worn. Shaded needle-work, in thick, raised patterns, done by nuns in French convents, is the most tasteful and durable ornament for linen sets: price $8 for collar and under-sleeves. Revering, in block patterns, is lighter and a prettier ornament for summer sets: these cost from $3 25 to $3 75. Quantities of Valenciennes lace are used on linen, and very little of this is the real hand-made lace. The patent German laces, in Valenciennes designs, copy real French laces so perfectly that a connoisseur is sometimes deceived by them. A medallion of Valenciennes in a square tab trims the front of the newest lace-trimmed collars: price $3 50. With pointed tabs of lace, collars of domestic make cost from $1 to $2; those imported, from $2 to $4. Fancifully shaped bows of Valenciennes insertion and lace are worn at the throat with black silk dresses, and also with dresses trimmed with white lace: they cost from $3 to $4. A pretty neck-tie is made of sheer white lawn, folded around the neck with a sailor knot in front, lined with pink or blue silk, and edged with Valenciennes. Mourning cravats made in the same way are of organdy or tarlatan, with bows of revering and black ribbon: price $1 25. Bows of seeded revering edged with a ruffle of footing are worn also by ladies in mourning: price 80 cents. The Marie Antoinette collar, or regalia, as some call it, of folded organdy, with seeded reverse bands and fluted footing, brightens a mourning dress: price $3. Flowing under-sleeves are required with the present style of dress sleeve. A novelty used for these is embroidered tulle in bands and frills, a showy fabric, but not very durable. A ruffle of Swiss muslin, embroidered, edged with lace, and gathered to a band, describes the under-sleeve most used. The Swiss pleated flounces sold by the yard are purchased by many ladies, and basted to a band that is sewed inside the elbows of the dress sleeve. This makes the most inexpensive under-sleeve. Sleeves of wash net are finished by a side-pleated ruffle of the net doubled.

Fichus are not much worn at present. The only novelty is in those of the favorite duchesse lace. The newest shapes are without long sash ends, simply lapping in front. The prettiest Valenciennes fichus have insertion strips in the centre of the cape, with a border of medallions: price $24.

Swiss muslin bodies, or blouses, have a large Marie Antoinette collar of lace and appliqué embroidery, with flowing ruffles on the sleeves: price $6 50. Linen blouses, or habit shirts, pleasant for morning and country wear, are made of fine Richardson's linen. They are not fastened to a belt, but are made long on the hips, and held snugly at the waist by drawing-strings. There are three box-pleats, an inch wide, down the centre and back. The collar is a standing band with turned-over points in front; the sleeves are ample, coat-shaped, slightly gathered into a square cuff of doubled linen. The furnishing houses charge $5 for such waists. These waists are also made of striped linens, a bold stripe of black or scarlet making the most stylish garments: price $3 to $3 50.

Caps and camisoles form part of a lady's morning lingerie. The coiffure cap worn at breakfast by young married ladies is of French nansook lightly embroidered; the head piece is diamond-shaped; the long rounded tabs edged with lace are tied beneath the chignon. More matronly caps have crowns, with drawing-strings behind, and do away with the trouble of a chignon. They cost from $2 50 to $4. Camisole is the name given to a variety of sacques from the simplest toilette sacque used when dressing to the loose muslin jackets, elaborate with lace and embroidery, that matrons wear until the luncheon hour. The shape is simply a loose, ample sacque reaching to the hips, with seams only on the shoulders and under the arms. The plainest have eight or ten tucks each side of a box-pleat down the front, and are merely hemmed around the bottom. Thick nansook or cambric is the material. French camisoles have a revers at the throat, and are needle-worked all around and edged with Valenciennes: price $12. Very handsome ones made here have bands of insertion and lace down the front, a large empress collar, and half-flowing sleeves. These are merely hemmed around the edge, as that gives them a negligee appearance. Worn over a handsome corset cover, with a coiffure cap, and a demi-train skirt of black silk, these make a home-like toilette for mornings.

Lovely white robes for summer mornings are displayed ready made in great boxes that show the dress at its full length. They are of Swiss muslin or organdy, a demi-train and little English sacque, that will fit almost any one. One style has a wide flounce around the skirt, hemmed but covered with needle-work, while on the front width are three flounces extending to the belt. Another has an embroidered tablier over the whole front width, with three flounces on all the other widths. They cost from $40 to $75. For invalids are loose flowing robes, also imported, of thicker fabric, costing from $20 to $24. The upper part is tucked to outline a yoke. Tucks and patent Valenciennes extend down the front and around the slightly trained skirt. Very simple morning robes of Gabrielle shape are made of nansook, with tucks and puffs down the front and a little lace on the collar and sleeves: these cost $15. Elaborately trimmed robes, with diagonal puffs between bands of needle-work, and the skirt finished with a fluted flounce edged with Valenciennes, range from $75 to $100.

Swiss muslin flounces in pleats all turned one way appear in various ways on summer toilettes. In the broadest patterns, about six inches wide, they are used for freshening up last year's silks, two such flounces being placed around the trained skirt, and the evening toilette completed by a simple upper skirt of Swiss muslin and a basque, or else a polonaise trimmed to match. This is a stylish plan for black silks as well as light ones. The wide Swiss flounces made up admirably are sold for 60 cents a yard. Narrower pleatings two inches wide for necks and sleeves of dresses, for over-skirts, basques, and, above all, for edging the flounces of colored and black silks, cost from 25 cents upward. Ladies who desire to make their own flounces are advised that they are merely crossway strips of Swiss muslin hemmed on each edge, and laid in the kilt pleats so often described, not sewed in tucks, but ironed flatly after being pleated and held down by a band of the Swiss a quarter of an inch wide stitched on with two rows of stitching an inch below the top. On broad flounces the hem on the lower edge is an inch wide, the upper edge very narrow.

UNDER-CLOTHING.

The furnishing houses still commend the standard brands of linen and muslin hitherto quoted in these columns. Each brand, however, is advised for special garments—as Wamsutta for chemises and drawers, Lonsdale for skirts and gowns. New York Mills is heavy for ladies' use, though preferable to all others for gentlemen's shirts. It is now selling for 21 cents a yard, Wamsutta for 20 cents, and Lonsdale for 15 cents. At these rates every lady can afford an abundant supply of under-clothing made of good fabrics. The furnishing houses show low-priced under-clothes, such as chemises for $1, and drawers for 80 cents; but they are of sleazy muslin, poorly made, hence we do not commend them, except for poor women who have no time to do their own sewing. A woman of true refinement has even more regard for the neatness of her under-clothing than for her outer apparel, and if she have leisure, would rather spend a dollar for the material of a garment, and make it herself, than to wear coarse ready-made clothes. The plainest well-made chemises of Lonsdale or Wamsutta muslin, with bands and sleeves of the same, are $1 75; with tucked yokes, $2; with a little embroidery, and a ruffle not of the finest, $2 50. Lonsdale cambric, much thinner than muslin, is used for summer chemises, costing from $3 50 to $4 50. The bands are formed of a puff with stitched strips on each side, and a ruffle. The cheapest chemise of Richardson's linen is $4. The pointed band, or yoke, is tucked. If a ruffle is added, the price is $4 50.

Very broad bands or yokes are worn on chemises. Three inches is often the measure at the narrowest part on the shoulders or behind, while the front is deeply pointed, and in many cases trimmed separately from the body of the garment, to serve as a corset cover. A puff and ruffle, or tucks and narrow Valenciennes edging, trim muslin chemises. Lengthwise insertions of Valenciennes, or medallions of the same lace, trim fine linen chemises. Drawers are trimmed to match the band and sleeves of the chemise with which they are worn. They are short, not very wide, and made to button at the side.

The long sacque-shaped night dress is preferred for summer wear. The upper part of the gown is tucked to represent a yoke, and strengthened by tapes underneath. These are made of pretty good muslin, though not of the standard brands, for $2 50. The prettiest sleeves for gowns have a square double cuff, and are shaped like under-sleeves. Sets of the three garments —chemise, drawers, and gown—are made to match. One marked $60 had a cambric gown with square tucked yoke edged with needle-work and lace, and linen chemise and drawers trimmed to correspond.

White muslin skirts of walking length should be made wider than when dresses were fully gored. They measure three yards and a half or three-quarters around, and have a gored front width, a broad gore on each side, and a full back breadth. These are sold in muslin of light quality, that takes the starch well, for 75 cents. A two-inch hem and ten or twelve tucks are the trimming. Lengthwise tucks in a strip a finger and a half deep, sewed on only at the top and set upon the skirt, not at the edge, are a popular trimming for white skirts. Sometimes a row of diagonal tucking or a band of insertion heads the French perpendicular tucks. The lower edge is hemmed, and held in place by stitching. Cambric pleatings, diagonal, headed with Hamburg insertion, are sold for 45 cents a yard. Narrower lengthwise tucks and Hamburg work are 25 cents. Demi-trained skirts, to wear under dresses of the same length, are trimmed with a flounce of the rich guipure embroidery, with deep vandykes of puffs and insertion. A flounce around such skirts assists in holding the dress train gracefully. Valenciennes lace edges pleated and fluted flounces on such skirts; but lace is too frail a trimming for this purpose.

Furnishing houses supply outfits of under-clothing at various prices. For instance, a trousseau consisting of half a dozen sets of the four principal under-garments, with flannel skirts, corset covers, dressing sacques, and a robe de chambre, may be had for $150. More elaborate garments, and a dozen sets of each, cost from $200 to $250.

PERSONAL.

MR. BRYANT'S recent letter, detailing his way of life and the food he eats, has led to research as to the victual of other eminent authors. Dr. PARR was strong on hot boiled lobsters; POPE, who was an epicure, melted at stewed lampreys; Dr. JOHNSON went in for leg of mutton; DRYDEN'S weakness was for bacon; CHARLES LAMB'S, for roast pig; BYRON dined four days in the week on fish; LISTON, the comedian, drank only water, and ate little animal food; Sir ISAAC NEWTON, when writing the "Principia," confined himself to bread, water, and vegetables; FROISSART ate and drank every thing; ditto SHERIDAN, BROUGHAM, SCOTT, FOX, BURKE, PITT. The writer of these "Personals" has a high opinion of water and vegetables, but has been known to tamper with steaks, and slake with claret.

—Mr. BONNER, who keeps a large horse account on the books of his ledger, has been to far-off Kentucky to buy a sweet colt called Mambrino Bertie, of whom he says: "In my opinion he is the most extraordinary colt the world has produced; never saw a horse that trots with so much ease; is nearly as large as the Auburn horse, but is more rangy ['rangy' is good], and has a longer stride." The price paid for this startling creature is not stated—probably two or three hundred thousand.

—A very agreeable reception of the better Bohemian element of London is held once a month at the house of a Mr. WILSON, a poet of some local repute, who has a beautiful and accomplished wife. Among those who may be found there are BACON, the sculptor; PROCTOR, the comic artist; BARNES, the painter; Mr. W. SIMPSON, a well-known editor; Mr. WILLIAMS, who writes the leaders of the Standard; MARSTON, the dramatist; CRESWELL, the actor; MILLS and COBLEY, of musical celebrity; and the comedian TOOLE, who dines with the Prince of Wales, is presented to the Princess, and receives presents of jewelry as a token of royal friendship.

—Miss NABBY JOY—blessings on her memory!—has bequeathed to the Consumptives' Home, $10,000; Boston Marine Society, $5000; Sailors' Snug Harbor, $5000; Boston Pilots' Relief Association, $5000; Charitable Fund of the Fire Department, $4000; and two or three one-thousand-dollar bequests to other charities.

—WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER, Esq., one of the ploddingest and most successful lawyers of New York, and author of that clever poem, "Nothing to Wear," contributes to the June number of Harper's Magazine another brilliant humorous poetical effusion entitled "General Average."

—A few days since the New York Chamber of Commerce held its one hundred and third annual meeting, at which President WILLIAM E. DODGE remarked that in looking over the records he had discovered that several of the members, including HENRY W. FIELD, HENRY DURAND, J. R. HURD, Mr. CAREY, S. MARSH, and JOHN A. STEVENS, now living, were elected more than fifty years ago. Which goes to show that to be a New York merchant and member of the Chamber of Commerce is conducive to longevity.

—Speaking of Thomas, a writer in a European paper remarks that it is the champion democratic name. Did you ever in the course of your reading meet with the Christian name of THOMAS in connection with royalty, either as emperor, king, prince, royal duke, or any scion of royalty, either in ancient or modern times?

—JAMES W. GERARD, so long one of the leaders of the Bar of this city, and one of the most agreeable and wittiest of men, is the especial delight of the children of our public schools, whom he very frequently addresses. A few days since he spoke about the Suez Canal, and one of the cleverest men of the State—a member of Congress—tells the Bazar that it had all the fascination of an Oriental tale.

—Among the men who are reckoned rich in Virginia, only three or four are rated above $200,000. The four richest men in the State are WILLIAM T. SOUTHERLIN, of Danville; JAMES THOMAS, of Richmond; JOSEPH ANDERSON, of Richmond; and FRANKLIN STEARNS, of Richmond. SOUTHERLIN possesses several first-class tobacco plantations, is a tobacco manufacturer, and owns one of the best residences in the South. THOMAS is about sixty, ten years the senior of SOUTHERLIN, and is worth $150,000. ANDERSON has half a million; made most of it casting cannon during the war. STEARNS is a native New Englander, who went to Richmond early in life as a canal-digger. He never kept any Confederate money in his possession, but invested it in land, and is now the possessor of much soil all about Richmond. He was a great peace-maker and large distiller during the war.

—In the present British cabinet are several gentlemen very active in their religious duties. Mr. GLADSTONE is known as a man who leads a very exemplary and truly religious life. Lord Chancellor HATHERLY is a Sunday-school teacher of a quarter of a century's experience. The Duke of Argyle, Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. FORSTER, Mr. STANSFIELD, and Lord Halifax identify themselves more or less with the various religious movements of the day.

—Illinois has another benefactor in ex-Governor JOHN WOOD, of Quincy, who has given a $50,000 mansion in that city, together with furniture, and a block of ground surrounding, for the establishment of a female seminary, with the express understanding that it shall be open to all denominations. The gift is valued at $500,000.

—An English maiden, Miss BRACHENBURY, desiring, like PEABODY, STEWART, and other "givists," to enjoy in this life some of the delights of benefaction, has signified her intention of giving the sum of fifty thousand dollars for the establishment of a medical school in connection with Owens College, Manchester.

—The Emperor of Germany is a practical printer. All his family are obliged to have some trade. He chose "the art preservative of arts," and worked at the case three years.

—Lord Walsingham, at present in New York, en route to San Francisco, is an enthusiast in botany, and takes with him two naturalists for the collection of objects in that department of science. Lord W., by the death of his grandmother, Lady Frankland Russell, has recently inherited two fine estates in Yorkshire, viz., the Alwark estate, about eleven miles from York, and the Bluber estate, near Leeds.

—A lady of New England, Mrs. ELIZABETH TABOR, of New Bedford, Massachusetts, proposes to erect in Marion handsome buildings for the use of a library and a natural history society, at a cost of about ten thousand dollars. Forever will she be pleasantly remembered by the Yankee of those parts.

—Mr. CHILDS, of the Ledger, having the largest and best newspaper building in Philadelphia, and publishing the most widely circulated and one of the best papers of the time, is now erecting, for the comfort of himself and the troops of friends whom he entertains with refined and bounteous hospitality, a white marble palace, at the southeast corner of Twenty-second and Walnut streets. It will be one of the most spacious and superb of the many fine residences for which the Quaker City is famous; and if there be any one man in the country connected with the press who will so use it as to do honor to the profession, it is Mr. CHILDS.

—An indiscreet Mr. FORBES has been shot for "personally insulting" the people of Cheyenne. He attempted to deliver a temperance lecture there.

—Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD will probably be the next Governor-General of Canada.

—It is stated that the day before General HARRISON was inaugurated, President VAN BUREN called on him, and said, "Is there any thing I can do to oblige you?" "Yes," said General H.; "my son-in-law, General PIKE, died on the battle-field, and left an only son, whose inclinations are, as his father's, for the army. I can not appoint him." "Is that all?" said the President. And in two hours the commission was signed and sent to the young man.

—Prince BISMARCK is to receive, in recognition of his services to Germany, a grant of 1,000,000 thalers; General MOLTKE, 500,000; and Generals GARBEN, WERDER, and FRANSECKI 300,000 each. Commanders of army corps will receive smaller sums.

—Still another sketch of Germany's principal German, by one who has just seen him in Berlin: "BISMARCK is an immensely large man, tall, straight, and well-proportioned. His broad shoulders and full breast bespeak an immense force. He is not fat (where a German ought to be fat), but his cheeks are so fat as to almost close his eyes, though since the war he seems to have grown a little thinner. He has a large head, which is bald on the top (the comic papers invariably represent him with three hairs), and on the sides has a little short half-gray hair, which is in marked contrast with his full white mustache. His nose is rather short, and his eyes imbedded under a heavy brow. His face is almost as white as his mustache, and is full of vigorous expression. When he sits he commonly leans forward, as if just ready to get up; and those portraits of him appear most natural which represent him in this position. His only joint would seem to be in his loins, for his back and neck are always kept straight. He is commonly in uniform, and his coat shines all over with bright buttons and brilliant badges. He is a man that any one would pick out of a crowd as a leading character. When he enters the Chamber every eye is turned to him, and many show him special marks of honor; so that his first movements on entering are to politely return these signs of respect, both to the members of the Reichstag and to visitors. For, as often as he has already appeared in the Reichstag, the general curiosity to see him has never abated, so that every body must look when BISMARCK comes. He always sits at the ministers' desk, and seems to pay little attention to the debate, though he is always ready to speak."

—The annual boat-race between Oxford and Cambridge has become one of the institutions of England, and the picked men who compose the crews enjoy a place in the British bosom that is not accorded to other under-graduates, no matter how clever their attainments or brilliant their genius. It is among the curious reminiscences connected with this annual national event that Bishop SELWYN, of Lichfield, and Bishop TYRRELL, of Newcastle (Australia), rowed in the Cambridge boat, and Bishop WORDSWORTH, of St. Andrews, in the Oxford boat, in the first race between the two colleges that was ever rowed, the latter winning. Bishop SELWYN, though a close student and thorough scholar, excelled when in college in manly exercises, and especially, as the boxers say, "knew how to put up his hands."

Crochet Net for Fish, Crabs, etc.

ONE end of this net is shaped like a round basket, and is designed to hold crabs; while the other end is in the form of an ordinary net, and serves to hold fish. The original is crocheted with gray thread and white knitting cotton. Steel rings, closely worked over with gray thread and furnished with a crochet cover of gray thread, are passed over the net. Work, first, the flat bottom of the basket as follows: Work with gray cotton a foundation of 8 st. (stitches), close this in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and work the 1st round.—3 ch. (chain stitch), which are counted as the first dc. (double crochet), but the third ch. with white cotton; then with the white thread 1 dc. on the first foundation st.; this dc. must be worked off with the gray thread instead of the white. Now work on each of the remaining 7 foundation st., including the sl. by means of which the foundation is closed in a ring, 1 gray and 1 white dc., always working off the gray dc. with the white, and the white dc. with the gray thread. 2d round.—1 gray dc. on the third of the 3 ch., which were counted as the first dc. of the preceding round, * 1 white and 1 gray dc. on the first (white) dc. of the preceding round, 1 gray dc. on the following dc., and repeat from . In doing this it is to be observed that in this, as in all the remaining rounds of the bottom, before passing from one color to the other, the last gray or white st. should always be worked off with the new thread, and the working thread used so far must be continued on the under side of the work until it is to be used. 3d round.— After the first dc. of the preceding round (thus between this and the following dc.) 1 gray and 1 white dc., after the following dc. 2 gray dc., after the following dc. 1 white and 1 gray dc., and repeat from . 4th round.— After the first (white) dc. of the preceding round 2 white dc., after the following dc. 1 gray dc., after the following dc. 2 gray dc., and repeat from . 5th round.— After the first dc. of the preceding round (thus between the 2 white dc. there) 1 white dc., after each of the following 3 dc. 1 gray dc., after the next dc. 1 white dc., and repeat from . 6th round.— After each of the first 3 dc. of the preceding round 1 gray dc., after the following dc. 1 white dc., after the following dc. 2 white dc., repeat from . 7th round.— After each of the first 2 dc. of the preceding round 1 gray dc., after each of the following 3 dc. 1 white dc., after the following dc. 1 gray dc., and repeat from . 8th round.— After the first dc. 1 gray dc., after each of the following 3 dc. 1 white dc., after the following dc. 1 gray dc., after the following dc. 2 gray dc., and repeat from . 9th round.— After each of the first 3 dc. of the preceding round 1 white dc., after each of the following 2 dc. 1 gray dc., after the following dc. 2 gray dc., after the following dc. 1 gray dc., and repeat from *. At the end of the round fasten to the first dc. with 1 sl. This completes the bottom. For the edge of the basket work with gray thread a foundation corresponding to the circumference of the bottom (126 st. in the original), and on this crochet the 1st round.—Alternately 4 gray, 3 white dc.; work off each fourth gray dc. with the white, each third white dc. with the gray thread. At the end of the round fasten to the first dc. with 1 sl., and work the 2d–10th rounds only with the white thread as follows: 2d round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., then 1 dc. after each of the following 3 gray dc., * 4 ch., with these pass over the following 3 (white) dc. of the preceding round, 1 dc. after each of the following 4 dc., and repeat from *. At the end of this, as in all the following rounds of the edge, work 1 sl. on the third of the ch. worked at the beginning of the round. 3d round.—8 ch., with these pass over the first 4 dc. of the preceding round, then always alternately 5 dc. on the first ch. scallop of the preceding round, 5 ch. 4th round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., then 5 dc. on the next ch. scallop, then always alternately 6 ch., with these pass over the next 5 dc. of the preceding round, 6 dc. on the next ch. scallop. 5th round.—10 ch., with these pass over the next 6 dc., then always alternately 7 dc. on the following ch. scallop, 7 ch. 6th round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., then 6 dc. on the next ch. scallop, then always alternately 7 ch., with these pass over the next 7 dc. of the preceding round, 7 dc. on the next ch. scallop. 7th round.—11 ch., with these pass over the first 7 dc. of the preceding round, then always alternately 8 dc. on the following ch. scallop, 8 ch. 8th round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., then 7 dc. on the first ch. scallop, then always alternately 8 ch., with these pass over the next 8 dc. of the preceding round, 8 dc. on the next ch. scallop. 9th round.—12 ch., with these pass over the first 8 dc. of the preceding round, then always alternately 9 dc. on the next ch. scallop, 9 ch. 10th round.—3 ch., which count as first dc., then 8 dc. on the first ch. scallop, then always alternately 9 ch., with these pass over the next 9 dc. of the preceding round, 9 dc. on the next ch. scallop. This completes the part of the edge worked with white knitting cotton. Now take the gray thread again, and on the st. of the first round of the edge work the 11th round as follows: * After the first and second of the next two white dc. of the first round, thus passing the needle between the dc., work 2 dc. each, and after this 4 ch. At the end of this, as of the remaining rounds of the edge, work 1 sl. on each dc. of the first double crochet figure at the beginning of the round. 12th round.—* 5 dc. between the first 4 white dc. of the second round, at the same time surround the ch. scallop of the third round, which is above this (instead of the first dc. at the beginning of each round, work always 3 ch.), then 5 ch., and repeat from . 13th round.—Always alternately 6 dc. on each double crochet figure of the third round, and at the same time on the ch. scallop of the fourth round above this, then 6 ch. In this manner work the 14th–19th rounds on the st. of the 4th–10th rounds, but now the dc. and the ch. must be widened in proportion to the widening done in the 5th–10th rounds. Then work with gray thread the 20th round.—On each dc. at the upper edge of the crochet part 1 sc. (single crochet), in working the sc., which meet on the white dc. of the upper edge, at the same time surround the next ch. scallop of the 19th round. Now follows the 21st round.—1 dc. on each st. of the preceding round (passing the needle through the front of the two upper veins of each sc.). 22d round.—Like the 21st round, but now pass the needle through the back of the two upper veins of each st. of the 20th round; besides this, work this round on the under side of the crochet part. Pass a whalebone, twenty-seven inches and three-fifths long, which is closed in a ring, between the stitches of the 21st and 22d rounds, then work on both rounds together, so that they are joined with each other, the 23d round.—Sc. For the lace shown by the illustration at the upper edge of the basket work one round of sc., passing the needle through the horizontal vein of each st. of the 20th round; in doing this hold the work so that the 23d round is turned downward. 2d round of the lace.—Always alternately 3 sc. on the next 3 sc. of the preceding round, 6 dc. on the following st. Finally, work the foundation st. of the edge of the basket and the st. of the last round of the bottom together from the outer side by means of sc.; these sc. must be worked at the same time over a foundation of white woven cord. For the net, close a foundation corresponding to the circumference of the basket (in the original 256 st.) to a ring, and on this work the 1st round.— 7 ch., with these pass over 5 foundation st., 3 sc. on the next 3 foundation st., after working the third sc. pass the crochet needle through, below the ch. scallop previously worked, to the under side of the work, throw the working thread over once, and draw it below the ch. scallop referred to through the loop on the needle. Repeat from *. 2d–65th rounds.—Like the 1st round, but now work each 3 sc. on the ch. scallops of the preceding round; besides this, in working the 19th–44th rounds, form a slit, working, not, as usual, always going forward, but going backward and forward. With the 66th round the scallop design for the other end of the bag is commenced. Work this round as usual, only form a dot four times at regular intervals, each dot forms the point of a scallop, and consists of 4 dc., which are worked on the corresponding ch. scallop; after working the fourth dc. of each dot pass the crochet needle through, below the ch. scallop previously worked, to the under side of the work, throw the working thread over once, and pass it through the loop on the needle. 67th round.—Like the 66th round, but now form one dot before and after each dot of the preceding round, and work 3 ch. between both dots. 68th–73d rounds.—Like the 67th round, but now widen the dots of each scallop by one dot in each round. 74th round.—One dot on each ch. scallop of the preceding round, after each dot 3 ch. 75th round.—Like the 74th round, but now work for each dot not 4, but 3 dc.; besides this, instead of each 3 ch., work only 2 ch. 76th round.—Like the 75th round, but each dot counts not 3, but 2 dc.; after each dot work only 1 ch. 77th round.—Always alternately 1 dc. on each ch. of the preceding round, 1 ch. 78th and 79th rounds.—1 dc. on each ch. of the preceding round, but work off each 2 dc. lying next to each other not separately, but together. Gather the st. of the last round, then fasten on there a tassel of gray thread, which is furnished with a crochet cover of gray thread. The edges of the slit formed in the net are worked over in sc. with gray cotton. Finally, cover the inner side of the bottom of the basket with gray carriage leather and then with gray linen (the latter is fastened all around with button-hole stitches); sew the net with its foundation st. to the upper edge of the basket, and pass on the two slides referred to. Each slide is made of a covered steel spring nine inches and one-fifth long, the ends of which are laid over each other two-fifths of an inch and joined. Then wind gray cotton closely over each slide, and furnish it with a crochet cover of ch. and sc. To prevent the slides from slipping off the net, it is well to fasten them to the ends of a piece of gray cord twenty inches long, and to fasten the middle of this cord to one edge of the slit, thus securing them to the net.

SECTION OF PARASOL COVER.—SWISS APPLICATION AND LACE.

Crochet Garter.

See illustration on page 340.

THIS garter is crocheted in an open-work design with red saddler's silk; two pieces of black silk elastic braid, two-fifths of an inch wide each, are drawn through the garter, which is closed at the front with a button and a cord loop; the closing is covered with a rosette of red silk ribbon, embroidery, and beads. Begin the garter at one lengthwise edge with a foundation of 180 st. (stitches), and on this crochet the 1st round.—1 tc. (treble crochet) on the first foundation st., * 1 tc. on the following foundation st., 2 ch., 1 tc. on the third following foundation st. The tc. last referred to is fastened to the middle of the tc. previously worked; it is crocheted as follows: Throw the thread over twice, pass the needle through the middle vein of the tc. previously worked, throw the thread over, pass the needle through the third following foundation st., and work off together each two and two veins on the needle (each thread thrown over on the needle is also counted a vein); throwing the thread over once, 1 tc. on the following foundation st., and repeat from *. At the end of the round turn the work, and crochet, going backward, the 2d round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on each st. of the preceding round; in doing this pass the needle through the back of the two upper veins of each st. At the end of the round again turn the work, and crochet the 3d round like the 2d round. Lay the working thread on anew at the beginning of the preceding round, and work the 4th round like the 1st round. 5th round.—Always alternately 6 dc. (double crochet) on the first 2 ch. of the preceding round, 1 sc. on the two upper veins of the following single tc. Finally, crochet a round on the other lengthwise edge (foundation st.) of the work like the 5th round. Then pass two pieces of elastic braid, each twelve inches long, of the width already mentioned, through the 1st and 3d rounds in such a manner that all the single dc. lie on the under side of the braid, and the cross double crochet on the right side of the braid. Bind the crosswise sides of the garter with red silk; in doing this sew in at the same time the ends of the elastic, and sew on a button and cord loop for closing. Set a rosette on the end furnished with the cord loop. For this rosette cut of red silk ribbon four-fifths of an inch wide fourteen pieces from Fig. 60, Supplement; lay each of these parts in a fold along the straight lines given, and trim the point thus formed in point Russe with black silk as shown by the illustration; lay the lower corners over on the under side along the dotted lines given, and sew the edges of the material which meet together. Then sew the points on a round foundation of stiff lace as shown by the illustration, furnish the middle of the rosette with a round piece of cut jet, and surround the latter with large black jet beads.

Mat for Small Dogs.

See illustration on page 340.

THIS oblong mat is nineteen inches long and thirteen inches wide. It is made of a double layer of gray linen filled with sea-moss or curled hair, and covered with a quilt of blue cashmere, edged with blue twisted woolen fringe three inches deep. To make the mat cut first of gray linen two oblong parts, which must be an inch and three-fifths larger all around than is desired for the size of the mat. Put between these a layer of sea-moss or curled hair an inch and a quarter in thickness, and run the outside and interlining together at a distance of four inches from the edge. Fill the space thus left with a thicker layer of sea-moss or hair, so as to make a roll, and overhand the edges of the linen together over the interlining thus formed. The mat is next furnished with a cover of blue cashmere quilted in diamonds over cotton batting; the edge of the cover is folded over two-fifths of an inch wide on the under side and fastened, and is also sewed on at the inner edge of the raised edge. Finally, sew the woolen fringe to the under side of the mat, and cover the bottom with carriage leather or oiled linen.

Rosette for Caps, Handkerchiefs, etc.

See illustration on page 340.

THIS rosette is worked on fine linen, cambric, or Swiss muslin, according to the purpose for which it is designed. To work the embroidery stretch the thread bars with tatting cotton, work on these in button-hole stitch, and work the rosette figures and wheel at the middle of the rosette as shown by the illustration. In working the button-hole stitch bars and rosette figures the needle must not be passed through the material. Underlay the heavier parts of the design several times with embroidery cotton. Finally, cut away the material below the embroidery as shown by the illustration, and work the small leaves in satin stitch.

See illustration on page 340.

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF BORDER WITH SWISS MUSLIN APPLICATION ON NETTING. These corners may be used for tidies, etc., of Swiss muslin, fine linen, etc., or else a square-shaped netting foundation for the tidy may be worked with cotton in the thickness shown by the illustration, and the corners of the tidy trimmed in the design given by Fig. 1 in application embroidery; for the embroidery fine linen may be used as well as Swiss muslin. The embroidery is worked with fine embroidery cotton in button-hole, half-polka, satin, and knotted stitch. Along the outer edge of the tidy work small button-hole scallops as shown by the illustration, and cut away the applied material between the design figures.

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF BORDER IN POINT LACE EMBROIDERY. These borders may be sewed on square covers of cambric, fine linen, and such like, or else the whole cover may be made in the design given on Fig. 2. If the latter is the case, work the foundation of the cover in the ladder design shown by the illustration, and surround it with the border. The embroidery is worked with point lace braid and fine cotton in the stitches shown by the illustration.

Swiss Application and Lace Cover for Parasols.

See illustration on page 341.

FOR light silk parasols covers of white or black woven lace, of Swiss muslin, black or white lace with embroidery, and of point lace, tatted or netted guipure, are still in favor. The illustration shows a section of a parasol cover of white lace, with Swiss muslin application. Of course this section must be lengthened toward the top according to the form of the parasol, so that it ends in a point, and on the upper part only the dotted foundation shown by the illustration must be worked. To make the embroidery transfer the design to Swiss muslin; on the latter baste a piece of lace of the requisite size, and embroider with fine embroidery cotton in half-polka stitch. At the under scalloped edge work in button-hole stitch. Finally, cut away the Swiss muslin along the edges of the design figures (see illustration). This cover may be made larger or smaller than shown by the illustration without trouble, according to the size of the parasol for which it is intended. If the size is to be reduced, shorten the leaf-shaped figure at each side, and omit the small dots above it. Sew lace in with the sections of the cover.

THE SHOE ON THE OTHER FOOT.

I.—THE SHOE.

WE sat down upon some large rocks which were scattered around upon the beach, Fannie having declared most positively that she could go no farther, and resumed our conversation.

"But, Eddie, do you not think that she was rather forward? The way in which she monopolized Mr. Sutherlands the whole evening was scandalous, and I think that she ought to have been ashamed of herself."

This was uttered in that indignant, contemptuous tone which only a woman can assume. I answered, "Well, certainly, Mr. Sutherlands paid her marked attention, and I should not wonder if something came of it."

"But, Ed, you ought to warn him against her crafts and wiles, for you know what an awful creature she is."

"I know it is said that she is dangerous to the peace of our sex; but, my dear sister, if Alfred Sutherlands hasn't enough common-sense to keep him out of such traps, is it my business?"

"I don't know that it is exactly your business; but inasmuch as you and he are such intimate friends, a word of warning from you would go a great way with him."

"I would not like to speak it, Fannie, for he would consider, and justly too, that I was meddling with affairs which did not concern me."

"Well, Ed, as you please; only I don't like it, that's all. I feel somewhat rested now. Let us go up to the hotel."

So we went up to the hotel.

My sister Fannie and myself had, in company with some friends of ours—and Alfred Sutherlands was one of the party—taken a trip to Newport, to pass a couple of months at that delightful place. The lady referred to in the foregoing conversation was a Miss Agnes Livingston, of New York, a charming creature: figure petite, complexion fair, hair of that golden hue which so many of our young men have so much raved about lately, and the prettiest little foot and ankle that ever peeped out from under a crinoline. She was at the same hotel that we were at, and without a chaperon, her father and brother having been forced by the exigencies of business to leave a few days before. They were, however, intending to return in a short time, and she was daily expecting them.

Fannie did not view her with a very favorable eye, as may easily be seen. The reason was simply this: Miss Livingston was beautiful, my sister was plain, and could never forgive her for having a prettier face than she herself had. Moreover, Miss Livingston was—well, it's no use disguising the fact—a flirt; the hearts which she had captivated and cast aside nearly broken were almost numberless; and it really seemed as if another one was to be added to her list of conquests in the person of Alfred Sutherlands. It seemed apparent to all that he was firmly bound to her, and, notwithstanding all the rumors of her flirting propensities, he remained at her feet. The other young ladies of the coterie, knowing that he was wealthy and handsome (and what lady could resist such a combination of virtues?), had used their utmost endeavors to draw him away from her. But all their efforts were in vain; and the result was no great gain in the reputation of the unfortunate Miss Livingston.

Upon my return to the hotel I went up to Sutherlands's room, and found him, his feet in slippers, reclining in an easy-chair, smoking, and reading one of the current magazines. He was much amused at a certain sea-side sketch therein, and remarked to me, after the ordinary greetings had passed between us,

"By Jove, Ed! what a glorious woman the heroine of this story was! Have you read it?"

I had read the story, and he continued, "She puts me very much in mind of Miss Livingston. Don't you think so?"

"I don't know, Alf; but I tell you what I do think, and that is that your attentions to her are entirely too marked, and are being noticed. Why, even Fannie—and you know what a demure little thing she is—was talking to me about it to-day."

"Pshaw! If one is seen walking with a lady, or if he presumes to dance with the same one more than once in the same evening, they are engaged directly."

"But, Alf, I really don't think that it is right for you to flirt so much with her, and you, too, a—"

"Sh! not a word more."

We then had a long and earnest conversation in reference to this same Miss Livingston, the purport of which can not be told here, but it will be understood as our story develops itself.

"Mais, mon cher," I said, as I rose to go, "I came up to ask you if you would join our picnic party to-morrow?"

"Certainly, with pleasure. Who are going?"

"Imprimis, your humble servant and his sister, enumerating ourselves first, not through egotism, but expediency; then Dr. Barclay and his wife; also Miss Livingston, whom I've no doubt you will consider under your especial protection—h'm—and a few others, making in all, I suppose, about twenty, including yourself. We propose driving to the Glen, and there we shall dine at 'a feast of reason and a flow of soul,' with a few substantials thrown in, and, by way of helping digestion, make ourselves merry with dancing and such other recreations as may be suggested. After having tired ourselves sufficiently we shall proceed to the shore, there take a yacht which will be in waiting, and sail over to the fort and around the bay until such time as it shall be decided to return. You know it will be moonlight."

"I'm with you. At what time do you start?"

"At three precisely, from the hotel here."

When I told Fannie that Sutherlands was going to take Agnes Livingston to the picnic, she said,

"Eddie, I think you are wrong to encourage an intimacy between them."

"I ain't doing any thing of the kind," I replied. "I asked him to go, and told him that Miss Livingston had been asked, and casually remarked that I supposed he would consider her under his especial protection, and he making no other answer than simply accepting the invitation, I supposed that it would be so."

"Well, all I've got to say about it is that I don't like the way things are going on."

II.—ON THE OTHER FOOT.

The day was a beautiful one, and the picnic party were assembled on the hotel piazza; the carriages were just drawing up to the door, and we were about getting in, when some one said,

"Where is Mr. Sutherlands?"

"He was here a moment ago," said I; but on looking around he was nowhere to be seen; and, to the horror of Fannie, Miss Livingston was also absent.

"What does it mean?" she whispered in my ear. "They were both here a moment ago." We sent into the parlor, but they were not there; up to Miss Livingston's room—she was not there; up to Sutherlands's room—he was not there. What could it all mean? After waiting for them about half an hour we decided to go without them.

A pleasant drive of some five or six miles brought us to the Glen, where we alighted and commenced rambling around in different directions while dinner was being prepared. The table-cloth was spread upon a smooth piece of grass, and we sat down to enjoy ourselves and the good things spread before us. Laughter and conviviality were the order of the day. But let me stop the current of my story, and, while the picnickers are enjoying themselves, with the reader's kind permission carry him back a while, and we will discover what became of the absent ones.

As we were all standing on the piazza of the hotel, waiting for the carriages, Alfred Sutherlands and Agnes Livingston were standing a little back and apart from the rest; and when the carriages drew up in front she plucked him by the sleeve and said,

"I think that I won't go," and immediately turned and went inside.

He, not knowing what to make of this sudden change of mind, followed her in, overtook her as she was going up stairs, and asked her what was the matter.

"I'll tell you when I come down," she replied.

He accordingly had to wait for her appearance. He went to his own room, took some cigars from his valise, came down again by the back way, and went to the stables of the hotel. Thus it was that we missed him when we sent to his room for him. Afraid that he might be asked some unpleasant questions, he kept out of the way until we had gone. Then he came into the parlor, and in a few minutes Miss Livingston came down.

"Why did you change your mind so suddenly?" asked he.

"Because—"

"Because what?" said he, inquiringly.

She looked into his face, and, with a peculiar and expressive smile, said, "Are you much disappointed?"

"In truth, I am. I had anticipated a great deal of pleasure in accompanying you there."

"Did you? Well, I'm sure if I had known that it would have given you so much gratification I should have gone with you."

"It is not too late yet."

"Why, how can we go? The carriages are gone."

"Are there no more to be had? I will get a buggy and drive you there myself."

"Oh, that will be splendid! To go— Ah, what will they say, though?"

"Well, if you won't mind what they say, I'm sure I won't."

She placed a little hand upon his arm, and looking into his eyes with a glance that made a thrill run through his whole body, said, "What is it to us what they say?"

"Well, then, excuse me while I go and order a buggy around;" and so saying he stepped out of the room.

Miss Livingston was delighted. The whole thing had worked out so far to her utmost satisfaction. Sutherlands was evidently smitten with her, and her triumph over the other young ladies would be great when she appeared among them in company with him alone. But, leaving them, let us go back to the Glen again to our other friends.

We were, as I said before, seated around our festive board, or rather grass, and were enjoying ourselves to the uttermost, and the absent ones were well-nigh forgotten, when suddenly they appeared before our eyes.

"Where have you been?" was my first exclamation as I sprang up and grasped Alf's hand, and drew him to the feast, Miss Livingston by his side. "We waited half an hour at the hotel."

"Well, Miss Livingston and I thought that it would be a good joke on you to make you think all manner of unutterable things, but we are sorry to have kept you waiting. The fact is, she, not feeling very well, suddenly resolved, while we were standing on the piazza waiting for the carriages, not to go, and went inside, and I went in with her. After you had gone I persuaded her to come with me in a buggy."

"The artful creature!" muttered Fannie, sotto voce.

"We drove down to the beach for a few minutes," continued Sutherlands, "and then followed you here, hoping that we would not arrive too late for dinner."

"No! Sit right down here alongside of me," said I.

The conversation, which was thus momentarily interrupted, was now renewed with unabated vigor.

Pretty Miss Joy, from B——, sat alongside of Dr. Barclay, his wife being on the other side. Said she, "Doctor, won't your patients have a chance to exercise their patience while you are gone?"

"Oh, I turned them all over to another doctor, who, not having any too much practice of his own, was very glad to get them."

"Who was he?"

"Doctor Dosus."

"Well, if I were sick," said Miss Joy, "I declare I would have no one but you to attend me. I should be afraid of Dr. Dosus."

"Why so? He is a very good physician, only a little antiquated in his notions."

"Oh, but I like a younger man, and particularly one with such rosy cheeks as you have;" and her merry laugh rang mischievously out upon the air.

The doctor's rosy cheeks were doubly red at this allusion, and Mrs. Barclay bit her lip, but said nothing.

Dinner being over, a place was cleared, and, music having been provided, we began to dance.

Drawing Sutherlands aside while the dancing was progressing, I said to him, "Let us take a walk; I want to talk with you." And we lit our cigars and wandered off a little way from the rest.

"Ed," said he, "what do you think of my little scheme with Agnes Livingston?"

"You're what I call rushing things. Fannie is horrified."

"Won't she open her eyes when she knows as much as we do?"

"But seriously, Alf, how many acts are there in this farce, or tragedy, as you choose to call it?"

"Only one more. The curtain will fall this evening on the boat. I have to-day received a letter from—you know. Ain't it 'most time that we started for the shore?"

"I think it is. Let us go back and tell them so."

So back we went; and I gave directions to bring up the carriages, and soon after we were whirling on our way to the shore. There we found our yacht, neater and prettier than which was not to be found any where. We all got aboard, and a delightful breeze springing up made her dance over the waves as though conscious that she was ministering to a party of pleasure.

It was about eight o'clock, and the moon was just rising. We sailed around the harbor, over to the fort, and up the bay, enlivening the time with jokes, songs, and stories. It was noticed that Sutherlands was sitting in the fore part of the boat, with Miss Livingston by his side, and talking to her in a low tone. He did not mingle in the conversation with the rest, and she seemed to have ears for no one but him.

"See them!" whispered Fannie. "If it isn't all settled, then I'm no judge."

"I do begin to think it all settled myself."

"I'll ask him to sing," said Fannie. Then to him: "Oh, Mr. Sutherlands, we're very sorry to interrupt your delightful tête-à-tête, but as we have all sung but you, it is now your turn. Will you favor us?"

He had a magnificent baritone voice, and without a moment's hesitation he consented, and commenced Kuchen's lovely song—

"Oh, wert thou but mine own, love,
How dear thou'dst be to me;
Deep, deep within this heart, love,
I'd cherish only thee."

Fannie pinched my arm. He went on:

"For every joy that earth could give
In one dear look of thine should live:
Oh, wert thou mine forever,
How deep my love would be."

We all pronounced it exquisite. Miss Livingston said nothing, but cast her eyes upon him with such a fascinating look. He took her hand and led her to the stern of the boat, and seated her near the rest of us; then, coming toward me, he whispered in my ear, "The time has come;" and turning around, he said aloud:

"Ladies and gentlemen, we are to have, I hope, a pleasant accession to our party to-morrow. I have just received a letter from home by to-day's mail informing me that my brother and sister may be expected here to-morrow, and with them they will bring my wife."

"YOUR WIFE!" screamed Miss Livingston.

"Your wife!" echoed Fanny, almost dumb with amazement.

"Your wife!" ejaculated the rest of the party.

"Why, when were you married?" said Fannie.

"Just about two months ago. She couldn't come with me when I came to Newport; so she said she would come on in a few days afterward with my sister, and they will arrive to-morrow."

I knew all about it all the time, but the whole thing had been kept a secret from the rest of the party, and therefore such a piece of information was like a thunder-clap to them.

Miss Livingston was terribly cut up to find that she had been wasting all her arts upon a married man; and to think that she had fallen into the trap herself which she had set for another was too bad.

The next morning she said that she had received a letter from her father asking her to come home; that he would meet her at the boat landing in New York. So she packed up her things, and took the evening boat for New York.

Sutherlands's wife did come, and we all enjoyed her visit exceedingly. She was a dear, sweet little creature, and without a particle of jealousy in her nature. Alf told her of the trick he had played on Miss Livingston, and she laughed as she said,

"You ought to have been ashamed of yourself to deceive the poor girl so."

"But, my dear, it was exactly what she had done to others, and what she was trying to do with me, only the shoe was on the other foot."

USEFUL RECIPES.

CHARLOTTE RUSSE (new and very superior).—For two hours dissolve half a box of Cox's gelatine in a little more than half a pint of cold water. At the end of that time make a custard of 2 quarts of milk and 12 eggs, set it in a pan of water on the stove, and let it come to a boil, stirring well. It is better to put the milk on first, then mix the eggs with some of it, and when it boils pour on the eggs and milk. Just as it boils, slide the dissolved gelatine just in the middle of a pan containing 2 quarts of rich cream, and before you stir it pour the boiling custard on top; beat it all well together; have ready a vanilla bean cut in small pieces and scraped, and boiled in about a pint of milk until the milk is half boiled away; pour this, after stirring, into the custard, sweeten all to taste, add sherry wine to suit, and pour into the moulds lined with lady-fingers. The sugar, flavor, and wine should be poured in just as soon as possible. Get it into the moulds as quick as you can. Set on ice to harden. In summer use more gelatine.

PHILADELPHIA CAKE.—Take about a quart of milk slightly turned; mix with it enough flour to make it about as thick as pound-cake batter. It is better to put a small portion of flour—about half a pint—in the basin, and stir the milk gradually in to prevent its becoming lumpy; then add the rest of the flour afterward; mix in the whites of six eggs beaten to a light froth; a little cinnamon, nutmeg, and sugar enough to make it as sweet as you wish; a few currants and raisins are an improvement. Beat all well together; have a shallow pan well greased with lard, pour in the cake, and set in a warm oven, gradually heating it until it is hot enough. It should be about half an hour in baking. When carefully mixed and properly baked it is a delightful cake. The baking is the main point. In about ten minutes after the cake goes in the full amount of heat necessary should be turned on—of course gradually letting it in during that time.

To procure the essence of celery, for flavoring soups, etc., soak one ounce of celery seed in half a pint of the best white brandy for three weeks. Six or eight drops will flavor a quart of soup.

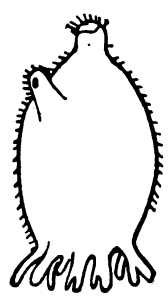
THE LEATHER BOTTÈL.

A DARWINIAN DITTY.

FOR the better understanding of this "ditty," in case it should not be self-interpreting, we prefix to it two extracts, one from Mr. Darwin's "Descent of Man," and the other from Dr. H. Alleyne Nicholson's "Introductory Text-Book of Zoology," with a relative wood-cut, borrowed from Dr. Nicholson's work, in which cut, as being a family portrait of our ancestor (according to Mr. Darwin), our readers can not fail to feel a strong interest. We suggest that the word Ascidian, if not spelled Askidian, ought, at least, to be pronounced so.

"The most ancient progenitors in the kingdom of the Vertebrata, at which we are able to obtain an obscure glance, apparently consisted of a group of marine animals, resembling the larvæ of existing Ascidians.

"These animals probably gave rise to a group of fishes,....these to the Simiadæ. The Simiadæ then branched off into two great stems—the New World and Old World monkeys; and from the latter, at a remote period, Man, the wonder and glory of the universe, proceeded. Thus we have given to man a pedigree of prodigious length; but not, it may be said, of noble quality."—The Descent of Man, and Selection in Relation to Sex. By Charles Darwin, M.A., F.R.S., etc.; i. 212, 213.



A SIMPLE ASCIDIAN.

"TUNICATA.—This class includes a class of animals not at all familiarly known, and mostly of small size. They are often called Ascidians (Gr. askos, a wine-skin), from the resemblance which many of them exhibit in shape to a two-necked jar or bottle (see fig.). The two orifices in the outer leathery case or 'test' of the Tunicata lead into the interior of the animal, and are used for the admission and expulsion of sea-water; and by their means the animal both breathes and obtains food."—Introductory Text-Book of Zoology. By H. Alleyne Nicholson, M.D., etc.

How many wondrous things there be
Of which we can't the reason see!
And this is one, I used to think,
That most men like a drop of drink.
But here comes Darwin with his plan,
And shows the true Descent of Man:
And that explains it all full well,
For man was once—a leather bottèl!

There are Mollusca rather small,
That Naturalists Ascidia call,
Who, being just a bag-like skin,
Subsist on water pouring in:
And these you'll find, if you will seek,
Derive their name from Heathen Greek;
For Scott and Scapula show full well
That Askos means—a leather bottèl.

Now Darwin proves, as clear as mud,
That, endless ages ere the Flood,
The Coming Man's primeval form
Was simply an Ascidian worm:
And having then the habit got
Of passing liquor down his throat,
He keeps it still, and shows full well
That Man was once—a leather bottèl.

When Bacchus' feasts came duly round,
Athenian peasants beat the ground;
And danced and leaped, to ease their toil,
'Mid leather bottles smeared with oil:
From which they slid, with broad grimace,
And falling, filled with mirth the place:
And so they owned and honored well
Their great-grandsire—the leather bottèl.

The toper loves to sit and swill
Of wine, or grog, or beer, his fill;
And, as he doth but little eat,
It serves him both for drink and meat:
But don't, I pray, be too strait-laced,
Or blame this pure Ascidian taste:
For Darwin's theory shows full well
The toper is—a leather bottèl.

The Dean of Christ-Church does not shrink
To give five reasons we should drink:
"Good wine, a friend, or being dry,
Or lest we should be by-and-by:"
Then adds the fifth in humorous sport,
As "any other reason" for't:
But all his reasoning shows full well
The Dean was just—a leather bottèl!

Nay, those who fain strong drink would stop,
Don't say, we should not drink a drop;
But water, milk, or eau sucrée,
We're free to tipple all the day:
Sam Johnson's self, as you may see,
Drank many myriad cups of tea:
And all this drinking shows full well
That man's at best—a leather bottèl.

"The thirsty earth drinks up the rain,"
The plants, too, drink the moistened plain:
"The sea itself, which, one would think,
Should have but little need for drink,
Drinks twice ten thousand rivers up;"
While beasts and fishes share the cup:
The Sun, too, drinks, the Moon as well;
So Nature's all—a leather bottèl.

I hope even Darwin don't say Nay,
When asked at times to wet his clay:
And I for one would drink his health,
And wish him sense and wit and wealth:
And if good liquor he doth brew,
I'll drink to old Erasmus too;
And gladly join to show full well
That man is still—a leather bottèl.

WILL IT PAY?

I WAS abroad early with my girl the other morning, and on our way from the ferry we passed the office of a newspaper, where a sort of Rag Fair was being holden. The proprietor of the journal had offered prizes for the best specimens of patched and mended garments, and this exhibition was the result. I was quite desirous that Maud should see what needle-women can still do in this age of machines, and invited her in. Maud is a girl of the period—wide awake, interested in almost every thing going on—not so interested in some things of in-door significance as she is in some others of out-door importance—but a pretty good specimen, as her friends think, of the average young lady. She is my ward just now; and I am expected to "do something for her," according to the entreaty of her mother, the wife of a country minister, who frankly acknowledges that her children are too much for her—"too many," I was on the point of quoting from Mr. Tulliver, but the quotation would have laid my sentence open to the charge of ambiguity.

The offer of the publisher of the paper had met with an extraordinary response; there were garments of all sorts on exhibition—darned stockings, patched under-clothes, cotton, linen, woolen, so "honored in the breach" that one could but think of the tapestries of palaces, and of India shawls, which, after all, looked at by the eyes of Common Sense, without fashionable aspirations, are nothing more nor less than a darned lot of things.

"Well," I said to Maud, as she stood with the heel of a black stocking spread smoothly upon her palm, and contemplating it with a perplexity made up of despair and disdain, "needle-work isn't a lost art yet, it seems."

"What an awful waste of time!" she answered. "I should think it was a sin."

"But if a thing is worth doing at all," said I, "isn't it worth doing well? and you don't mean to say that a patch is not to be preferred to a rent or a hole?"

"There are two things about it," said she. "I couldn't do such work as that if I would, and I'd be ashamed to if I could."

"I think, for my part," said I, "that we have here a fine exhibition of the eternal fitness of things. There are thousands of listless hands which could make happy hearts for themselves if they would come in here and let it be proved for them that it pays to do work well."

Maud looked at me, and, I could see, was a little embarrassed. She would have laughed if she had found any encouragement in my face. "When I am fifty years old," said she, "and all my friends are dead, and I have nothing to read, and nobody to walk with, if it is really necessary, I will think about this kind of business."

"If you think there's an art that can be acquired that way," I answered, "you are in danger of making a great mistake. The art of making others comfortable isn't learned in a moment—nor in old age."

"Seriously," said she, looking toward the street, a little impatient to find herself among the crowds going up and down, "would you like me to sit and spend a week over a pair of old silk stockings? I would prefer to learn the weaver's trade, if it's all the same to you."

"Things will wear out, and a body must make a decent appearance. Whatever is worth doing is worth doing well," said I, sticking to my text.

"Yes; and I know what poor mother is doing most of the time. But the boys would have to go naked if she patched and darned in this way."

"She might do it for once in her life, as a specimen of her skill," said I.

"Poor mother! I think not." Maud could now no longer resist the impulse that was drawing her toward the window.

Just as she turned away I noticed a garment which was labeled with a handwriting familiar to me. The name was Mary Atkins. I looked at Maud. She was standing by the door, and that thoughtful look was upon her face still which had appeared when I spoke of her mother. Should I call to her to come and see with her own eyes that her mother was among the competitors? While I questioned myself I saw that this garment had the mark of a ten-dollar prize upon it, and that decided me.

"Maud," I said. She came. I pointed to the garment. She looked amazed.

"Is that Rob's blouse? Can't be! Goodness! mother hasn't—" I pointed to the label. There was the name of Mary Atkins, my Maud's mother, plain as print. Maud looked at me, and her glance seemed to be a cross between thunder and lightning.

"Your mother don't spend all her time patching and darning," said I, not understanding her mood so well as to feel quite certain what I should say; "but when she does her best she takes a prize, you see."

"A prize!" she exclaimed; "and that's where the money came from I was to spend on myself. Mother earned it!" An application of my preaching so instant and unexpected I confess startled me. Nevertheless, I rejoiced thereat.

"You are glad, are you not, Maud, that women who can do work like that are sure of a living, or may be sure of it?" said I. "That's the best lesson I have learned at Rag Fair. It always pays to do one's work well."

"Shall we go?" said Maud, leading the way into the street.

I might have expended a great deal of talk on my girl, but it would have proved far less effective than this evidence she had unawares encountered—that good work pays. She could not gainsay the proof which came from her own mother's loving heart and loving hands. But if you think she consented to make use of the money which had been sent her in any such way as at first she proposed, you make a great mistake. How to spend ten dollars cost her a deal of thought. She consulted with me about it oftener than the President consulted his cabinet, and in greater perplexity, I am sure, than he exhibited before he resolved upon the purchase of the southern hemisphere; but her purchases went home, finally, and they were received there almost before newspaper-reading people became alive to the fact that Rag Fair was over.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

JUST about the time when summer dawns upon us the interest of many scientific people in this country will be centered upon the expedition leaving the United States to win trophies from the regions of eternal ice. The Polaris, commanded by Captain C. F. Hall, ventures into arctic waters for the discovery of the Northwest Passage and the open Polar Sea. No new venture is it, but past experiences and explorations give increased prospect of success; and Captain Hall is not only enthusiastic in his prospective work, but by his long residence amid the rigors of an arctic climate is eminently fitted, physically, for the difficult task before him. The sailing-master, Captain Buddington, from Groton, Connecticut, will carry with him assistant officers who have for years buffeted the storms of the long arctic winter. All the seamen are intelligent men, and it is said that each one is capable of navigating the ship himself. A corps of scientific gentlemen accompany the expedition; and two Esquimaux, "Joe" and "Hannah," who have been with Captain Hall several years, go also—"Joe" as an interpreter, and "Hannah" as a tailoress, for warm skin garments only will protect the arctic traveler from the piercing blasts to which he is exposed. The Polaris is fitted up with every possible comfort and convenience; yet the enthusiastic gentlemen, and even ladies, who have made application to accompany this expedition, as a sort of pleasure trip, evidently have no conception of the discomforts, hardships, and dangers of arctic navigation, nor of the sufferings of the long, dark arctic winter. Captain Hall expects to be absent about two years and a half, although it is more than probable that this time will necessarily be prolonged.

Among the curious decrees of the Commune of Paris was one forbidding bakers to do night-work, because it was not good for their health. Paris could very well endure to eat stale bread every morning.

An English lady who left a furnished house in the suburbs of Paris was anxious to know whether the furniture was safe, and wrote to the mayor of the arrondissement on the subject. She received a reply to the effect that her house has not been damaged or the furniture touched, and that on her forwarding £60 to the mayor he would send the furniture to her in England. The lady thereupon wrote and asked what the £60 was for. The answer came: "It is the share of the indemnity that will have to be paid by every English person having property in France."

Mr. James Parton is of opinion that "nothing saves children from utter destruction but their ceaseless rebellion against our murderous requirements" in forcing them to sit still in ill-ventilated rooms during long school-hours. This remark, though strong, contains not a little truth. When are the children to grow, if they are kept at their tasks continually? Their complaints of hard lessons and longings for holidays are but the natural rebound of the mind and body against too great a pressure. Fresh air, exhilarating exercise, and freedom from mental strain are essential in childhood if a strong and vigorous manhood and womanhood are desired.

About one hundred mechanics have been put to work on the national Capitol at Washington for repairs and improvements.

Pickpocketienne is the Parisian naturalization of the English word pickpocket, in consequence of there being a great number of English thieves in Paris just now.

No good results from excessive gymnastic exercise. Not long ago an ambitious little girl of Akron, Ohio, performed three hundred jumps over her skipping-rope, followed on the next morning by one hundred and seventy more. The physicians said that her death, which occurred three days afterward, was caused directly by this excessive exercise.

An Antwerp journal sent a reporter to Brussels to get the King's speech, and with him a couple of carrier-doves to take back the document speedily. At Brussels the reporter gave the pigeons in charge to a waiter, and called for breakfast. He was kept waiting some time, but a very delicate fricassee atoned for the delay. After breakfast he paid his bill, and called for his carrier-pigeons.

"Pigeons!" exclaimed the waiter, "why, you have eaten them!"

A good nurse never aggravates her patient by a whisper in the sick-room; but then she is never loud. Though quiet, she never walks on tiptoe; her shoes never creak, nor does her dress rustle. She never seems to be stealthily watching the sick one. She never slams the door, of course, but then she never shuts it with painful slowness. She is prompt, but never in a hurry. She is invaluable.

The new "palace car" on the Third Avenue line has a carpeted floor, window-curtains, about thirty comfortable cushioned seats, ice-water, a clock, and a civil conductor. All willing to pay ten cents extra for the comforts afforded will take passage in the "palace cars."

The Boston Advertiser tells a story of a lady living at the South End, who received a call the other day from another "lady," who wished to see about the place of "second girl" in the family of the former. "Lady" No. 2 drove up to the door in a hack, rustled into the hall in a handsome suit of brown velveteen, found that the desired situation was already filled, took out her list and erased a name and number; then swept down the front steps, and, while the obsequious hackman held the door open for her ladyship to re-enter, instructed him to drive to the next direction minuted upon her memorandum. Good common-sense is a rare possession; but one evidence of it is, to dress according to one's position in life.

The telegraphic feat of sending a message from London to Bombay, and receiving an answer immediately, has excited much interest. The message had to traverse a distance of about six thousand miles, invading Belgium, Prussia, Russia, and Persia, and was sent direct, not retelegraphed from station to station, like an ordinary telegram. The reply came at once—12,000 miles seeming to be of no account.

The guillotine seems to be about the only thing wanting to complete the reign of terror in Paris in this year of 1871.

Ladies who are accustomed to give their photographs to gentlemen with some freedom may be interested in the case of a young lady of this city. She gave her photograph to a devoted admirer for his locket. Two days afterward her brother found it on the floor of a billiard saloon, decorated with a pair of mustaches and an immense cigar, artistically done with a pen.

Those who look rather coldly upon Canada will be perhaps astonished to hear that she is the fourth maritime power in the world, and, according to the "Year Book of 1870," has 7591 ships, with a tonnage of 899,090 tons. In this regard she stands ahead of every nation except Great Britain, the United States, and France.

A man living in Mobile, Alabama, recently married a Mexican woman. She was his seventh wife, he having previously been united to a German, a French, an English, Irish, Dutch, and American woman at different periods of his existence. Which nationality he prefers is still a matter of uncertainty.

It is said that in the provinces of France there is a strong and increasing reaction of feeling in favor of the Emperor.

Upon the children are visited the sins of their parents; even the little ones escape not the grief which crime brings to friends of the criminal. When the trial of Mrs. Fair, in San Francisco, was ended by the ominous words, "Guilty of murder in the first degree," her little daughter, who seemed to comprehend their full meaning, broke forth in a violent fit of sobbing. She leaned over upon her mother, and her childish cry of anguish pierced every heart. She twined her little arms about her mother's neck, and when the condemned woman was about to be led from the room, and it was necessary to separate them, she begged in agonizing tones that she might "go with mamma."

A May snow-storm is not without precedent; therefore when the good people of Maine awoke on the morning of the 5th of that month and saw five inches of snow on the ground, they were not alarmed, but made their paths, waited for the snow to melt with patience, and then continued their plowing as if nothing had happened.

An old story contains a lesson which many married couples have not yet learned. When Jonathan Trumbull was Governor of Connecticut a gentleman called at his house one day requesting a private interview. He said: "I have called upon a very unpleasant errand, Sir, and want your advice. My wife and I do not live happily together, and I am thinking of getting a divorce. What do you advise, Sir?"

The Governor sat a few moments in thought; then turning to his visitor, said, "How did you treat Mrs. W—— when you were courting her? and how did you feel toward her at the time of your marriage?"

Squire W—— replied, "I treated her as kindly as I could, for I loved her dearly at that time."

"Well, Sir," said the Governor, "go home and court her now just as you did then, and love her as when you married her. Do this in the fear of God for one year, and then tell me the result."

The Governor then said, "Let us pray."

They bowed in prayer and separated. When a year had passed away Squire W—— called again to see the Governor, and said: "I have called to thank you for the good advice you gave me, and to tell you that my wife and I are as happy as when first we were married. I can not be grateful enough for your good counsel."

"I am glad to hear it, Mr. W——," said the Governor, "and I hope you will continue to court your wife as long as you live."

The Medical Department of the English Privy Council is of the opinion that by vaccination in infancy, if thoroughly performed and successful, most people are completely insured for their whole lifetime against an attack of small-pox. If, however, the early vaccination was imperfectly performed, or from any other cause unsuccessful, the protection against small-pox is much less satisfactory. In consequence of imperfect vaccination the population always contains very many persons who, though nominally vaccinated, and believing themselves to be protected against small-pox, are really liable to infection. For this reason, and also because even the best infantine vaccination sometimes loses more or less of its efficacy in process of time, the Medical Department above referred to advises that all persons who have been vaccinated in infancy should, as they approach adult life, undergo revaccination. Generally speaking, the best time of life for revaccination is about the time when growth is completing itself, say from fifteen to eighteen years of age; and persons in that period of life ought not to delay their revaccination till times when there shall be special alarm of small-pox. In circumstances of special danger every one past childhood on whom revaccination has not before been successfully performed ought without delay to be revaccinated. It is generally believed that if revaccination is properly and successfully performed it does not require repetition. In proof of which it is said that the revaccination to which nurses of small-pox hospitals in England invariably submit is a perfect protection.

Jewel Case with Pincushion, Figs. 1–3.

THIS case is made of pasteboard. The cover is furnished with a raised cushion for pins, covered with green satin embroidered with crystal beads, gold beads, and bugles. The remaining trimming of the jewel case consists of a ruche of green satin ribbon an inch wide, a ruffle of the same an inch and a quarter wide, white blonde an inch and an eighth wide, and buttons covered with green silk. The case is furnished with a lining of silk quilted over cotton batting. For the case cut of pasteboard for the bottom one piece nine inches square, then for the straight sides four pieces each six inches long and an inch wide, and for the slanting sides four pieces each nine inches long and two inches wide; the latter are slanted off toward the ends so that one (the upper) of their lengthwise sides is now only six inches long. First cover all the pieces smoothly with net, then cover the outer side of the slanting sides intended for the slanting edge smoothly with green silk (the edges of the silk are folded over on the under side of the pasteboard and fastened there). Then overseam the pasteboard pieces intended for the straight sides along the ends, and fasten them on the bottom so that they are at an equal distance all around from the outer edge of the latter. Set in the quilted lining as shown by Fig. 1; in doing this the edges of the silk must be folded narrowly to the outer side of the sides at the upper edge of the case. Then join the slanting sides at the upper narrower lengthwise side with the straight sides, at the under lengthwise side with the bottom, and at the ends with each other. Next cover the outer side of the bottom smoothly with green cashmere. Sew the trimming on the slanting sides as shown by the illustration. For the row of beads on the ruche take up alternately one large, three small crystal beads. For the cover of the case cut of pasteboard one part six inches square, cover the under side of this part with a silk lining quilted in diamonds, and the outer side with the cushion, which is an inch and a quarter high, and flattened toward the outer edges, and cover this with a piece of green satin corresponding in size, and embroidered in the design given in Fig. 30 of the present Supplement. The leaves and stems of the design are worked in bead satin stitch with crystal and gold beads; in working the leaves take up on the thread the number of beads required for the width of the leaf. The first and last must each be a gold bead; in this way the leaf, when completed, appears to be edged in with gold beads. Before working the bead satin stitch, underlay the leaves with strings of small crystal beads. These bead strings are fastened lengthwise on the leaf; to the widest part of the leaf fasten two to three of such bead strings. Fig. 3 shows an unfinished leaf in full size and the underlaying. For the first bead stitch pass the needle through the material at the point indicated by ×. The bead strings for the stems and small branches are fastened with short crosswise stitches. The wheat (Fig. 2 shows a head in full size) is worked with white satin beads; the points of the ears are simulated with gold thread and gold beads. The completed embroidery is fastened on the cushion, and the latter is bordered along the outer edge with a satin ruche. Join the cover with the case at one lengthwise side, and furnish the front edge with a loop of ribbon. This pretty box will be found very convenient for the toilette-table, and may be used to hold small articles as well as jewels. The trimming, of course, can be varied to suit the individual taste.

AN ANT' COLONY.

ON stripping off the bark of a small stump, barely eight inches in diameter, and about as much in height from the surface of the ground, a large colony of the yellow ant was suddenly exposed to the light. The insects had the strongest objection to the inroad upon their premises, and ran about actively in all directions. Their habitation was elaborately made of small particles of earth, which had been built together after the fashion of ants, and had been arranged between the bark and the wood so as to form a perfect labyrinth of soil cells and passages. I was really sorry to have broken into so elaborate a piece of insect architecture, but the mischief had been done, and was aggravated by a brisk and decidedly cold wind which had just sprung up, and which blew the unfortunate ants about in a way of which they did not at all approve.

This species of ant is very common, especially on heaths and similar places, and has the power of varying the structure of its nest so as to suit all conditions. On open ground it builds little hillocks, which, fragile as they appear, are quite capable of throwing off the rain. If, however, it can find a flat stone, it takes advantage of so good a shelter, and makes its habitation immediately beneath it; while in the present instance it had run up its chambers from the earth, and extended them between the wood and bark of the stump. The bark was very close to the wood, and the insects had gained the requisite space by making shallow cavities in the decaying wood. During a severe winter they carry their habitations deeply into the ground, and make chambers, sunk well beneath the surface, communicating with each other by passages some four inches in length. It is in these nests, by-the-way, that some of our rarest beetles are discovered. The color of the insect is bright but pale yellow, the larger workers being brighter in hue than the smaller.

Having already done as much mischief as could be done, I had no scruple in removing the remainder of the bark. To my astonishment, another ants' nest was disclosed, but that of a different species—namely, the jet ant. Thus we have the curious fact that on opposite sides of the same little stump were two flourishing colonies of two different species of ant, neither interfering with the other, and both so completely concealed that no traces of them were seen until the bark was removed.

When their house was thus broken open, the ants showed at once the difference in disposition as well as in form. The yellow ants ran about in a state of great perturbation, and although they could do but little, appeared to do a great deal. They were very angry too, and one of them when put into the bottle attacked a sun-beetle, grasped one of its antennæ with a hold like that of a bull-dog, and so died under the influence of the poisoned vapor. As a memorial of the occasion, I intend to place in my cabinet the beetle with the dead ant still griping the antenna between its jaws. The jet ants displayed no such fussiness, but took matters very coolly indeed. At first they seemed to be surprised into something like activity, but they soon appeared to make up their minds that there was no use in troubling themselves more than necessary. So they quietly slipped away under cover, some dropping at once to the ground, and so escaping into the recesses of the nest, and others crawling very leisurely down the ruins of their home.

HANNAH.

A Novel.

By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman."

CHAPTER IX.

HANNAH'S waking up in the morning after her brother-in-law's return was one of the most painful sensations she had ever known, the more so as it was so unusual. To her healthy temperament the morning hour was generally the best of the day. Not Rosie herself, who always woke up as lively as a young linnet in a thorn-bush, enjoyed it more than Aunt Hannah did. But now things seemed changed. She had gone to bed at once, and fallen asleep immediately; for there are times when the brain, worn out by long tension, collapses the instant we lie down—Nature forcing upon it the temporary stupefaction which is its only preservative.

Now even she could not shake off weariness, nor rise as usual to look at one of those glorious winter sunrises which only active people see. She dreaded the dawn; she shrank from the sun, for he brought her her daily duties; and how she should ever fulfill them as heretofore she could not tell.

First, how should she again meet Mr. Rivers? What position should she hold toward him? Had her sister lived, he would have been to her nothing at all: regarded with the sacred indifference with which every pure-minded woman regards every other woman's husband. Now, what was he? Not her brother—except by a legal fiction, which he had himself recognized as a fiction. Not her lover; and yet when she recalled his looks and tones, and a certain indescribable agitation which had been upon him all the evening, some feminine instinct told her that, under other circumstances, he might have become her lover. Her husband he could never be; and yet she had to go on living with him in an anomalous relationship which was a compound of all these three ties, with the difficulties of all and the comfort of none. Her friend he was; that bond seemed clear and plain; but then is it customary for a lady to go and keep the house of a male "friend," be he ever so tried and trusted? Society, to say nothing of her own feelings, would never allow it; and for once society is in the right.

Hannah felt it so—felt that, stripping off the imaginary brother-and-sister bond, Bernard and she were exactly in the position of a lady and gentleman living together in those Platonic relations, which are possible certainly, but which the wicked world never believes to be possible, and which Nature herself rejects as being out of the ordinary course of things, and therefore very unadvisable. A life difficult enough to carry on even if the parties were calmly indifferent to one another; but what if they were not indifferent? Though he had never "made love" to her in the smallest degree, never caressed her even in the harmless salutations which brothers and sisters in law so commonly indulge in, still Hannah must have been dull indeed not to have long since found out that in some way or other Bernard was very fond of her; and a young man is not usually "very fond" of a woman not his own born sister without sooner or later wishing to monopolize her—to have her all to himself: in plain terms, to marry her. And though women have much less of this exclusive feeling—though many a woman will go on innocently adoring a man for years without the slightest wish of personal appropriation—still, when somebody else appropriates him—marries him, in short—and the relations are changed, and she drops into a common friend, or less than a friend, then even the noblest and most unselfish woman living will feel for a time a slight pang, a blank in her life, a soreness at her heart. It is Nature's revenge upon all shams, however innocent those shams may be.

And poor Hannah was reaping Nature's revenge now. Whether he did or did not love her in a brotherly way, she was cruelly conscious that to go on living with her brother-in-law as heretofore would be a very severe trial. Should she fly from it? The way was open. She could write to Lady Dunsmore, who she knew was again in search of a governess, and would gladly welcome her back. Two days, or one day even, and she might resume her old life, her old duties, and forget this year and a half at Easterham as if it had never been.

For a moment the temptation was strong. She felt hunted down, like the Israelites, with the Egyptians behind and the Red Sea before—the dreadful, surging sea of the future, over which there seemed no pathway, no possible way of crossing it, to any safe shore. If she could but escape, with her reputation clear, out of her brother-in-law's house!—that House on the Hill which had been so pleasant, which she had tried to make a sort of home-beacon to all the parish; and now all the parish leveled at it their cruel stares, their malignant comments, for it was exposed to all. For Bernard's sake, as well as her own, she ought to save him from this, free him from her blighting presence, and go.

As she lay thinking, turning over in her mind how best to accomplish this—when she should write and what she should say to Lady Dunsmore—there came the usual little knock at her door, the usual sound of tiny bare feet trotting over the carpet, and the burst of joyous child-laughter at her bedside. And when she hardly noticed it, for it pierced her like a sword, there came a loud wail. "Tannie, take her! Take Rosie in Tannie's arms." Poor Tannie sprang up, and felt that all her well-woven plans were torn down like spider webs. To go away and leave her child! The thing was impossible.

Our lives, like the year, go through a succession of seasons, which may come early or late, but come in regular order. We do not find fruit in March or primroses in August. Thus, though Hannah's heart now, strangely stirred as it was, had a primrose breath of spring quivering through it, it was not exactly the heart of a girl. She was a woman of thirty, and though she loved—alas, she knew it now only too well!—she did not love romantically, absorbingly. Besides, coexistent with this love had come to her that other sentiment, usually of much later growth—the maternal instinct—which in her was a passion too. Bernard's one rival, and no small one, was his own little child.

As Hannah pressed Rosie to her bosom all her vague terrors, her equally dreadful delights, faded away into quiet realities, and by the time she had had the child with her for an hour she felt quite herself again, and was able to carry Rosie down to the Sunday breakfast-table, where the small woman had lately begun to appear, conducting herself like a little princess.

Oh, what a blessing she was! the pretty little maid! How her funny ways, her wonderful attempts at English, and her irresistible bursts of laughter smoothed over difficulties untold, and helped them through that painful hour—those two, who stood to the little one like father and mother, and yet to one another were nothing, and never could be. This was the strange anomaly of their relationship, that while Rosie was her own flesh and blood, closer to her than any child not her very own could possibly be, with Rosie's father there was no tie of blood at all.

The usual Sunday morning routine went on—prayers, breakfast, after breakfast play with Rosie—yet neither Hannah nor Bernard ventured once to look at each other, lest they should betray the piteous secret which—whether or not hers did—the deadly paleness of Bernard's features and his nervous, excited manner only too much revealed.

"I scarcely slept an hour," he said. "I had to sit up and write my sermon. And I found so much to do among my papers. I must never leave home again."

She was silent.

Then he asked her if she were going to church—an idle question for one who never missed church in any weather. Perhaps he did not want her to go? And she would have been angry but for the strange compassion she always had for him—the feeling that if any trouble came to him she should always like to bear it herself. And now he had more to bear than she. He must go up into his pulpit and preach, conscious that all eyes were watching him, all tongues gossiping concerning him. For in Easterham nothing was hid; rich and poor alike chattered of their neighbors' affairs; and James Dixon's visit to the House on the Hill, in all its particulars, was likely to be as fully known as Mr. Morecamb's interview with Lady Rivers, and its purport as regarded Hannah herself.

The Moat House, too, must be faced, for at breakfast-time a note had come asking them to dine there, though it was Sunday, as young Mrs. Melville had come over for the day, and particularly wished to see Miss Thelluson.

"You will go?" Bernard had said, passing the note over to her. Her first instinct had been a decided "no;" till, looking down on the bright little face beside her, Aunt Hannah felt that, at whatever cost, she must boldly show her own—at church, at the Moat House, any where and every where. There were just two courses open to her—to succumb to the lie, or to meet it and trample it down. So, again taking Rosie in her arms, she looked up fearlessly at Rosie's father.

"Yes, since Lady Rivers asks me, I will certainly go."

It was Hannah's custom to get ready for church quite early, that she might walk with Bernard thither: he disliked walking alone. Never was there a man who clung more affectionately to companionship, or to whom it was more necessary. But this Sunday he never summoned her, so she did not come. Indeed, she had determined not. She watched him start off alone, and then followed, going a longer way round, so that she only reached her pew when he reached his reading-desk. Then the sad tone of his voice as he read, evidently with an effort, the sentence, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves," etc., went to her heart.

Were they sinners? Was it a crime for her to look now at her dead sister's husband, her living Rosie's father, and think that his was one of the sweetest, noblest faces she had ever seen? that had she met him by chance, and he had cared for her, she could have tended him like a mother, served him like a slave; nay, have forgotten for his sake that sacred dream of so many years, the lost love of her girlhood, and become an ordinary human wife and mother—Rosie's mother? And it would all have seemed so right and natural, and they three would have been so happy. Could it be a sin now? Could any possible interpretation, secular or religious, construe it into a sin?

Poor Hannah! Even in God's house these thoughts pursued her; for, as before said, her only law of conduct was how things were, not in the sight of man, but of God. That love, which was either a righteous affection or a deadly sin, could she once assure herself that He did not forbid it, little she cared whether man forbade it or not; nor, if it were holy, whether it were a happy love or not.

Thus, during her solitary walk home, and a long, solitary afternoon that she spent with Rosie—earning that wonderful rest of mind and fatigue of body which the companionship of a child always brings—her thoughts grew clearer. Rosa's very spirit, which now and then looked strangely out of her daughter's eyes, seemed to say to her that the dead view all things with larger vision than ours; that in their passing away they have left all small jealousies behind them, and remember only the good of their beloved—not themselves at all.

"Oh, Rosa, Rosa!" Hannah thought to herself, "surely you are not angry with me, not even now? I am not stepping into your place and stealing away your joys! I have only tried to fulfill your duties toward this little one and toward him. You know how helpless he is alone! And his pretty lamb—I have to take care of them both. Rosie, my darling, who could ever love you like Tannie? Yet they say it is all unnatural and wrong; that any strange woman would be a better mother to you than I! But that is false, altogether false. When your own mother comes to look at you, as she may do every night—I would, if I were a happy ghost and God would let me—Rosie, look at her and tell her so!"

These wild and wandering thoughts, the last of which had been said out loud, must have brought a corresponding expression to Hannah's face, for the child caught it, and fixing on her aunt that deep, wise, almost supernatural gaze she sometimes had, answered, deliberately, "Yes." For "No"—given with a sweet decisiveness, as if she already knew her own mind, the baby!—and a gentle, satisfied "Yes," were among the earliest accomplishments of that two-year-old darling.

But when Rosie was put to bed, and left wide awake in her little crib, fearless of darkness or any thing under Tannie's "lots of tisses"—left to curl round and fall asleep in the blessed peace of infancy, innocent of all earthly cares—then this world's bitterness darkened down again upon poor Aunt Hannah. She went to dress for the Moat House dinner, and prepare to join the family circle, where she, always an uncomfortable excrescence, was now regarded— How and in what light did they regard her? Hannah could not tell; she was going there in order to find out.

Of one thing she was sure: the invitation was not given out of pure kindness. Kindness was not the habit of the Rivers family; they generally had a purpose in all they did. More than once lately Lady Rivers had told her, in as plain terms as so polite a person could, that she—Hannah—stood in the way of her brother-in-law's marriage; that his family wished him married, and she ought to aid them in every possible way toward that desirable end. Could there be a plan formed for lecturing her on this point?

But no. Bernard would never have allowed it. And if he had, Hannah would not have turned back; she had always faced her fate, this solitary woman; and as she now walked alone in the early winter darkness through Easterham village, she braced up her courage and faced it still.

Externally there seemed nothing to face; only a bright, pleasant drawing-room, and a circle of charming, well-dressed women, whose conversation suddenly paused at her entrance, as if they had been talking her over, feminine fashion, which no doubt they had. Hannah was sure of it. She knew the way they used to talk over other people—the Melville family above all, till Adeline belonged to it—with that sweet acerbity and smooth maliciousness which only women understand. A man's weapons smite keen, but they generally smite straight forward. Women only give the underhand thrusts, of which Hannah that night had not a few.

"What a long, dark walk, Miss Thelluson; only you never mind dark walks. Were you really quite alone? And what has become of Bernard? for you generally know all his proceedings. We thought him looking so well—so much the better for going from home. But what can he have done with himself since church-time? Are you quite sure that—"

The question was stopped by Bernard's entrance—ten minutes after the dinner-hour, of which Sir Austin bitterly complained to his son; and then offered his arm to Hannah, who stood, silent and painfully conscious, under the battery of four pairs of feminine family eyes.

"I have been home to fetch Miss Thelluson," said Bernard.—"Hannah, you should not have walked here alone."

And he would have taken a seat beside her, but Lady Rivers signed for Bertha to occupy it. Fenced in by a sister on each side, he had not a chance of a word with Hannah all dinner-time.

It was the same thing afterward. Miss Thelluson would have been amused, if she had not been a little vexed and annoyed, to see herself thus protected, like an heiress in her teens, from every approach of the obnoxious party. Mother and daughters mounted guard successively, keeping her always engaged in conversation, and subjecting Bernard to a sort of affectionate imprisonment, whence, once or twice, he vainly tried to escape. She saw it, for somehow, without intending it, she always saw him every where, and was conscious that he saw her, and listened to every word she was saying. Yet she made no effort to get near him, not even when she noticed him surreptitiously take out his watch and look at it wearily, as if entreating, "Do let us go home." Every simple word and act of a month ago had a meaning, a dreadful meaning, now.

Hannah was not exactly a proud woman, but she had a quiet dignity of her own, and it was sorely tried this night. Twenty times she would have started up from the smooth, polite circle, feeling that she could support it no longer, save for Bernard's sad, appealing face and his never-ending endurance. But then they loved him in their own way, and they were his "people," and he bore from them what he would never have borne from strangers. So must she.

So she took refuge beside Adeline's sofa. Young Mrs. Melville had never been well since her marriage; they said the low situation of Melville Grange did not agree with her. And ill health being quite at a discount among the Rivers girls, who were as strong as elephants, Adeline lay rather neglected, watching her husband laughing and talking with her sisters—flirting with them, people might have said, almost as much as before he was married; only, being a brother now, of course it did not matter. Nevertheless, there was at times a slight contraction of the young wife's brow, as if she did not altogether like it. But she laughed it off at once.

"Herbert is so merry, and so fond of coming here. Our girls amuse him much more than his own sisters, he says. Just listen how they are all laughing together now."

"It is good to laugh," said Hannah, quietly.

"Oh yes; I am glad they enjoy themselves," returned Adeline, and changed the conversation; but through it all the pale, vexed face, the anxious eyes, heavy with an unspoken anger, an annoyance that could not be complained of, struck Hannah with pity. Here, she thought, was a false position too.

At nine the butler came in, announcing, formally, "Miss Thelluson's servant."

"It is Grace. I told her to call for me on her way from chapel. I wished to go home early."

"And without Bernard? I understand. Very right; very nice," whispered Lady Rivers, in a tone of such patronizing approval that Hannah repented herself of having thus planned, and was half inclined to call Mr. Rivers out of the dining-room and tell him she was going. But she did not. She only rose and bade them all good-night. Not one rough word had broken the smooth surface of polite conversation; yet she was fully aware that though, with that convenient plastering over of sore or ugly places peculiar to the Rivers family, they said nothing, they all knew well, and knew that she knew they knew, why she was going, and the instant her back was turned would talk her over to their hearts' content. Yet she walked out of the room slowly, calmly, with that dignified, lady-like presence she had—almost better than beauty. Yes, even though she saw Lady Rivers rise to accompany her up stairs—a piece of condescension so great that there was surely some purpose in it. Lady Rivers seldom took trouble without a purpose.

Yet for a moment she hesitated, sat pulling her rings off and on, and eying with her critical, woman-of-the-world gaze this other woman, who fulfilled the apostolic law of being in the world, not of it. The long strain of the evening had worn Hannah out, and she was in doubt whether Bernard would like her stealing off thus—whether, since Lady Rivers thought it "wise," it really was not most unwise, thus to condense the cloudy scandal into shape by paying it the respect of acceptance. As she tied her bonnet her hands trembled a little.

"Are you ready? Then, Miss Thelluson, may I say just one word before you go? As a married lady and the mother of a family, speaking to a young—no, not exactly a young, but an unmarried—person, may I ask is it true what I hear, that you have had a definite offer of marriage from Mr. Morecamb?"

Hannah started indignantly, and then composed herself.

"I do not quite see that the matter concerns any one but myself and Mr. Morecamb. But since you have heard this, I conclude he has told you. Yes, it is true."

"And what answer did you give? You may as well tell me, for he will; he is coming here to-morrow."

Hannah waited a moment. "I have given the only answer I could give—No."

Lady Rivers sprang from her chair. "Good Heavens! Are you mad? My dear Miss Thelluson, I beg your pardon; but really—to refuse such an offer! If Mr. Morecamb had come and asked me for one of my own daughters, I would at least have considered the matter. To one in your position, and under present circumstances—"

"Excuse me, Lady Rivers; but I am myself the best judge of my own position and circumstances."

"So gentlemanly of him, too—so honorable—when he knew, as every body knows, the way you are being talked about!"

"He did know, then—" and Hannah checked herself. "Will you oblige me by telling me what he knew? How am I being talked about?" And she turned her face, white as that of a traveler who walks up to face a supposed ghost by a church-yard wall; shuddering, but still facing it. It may be only a dead tree after all.

"I am very sorry," said Lady Rivers; and no doubt she was, for she disliked saying unpleasant things, except in a covert way. "It is a most awkward matter to speak about, and I have kept it from the girls as long as possible; but people say in Easterham that it was not for nothing you took part with that unfortunate Grace—Dixon I can't call her, as she has no right to the name. In fact, I have heard it suggested plainly enough that the reason of Bernard's not marrying is because, were it not for the law, he would like to marry you."

Hannah stood silent. All the blood in her heart seemed to stand still too.

"We do not believe it, of course. Neither does Mr. Morecamb. Still it is generally believed at Easterham—and worse things, too."

"What worse things? Tell me. I insist upon hearing."

Hannah spoke, as she had listened, with a desperate calmness; for she felt that at all costs she must get to the bottom of the scandal—must know exactly how much she had to fight against, and whom.

"Miss Thelluson, you are the very oddest person I ever knew. Well, they say that—that—Excuse me, but I really don't know how to tell you."

"Then I will tell you; for I heard [redacted]

Dixon say it, and before my own servants—as, of course, you know; every body knows every thing in Easterham. They say, these wicked neighbors, that I, a woman not young, not pretty, not attractive in any way, with her dead sister's memory yet fresh in her heart, and her dead sister's child in her arms, am living in unlawful relations with that sister's husband. Lady Rivers, I do not wonder that you shrink from repeating such an atrocious lie."

The other was a little confounded. She had been so very patronizing, so condescendingly kind in her manner, to this poor Miss Thelluson, who now stood and looked at her face to face, as much a lady as herself, and ten times more of a woman. Nay, the fire in the gray eyes, the dignity of the figure, made Hannah for the moment even a handsome woman, handsome enough to be admired by many a man.

"Pray don't talk of lies, Miss Thelluson. We object to such an ugly word out of the schoolroom—where, however, your experience must chiefly have lain. This is what made me resolve to speak to you. You can not be expected to know the world, nor how important it is for Bernard, as a gentleman and a clergyman, that this gossip should be stopped at once. Of course I only refer to the nonsense about his wishing to marry you. For the rest, his own character—the character of the family—is enough denial. Still, the thing is unpleasant, very unpleasant, and I don't wonder that Bernard feels it acutely."

Hannah started. "Does he? Did he tell you so?"

"Not exactly; he is a very reserved person, as we all know; but he looks thoroughly wretched. We, his family, see that, though you, a stranger, may not. The fact is, he has placed himself, quite against our advice, in a most difficult and painful position, and does not know how to get out of it. You ought to help him, as, most providentially, you have now the means of doing."

Hannah looked up. She was being pricked to death with needles; but still she looked firmly in the face of her adversary, and asked, "How?"

"Do you not see, my dear Miss Thelluson, that every bit of gossip and scandal would necessarily die out if you married Mr. Morecamb?"

Hannah was but human. For a moment the thought of escape—of flying out of this maze of misery into a quiet home, where a good man's love would at least be hers—presented itself to her mind, tempting her, as many another woman has been tempted, into marriage without love. But immediately her honest soul recoiled.

"Lady Rivers, I would do a great deal for my brother-in-law, who has been very kind to me; but not even for his sake—since you put it so—can I marry Mr. Morecamb. And now"—turning round with sudden heat—"since you have said all you wanted to say, and I have answered it, will you let me go home?"

Home! As she uttered the word, ending thus the conversation as quietly, to all appearance, as it had begun—though she knew it had been all a planned attack, and that the ladies down stairs were all waiting eagerly to hear the result of it—as she spoke of home, Hannah felt what a farce it was. Had it been a real brother's home, there at least was external protection. So likewise was there in that other home, which, when she had saved enough, she had one day meant to have—some tiny cottage, where by her own conduct a single woman can always protect herself, keep up her own dignity, and carry out, if ever so humbly, her own independent life. Now this was lost, and the other not gained. As she walked on toward the House on the Hill, that cruel "home" where she and Bernard must live henceforward, as if in a house of glass, exposed to every malicious eye, Hannah felt that somehow or other she had made a terrible mistake. Almost as great a one as that of the poor girl who walked silently by her side, asking no questions—Grace never did ask any—but simply following her mistress with tender, observant, unceasing care.

"Don't let us go through the village," whispered she. "I'll take you round a nearer way, where there are not half so many folk about."

"Very well, Grace; only let us get home quickly. You are not afraid of meeting any body?"

For Jem Dixon was still at Easterham, she knew, though nothing had been seen of him since that night.

"No, no," sighed Grace; "nobody will trouble me. The master frightened him, I think. My sister told me the master did really speak to the police about him, in case he should trouble us while he was away. Look, Miss Thelluson, there he is."

Not Jem Dixon, but Mr. Rivers; yet Hannah instinctively shrank back under the shadow of a high wall, and let him pass her by. She made no explanation to her servant for this; what could she say? And Grace seemed to guess it all without her telling.

It was a bitter humiliation, to say nothing of the pain. As she bade Grace keep close to her, while they hurried along by narrow alleys and crosscuts, the thought of that happy walk home under the stars, scarcely a fortnight ago, came back to Hannah's mind. Alas! such could never be again. Their halcyon days were done. In her imaginary wickedness, her sinless shame, she almost felt as if she could understand the agony of a real sin—of a woman who loves some other woman's husband, or some man besides her own husband—any of those dreadful stories which she had heard of afar off, but had never seemed to realize. Once no power of will could put her in the place of these miserable sinners; now, perhaps, she was as miserable a sinner as any one of them all.

When reaching the gate she saw Mr. Rivers standing there waiting. She drew back as if it were really so—as if it were a sin for him to be watching for her, as he evidently was, with the kindly tenderness of old.

"Hannah, how could you think of starting off alone? You make me miserable by such vagaries."

He spoke angrily—that fond anger which betrays so much; and when he found he had betrayed it to more than herself, he too started.

"I did not know Grace was with you. That alters the case a little. Grace, take Miss Thelluson's wet cloak off, and tell the servants to come at once to prayers."

He was wise and kind. Hannah recognized that, in spite of the bitter feeling that it should be necessary for him to be wise and kind. She came into his study after all the servants were assembled there; and as she knelt near him, listening to the short service customary on Sunday nights, her spirit grew calmer. No one could hear Bernard Rivers, either in his pulpit, as that morning, or among his little household congregation, as now, without an instinctive certainty that he was one of the "pure in heart," who are forever "blessed."

The servants gone, he and she stood by the fire alone. There was a strange look upon both their faces, as if of a storm past or a storm brooding. Since this time last night, when, after her sore confession was wrung from her, Hannah had tottered away out of the room, she and her brother-in-law had never been one minute alone together, nor had exchanged any but the briefest and most commonplace words. They did not now. They just stood one on either side the fire—so near yet so apart.

A couple that any outside observer would have judged well suited. Both in the prime of life; yet, though he was a little the younger, he did not seem so, more especially of late, since he had grown so worn and anxious looking. Both pleasant to behold, though he had more of actual physical beauty than she; but Hannah had a spiritual charm about her such as few handsome women possess. And both were at that season of life when, though boy and girl fancies are over, the calm, deep love of mature years is at its meridian, and a passion conceived then usually lasts for life. And these two, with every compulsion to love, from within and without, pressing hard upon them—respect, tenderness, habit, familiarity—with no law, natural or divine, forbidding that love, in case it should arise between them, had to stand there, man and woman, brother and sister, so called, and ignore and suppress it all.

That there was something to be suppressed showed plainly enough. In neither was the free-hearted unconsciousness which, when an accusation is wholly untrue, laughs at it, and passes it by. Neither looked toward the other; they stood both gazing wistfully into the fire until the silence became intolerable. Then Hannah, but without extending her hand as usual, bade him "Good-night."

"Good-night? Why so?"

"I am going up stairs to look at Rosie."

"I believe if the world were coming to an end in half an hour, you would still be 'going up stairs to look at Rosie.'"

That excessive irritability which always came when he was mentally disturbed, and had been heavy upon him in the early time of his sorrow, seemed revived again. He could not help it; and then he was so mournfully contrite for it.

"Oh, forgive me, Hannah! I am growing a perfect bear to you. Come down stairs again and talk to me. For we must speak out. We can not go on like this; it will drive me wild. We must come to some conclusion or other. Make haste back, and we will speak together, just as friends, and decide what it shall be."

Alas! what could it be? Every side she looked, Hannah saw no path out of the maze. Not even when, seeing that Grace sat reading her Bible by the nursery fire—Grace was a gentle, earnest Methodist, very religious in her own fashion—she sat down beside her living Bible, her visible revelation of Him who was once, like Rosie, a Christmas child, and tried to think the matter quietly out, to prepare herself humbly for being led, not in her own way, but in God's way: the more, as it was not her own happiness she sought, but that of those two committed to her charge in so strange a manner—the man being almost as helpless and as dependent upon her as the child. For she had not lived with Bernard thus long without discovering all his weaknesses, which were the very points upon which she knew herself most strong. When he called—as he did twenty times a day—"Hannah, help me!" she was fully conscious that she did and could help him better than any one else. Did she like him the less for this? Most women—especially those who have the motherly instinct strongly developed—will find no difficulty in answering the question.

How peaceful the nursery was—so warm and safe and still! Not a sound but the clock ticking on the chimney-piece, and the wind murmuring outside, and the soft breathing out of that darkened corner, where, snuggled down under the bedclothes, with the round little head and its circle of bright hair just peeping above, "Tannie's wee dormouse," as she sometimes called her, slept her sound, innocent sleep.

Aunt Hannah bent over her darling with a wild constriction of the heart. What if the "conclusion" to which Mr. Rivers said they must come to-night implied her going away—leaving Rosie behind? The thought was too much to bear.

"I will not—I will not! God gave me the child; God only shall take her from me!"

And rushing to her own room, she vainly tried to compose herself before appearing in Rosie's father's sight. In vain. His quick eye detected at once that she had been crying; he said so, and then her tears burst out afresh.

"I am so miserable—so miserable! Don't send me away; don't take Rosie from me. I can bear any thing but that. It would break my heart if I had to part from my child!"

He answered calmly—was it also a little coldly?—

"Don't distress yourself, Hannah; I had no thought of taking Rosie from you. I promised you she should be all your own, and I mean to keep my word."

"Thank you."

She dried her tears, though she was, indeed, strangely excited still; and they sat down for that serious talk together, which was to have—who knew what end?

The beginning was not easy, though Bernard did begin at once.

"I shall not detain you long, though it is still early. But I must have a few words with you. First, to apologize for a question I put to you last night, which I now feel was intrusive and wrong."

Which question—that about Mr. Morecamb, or the final one, which she had answered with such sore truthfulness—he did not say, and she did not inquire.

Bernard continued:

"Let us put that matter aside, and speak only of our own present affairs. I want you to give me your advice on a point in which a woman is a better judge than any man; especially as it concerns a woman."

A woman? Hannah leaped at once to the heart of the mystery, if mystery it were. Her only course was to solve it without delay.

"Is it your possible marriage?"

"It is. Not my love, understand; only my marriage."

They were silent—he watching her keenly. Hannah felt it, and set her face like a stone. She seemed, indeed, growing into stone.

"My family—as they may have told you, for they tell it to all Easterham—are most anxious I should marry. They have even been so kind as to name to me the lady, whom, as we both know her, I will not name, except to say that she is very young, very pretty, very rich; fulfills all conditions they desire for me, not one of which I desire for myself. Also, they tell me—though I scarcely believe this—that if I asked her, she would not refuse me."

"You have not asked her, then?"

"If I had, there would be little need for the questions I wished to put to you. First, what is your feeling about second marriages?"

"I thought you knew it. I must surely have said it to you some time?"

"You never have; say it, then."

Why should she not? Nothing tied her tongue now. The end she had once hoped for, then doubted, then feared, was evidently at hand. He was, after all, going to marry. In a totally unexpected way her path was being made plain.

Hannah was not a girl, and her self-control was great. Besides, she had suffered so much of late that even the very fact of an end to the suffering was relief. So she spoke out as if she were not herself, but somebody else, standing quite apart from poor Hannah Thelluson—to whom it had been the will of God that no love-bliss should ever come.

"I think, with women, second marriages are a doubtful good. If the first one has been happy, we desire no other—we can cherish a memory and sit beside a grave to the last; if unhappy, we dread renewing our unhappiness. Besides, children so fill up a woman's heart that the idea of giving her little ones a second father would be to most women very painful, nay, intolerable. But with men it is quite different. I have said to Lady Rivers many a time that from the first day I came it was my most earnest wish you should find some suitable wife, marry her, and be happy—as happy as you were with my sister."

"Thank you."

That dreadful formality of his—formality and bitterness combined! And Hannah knew his manner so well; knew every change in his face—a very tell-tale face. Bernard was none of your reserved heroes who are always "wearing a mask." Her heart yearned over him. Alas! she had spoken truly when she said it was not buried in Arthur's grave. It was quick and living—full of all human affections and human longings still.

"Then, sister Hannah, I have your full consent to my marriage? A mere mariage de convenance, as I told you. Not like my first one—ah, my poor Rosa, she loved me! No woman will ever love me so well."

Hannah was silent.

"Do you think it would be a wrong to Rosa, my marrying again?"

"Not if you loved again. Men do."

"And not women? Do you mean that?"

"I hardly know what I mean or what I say," cried Hannah, piteously. "It is all so strange, so bewildering. Tell me exactly how the thing stands in plain words, and let me go."

"I will let you go; I will trouble you no more about myself or my affairs. You do not care for me, Hannah; you only care for the child. But that is natural—quite natural. I was a fool to expect any more."

Strange words for a man to say to a woman under any other feeling than one. Hannah began to tremble violently.

"What could you expect more?" she faltered. "Have I not done my duty to you—my sisterly duty?"

"We are not brother and sister, and we lie—we lie to our own souls—in calling ourselves so."

He spoke passionately; he seized her hand, then begged her pardon; suddenly went back to his own place, and continued the conversation.

"We are neither of us young, Hannah—not boy and girl anyhow—and we have been close friends for a long time. Let us speak openly together, just as if we were two departed souls looking out of Paradise at ourselves—our own selves—as our Rosa may be looking now."

Our Rosa! It went to Hannah's heart. The tenderness of the man, the unforgetfulness—ah, if men knew how women prize a man who does not forget! "Yes," she repeated, softly, "our Rosa."

"Oh that it were she who was judging us, not these!"

"Not who?"

"The Moat House—the village—every body. It is vain for us to shut our eyes, or our lips either. Hannah, this is a cruel crisis for you and me. People are talking of us on every hand; taking away our good name, even. James Dixon's is not the only wicked tongue in the world. It is terrible, is it not?"

"No," she said, after a moment's hesitation. "At least, not so terrible but that I can bear it."

"Can you? Then I ought too. And yet I feel so weak. You have no idea what I have suffered of late. Within and without, nothing but suffering, till I have thought the only thing to do was to obey my family's wish, and marry. But whether I marry or not, the thing seems plain—we can not go on living as we have done. For your sake, as well as my own—for they tell me I am compromising you cruelly—we must make some change. Oh, Hannah! what have I said, what have I done?"

For she had risen up, the drooping softness of her attitude and face quite gone.

"I understand you. You need not explain further. You wish me to leave you. So I will; to-morrow if you choose; only I must take the child with me. I will have the child," she continued, in a low, desperate voice. "Do what you like, marry whom you like, but the child is mine. Her own father shall not take her from me."

"He has no wish. Her unfortunate father!"

And never since his first days of desolation had Hannah seen on Bernard's countenance such an expression of utter despair.

"You shall settle it all," he said; "you who are so prudent and wise and calm. Think for me, and decide."

"What am I to think or decide?" And Hannah vainly struggled after the calmness he imputed to her. "How can I put myself in your place, and know what you would wish?"

"What I would wish! Oh, Hannah! is it possible you do not guess?"

She must have been deaf and blind not to have guessed. Dumb she was—dumb as death—while Bernard went on, speaking with excited rapidity:

"When a man's wish is as hopeless and unattainable as a child's for the moon he had better not utter it. I have long thought this. I think so still. Happy in this world I can never be; but what would make me least unhappy would be to go on living as we do, you and Rosie and I, if such a thing were possible."

"Is it impossible?" For with this dumbness of death had come over Hannah also the peace of death—as if the struggle of living were over, and she had passed into another world. She knew Bernard loved her, though they could never be married, no more than the angels. Still he loved her. She was content. "Is it impossible?" she repeated, in her grave, tender, soothing voice. "Evil tongues would die out in time—the innocent are always stronger than the wicked. And our great safeguard against them is such a life as yours has been. You can have almost no enemies."

"Ah!" replied he, mournfully, "but in this case a man's foes are they of his own household. My people—there is no fighting against them. What do you think—I am talking to you, Hannah, as if you were not yourself, but some other person—what do you think my step-mother said to me to-night? That unless you married Mr. Morecamb, or I Ellen Melville (there! her name is out, but no matter)—unless either of these two things happened, or I did the other wicked, heart-breaking thing of turning you out of my doors, she would never admit you again into hers. That, in fact, to-night is the last time you will be received at the Moat House."

Hannah's pride rose. "So be it. I am not aware that that would be such a terrible misfortune."

"You unworldly woman, you do not know! Oh, forgive me, forgive me, Hannah; I am forgetting all you must feel. I am speaking to you as if you were my conscience—my very own soul—which you are."

The love that glowed in his eyes, the emotion that trembled in his voice! Hannah was not a young woman, nor, naturally, a passionate woman, but she would have been a stone not to be moved now. She sat down, hiding her face in her hands.

"Oh, it is hard, hard!" she sobbed. "When we might have been so happy—we and our child!"

Bernard left his seat and came closer to hers. His breath was loud and fast, and his hands, as he took Hannah's, grasping them so tight that she could not unloose them, though she faintly tried, were shaking much.

"Tell me—I never believed it possible till now, I thought you so calm and cold, and you knew all my faults, and I have been harsh to you often—only too often!—but, Hannah, if such a thing could be, if the law allowed it—man's law, for God's is on our side—if we could have been married, would you have married me?"

"Yes," she answered, putting both her hands on his shoulders, and looking at him with a sad solemnity, as of those who take farewell for life; "yes, I would."

Then, before he had time to answer Hannah was gone.

THE FIRST DROP TOO MUCH.

FOR THE UGLY GIRLS.

No. VI.

THE motto that used to haunt our souls while laboring over copy-books, "No excellence without great labor," is just as true about personal improvement as any thing else. Few celebrated beauties have gained their fame without care in those arts which must be the earliest of all, since we have no record of their first teaching—the arts of the toilette. Madame Récamier, who exercised more power by her beauty than any woman of modern times, was bred by a most careful mother, versed in all the mysteries of training. Her exceeding delicacy of complexion was due to the protection she gave it, never going out except in her carriage, and scarcely knowing what it was to set foot to the ground. Margaret of Anjou and Mary Stuart, of earlier times, were wise as serpents in the magic of the toilette, disdaining neither May dew nor less simple lotion for cheeks whereon the eye of the world would fain dwell. Diana of Poitiers bequeathed a legacy of value to her sex in commending the use of the rain-water bath, which preserved her own beauty till, at the age of sixty-five, no one could be insensible to her. Ninon de l'Enclos left the same testimony. It is a pity that women have not the ambition to preserve their health and charms to the latest date, and give up their cases so shamefully soon. An intelligent maturity chisels and refines the face to a high and feeling beauty; that is to the attractions of youth what the aristocratic head of Booth would be beside a pink-and-white lady-killer of society. This serene and finished expression should find physical favor to accompany it. Nor is this to be gained, as many say, by leading a passive, emotionless life. People of vivid feeling are the youngest. Their quick alterations of mood make the face clean cut, yet do not settle it in uniform furrows. Both grief and joy, yearning passion and utter renunciation, are needed to sculpture finely the statues for the resurrection. Surely no one, even professing the loftiest aims, who understands human nature, can despise the care of personal beauty when, combined with moral worth, its influence is so nearly irresistible. Look among the portraits of those renowned as moral and intellectual heroes; it will be found their greatness was rarely associated with physical repulsiveness, and though their faces in the conflicts of life grew seamed and worn, yet in youth they must have been more than ordinarily remarked for beauty of a high order—Columbus and Galileo, Martin Luther and Whitefield, will do for examples. And if the reader goes through all the feminine celebrities, from the poets to the range of missionary biographies, "with portrait of the original," not one face in ten will dispute what I have said.

"I WAS SICK, AND YE VISITED ME."

Least of all let any woman heed smiling scorn of her weakness in taking pains to secure a good complexion—the real clearness and color, if she eschews the coarse pretense of powder and paint. George Eliot, with her masculine sense, bears witness to the irresistible tendency to associate a pure soul with a lucent complexion. No woman can be disagreeable if she has this shining claim; and I make no other apology for adding a few estimable recipes for the purpose from the collection of a foreign physician, Dr. Cazenave. He recommends, as a composition for the face, the following:

Three ounces of ground barley, one ounce of honey, and the white of one egg, mixed to a paste, and spread thickly on the cheeks, nose, and forehead, before going to bed. This must remain all night, protecting the face by a soft handkerchief, or bits of lawn laid over the parts on which the paste is applied. Wash it off with warm water, wetting the surface with a sponge, and letting it soften while dressing the hair, or finishing one's bath. Repeat nightly till the skin grows perfectly fine and soft, which should be in three weeks, after which it will be enough to use it once a week. Always wash the face with warm water and mild soap, rubbing on a little cold cream when exposing one's self to the weather. With this, care must be taken to bathe daily in warm water, using soap freely, toning the system with a cold plunge afterward, if one can bear it. This paste was used in the days of Roman ladies.

For pimples use this recipe: thirty-six grains bicarbonate of soda, one dram of glycerine, one ounce of spermaceti ointment. Rub on the face, let it remain for a quarter of an hour, and wipe off all but a slight film with a soft cloth.

The best wash for the complexion given is bichloride of mercury, two grains; muriate of ammonia two grains; emulsion of almonds, eight ounces; apply with fine linen. The frightful disfiguration known as mask is removed by a wash made from thirty grains of the chlorate of potash in eight ounces rose-water. Wrinkles are less apparent under a kind of varnish containing thirty-six grains of turpentine in three drams of water, allowed to dry on the face. The black worms called comedones call forth the simple specific of thirty-six grains subcarbonate of soda in eight ounces of distilled water, perfumed with six drams of essence of roses. But I prefer the advice of a clever home physician, who lately told me that he removed comedones from the faces of girls who applied to him for the purpose by touching the head of each with a fine hair-pencil dipped in acetic acid—a nice operation, as the acid must only touch the black spot, or it will eat the skin. Remembering that Lady Mary Wortley Montagu quoted the habit of Italian ladies to renew and refine their complexions by a wash of vitriol, I begged to know how such a heroic application could safely be made. The answer was that muriatic acid sixty per cent. strong, diluted in twelve parts of water, might be used as a wash, and gradually eat away the coarse outer envelope of the skin, if any one had fortitude to bear a slow cautery like this. Lady Mary records that she had to shut herself up most of a week, and her face meantime was blistered shockingly, but afterward the Italian ladies assured her that her complexion was vastly improved. On the whole, I should prefer the typhoid fever as an agent for clearing the complexion, as less dangerous and more effective.

LIFE IN MARS.

OF all the planets Mars is the one we can study best. He does not, indeed, come so near to us as Venus, nor does he, in the telescope, present so noble an appearance as Jupiter. Venus outshines him in the heavens, and Jupiter seems to show more interesting details in the telescopic field. Yet we see Mars, in reality, far better than either of those two planets. If ever we are to recognize the signs of life in any orb of those which people space, it will be in Mars that such signs will be first traced. As Venus comes near to us she assumes the form of the crescent moon, we have but a foreshortened view of a portion of her illuminated hemisphere, and her intensely bright light defeats the scrutiny of the most skillful observer. At the time of her nearest approach she is lost wholly to our view in the splendor of the solar rays, her unilluminated or night hemisphere being directed also toward us. With Jupiter the case is different. When at his nearest, he is seen under most favorable conditions, and the enormous dimensions of his belts render them very obvious and very beautiful features for the scrutiny of the telescopist. But then he is some 370 millions of miles from us at such a time, whereas Mars, when most favorably placed for telescopic study, is but 37 millions of miles away. A square mile on the surface of Mars would appear a hundred times larger than a square mile on the surface of Jupiter, supposing both planets studied when at their nearest. It is clear, then, that, as respects surface details, Mars is examined under much more favorable conditions than the giant planet Jupiter.

But here the question is naturally suggested whether our own moon, which is but a quarter of a million of miles from us, ought not first to be examined for signs of life, or, at least, of being fitted for the support of life. When the telescope was first invented, it is certain that astronomers were more hopeful of recognizing such signs in the moon than in any other celestial body. As telescopes of greater and greater power were constructed, our satellite was searched with a more and more eager scrutiny. And many a long year elapsed before astronomers would accept the conclusion that the moon's surface is wholly unfitted for the support of any of those forms of life with which we are familiar upon earth. That the belief in lunar men prevailed in the popular mind long after astronomers had abandoned it is shown by the eager credulity with which the story of Sir John Herschel's supposed observations of the customs and manners of the Lunarians was accepted even among well-educated men. Who can forget the gravity with which that most amazing hoax was repeated in all quarters? It was, indeed, ingeniously contrived. The anxiety of Sir John Herschel to secure the assistance of King William, and the care with which "the sailor-king" inquired whether the interests of nautical astronomy would be advanced by the proposed inquiries; the plausible explanation of the mode of observation, depending, we were gravely assured, upon the transfusion of light; the trembling anxiety of Herschel and his fellow-workers as the moment arrived when their search was to commence; the flowers, resembling poppies, which first rewarded their scrutiny; and the final introduction upon the scene of those winged beings—not, strictly speaking, men, nor properly to be called angels—to whom Herschel assigned the generic appellation, Vespertilio Homo, or Bat-men—all these things, and many others equally amusing, were described with marvelous gravity, and with an attention to details reminding one of the descriptions in "Gulliver's Travels." One can hardly wonder, then, that the narrative was received in many quarters with unquestioning faith, nor, perhaps, even at the simplicity with which (as Sir John Herschel himself relates) well-meaning persons planned measures for sending missionaries "among the poor benighted Lunarians."

Yet astronomers have long known full certainly that no forms of life such as we are familiar with can exist upon the moon. They know that if our satellite has an atmosphere at all, it must be so limited in extent that no creatures we are acquainted with could live in it. They know that she has no oceans, seas, rivers, or lakes, neither clouds nor rains, and that if she had there would be no winds to waft moisture from place to place, or to cause the clouds to drop fatness upon the lunar fields. They know also that the moon's surface is subjected alternately to a cold far more intense than that which binds our arctic regions in everlasting frost, and to a heat compared with which the fierce noon of a tropical day is as the freshness of a spring morning. They search only over the lunar disk for the signs of volcanic action, feeling well assured that no traces of the existence of living creatures will ever be detected in that desolate orb.

But with Mars the case is far otherwise. All that we have learned respecting this charming planet leads us to the conclusion that it is well fitted to be the abode of life. We can trace, indeed, the progress of such changes as we may conceive that the inhabitants of Venus or of Mercury must recognize in the case of our own earth. The progress of summer and winter in the northern and southern halves of the planet, the effects due to the progress of the Martial day, from sunrise to sunset—nay, even hourly changes, corresponding to those which take place in our own skies, as clouds gather over our continents, or fall in rain, or are dissipated by solar heat: such signs as these that Mars is a world like ours can be recognized most clearly by all who care to study the planet with a telescope of adequate power.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EMMA B.—Make your white grenadine by pattern of Worth Basque House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. Trim with alternate green silk and white grenadine ruffles. Kid gloves are worn here exclusively.—It is not "forward" for a young lady to ask a gentleman to whom she has been introduced to call upon her.

OLD SUBSCRIBER IN MAINE.—Do not get lace for your brown Irish poplin. Trim the skirt with a flounce of the same, and get an apron-polonaise of poplin of a darker color.

MARY L.—Your gray grenadine must be laid smoothly on thick white waist lining. Trim with narrow ruffles piped with cherry silk like the figure. The cut paper pattern of postillion-basque suit will be a good guide.

M. M. M.—Bias bands of black silk would be the prettiest trimming for your gray dress. Fringe of thick substantial cord does not mat. Your mother's poplin is not too light for a lady of her age. Why not make it with deep plain over dress like that illustrated on the first page of the last number (without the cape), and trim with bands of dark brown silk?

MRS. M. J. G.—Fringing-needles may be ordered from most of the sewing-machine establishments. We believe they cost 25 cents.

J. H. S.—Silks of the pattern and quality of your samples would cost probably $1 75 a yard. It is impossible to speak definitely, as the prices fluctuate.

SALLY.—Directions for draping shawls are given in Bazar No. 18, Vol. IV. Set Swiss frills upon the skirts of dresses. Make a basque of Swiss, and belt it with ribbon.

LILLA.—Folds and flat pleatings are both used by widows. To make your gray pongee traveling dress use pattern illustrated in present number. Trim with bias bands of lustreless black silk. When traveling it is admissible for a widow to wear a square crape veil pinned on her bonnet, and a short blue grenadine veil over her face. The blue veil is for comfort, not for beauty, and is constantly worn here by widows or others in deepest mourning when shopping or traveling, etc.

CHIPPEWA.—Your sample is French poplin, not so good as the Lyons poplin quoted in last week's Bazar for $1 25 a yard. Make it with a polonaise and single skirt like that illustrated in the present number. Trim with bands of silk and fringe.

E. E. E.—Flowing sleeves of black silk are lined with white or black silk according to fancy. Half-flowing sleeves of pleated Swiss muslin edged with lace are beneath.

MISS MARIANNE R.—The suit illustrated in our last number will be the model for your traveling dress. Make summer silk by pattern of Postillion-Basque Suit in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., and trim with bias bands edged with narrow lace. The Apron-Polonaise Suit in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., is an excellent guide for black silk costumes. Polonaises or over-skirts and basques are made with most piqué dresses.

MRS. J. R. B.—We usually issue Supplements every fortnight.—Black silk or the Frou Frou brown pongee would be becoming for a street and church suit for a brunette of thirty years.

A. F. C.—Patterns for most of the garments in an infant's wardrobe are given in Bazar No. 21, Vol. III.

H. F. H.—Your lace is of too coarse a quality to trim silk with. A silk suit for a young person will look well made by Postillion-Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV.

MRS. A. H.—Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV., will give you designs and patterns for girls' dresses.

JENNIE.—Your blue checked silk will look well made by pattern of Worth Basque Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. Trim with ruffles headed by bias bands. You can order the paper containing illustration from this office.

BACKWOODS.—Very lustrous alpaca is sometimes used under grenadine instead of silk.

SOPHIE.—As you are fleshy, make your blue poplin with a single skirt and polonaise. Use the Polonaise-Casaque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. Trim with bias bands and fringe.

WISCONSIN GIRL.—Read reply above to "Sophie." Passementerie is gimp.

S. E. B.—Make your black Irish poplin by directions given above to "Sophie." For your white brilliant use Short-Sacque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. Trim with bishop's lawn pleatings headed by a bias band of the brilliant.

MRS. A. R.—Black satin suits are not so stylish as gros grain.

A. E. D.—Make your striped barége by the Postillion-Basque pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. Trim with narrow bias ruffles. Make your black cashmere jacket with loose front and basque back. Get a black straw bonnet and trim it with black gros grain ribbon.

MRS. C. R. W.—We do not employ traveling agents.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV., will show you plates of dresses for your little boy and girl.

CHARLOTTE L.—We approve your idea of remodeling the gray and black suit. Get a soft-finished cambric to alternate with your seersucker. As your hair is thin, crimp it at night to make thicker braids in the daytime.

MRS. ADELAIDE.—For your little girl's plaid dress consult plates in Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV.

BRENA.—For black grenadine suits read New York Fashions of present number of Bazar.

L. L. D.—Make a polonaise of poplin of a darker shade to wear over your short gray poplin.

DR. AYER'S LABORATORY, that has done such wonders for the sick, now issues a potent restorer for the beauty of mankind—for the comeliness which advancing age is so prone to diminish and destroy. His VIGOR mounts luxuriant locks on the bald and gray pates among us, and thus lays us under obligations to him for the good looks as well as health of the community.—[Com.]

DIAMOND D MOHAIR.

It is an old maxim that a good article is always the cheapest in the end, and to nothing does this more fully apply than alpaca. Unfortunately, it is almost impossible for the consumer to know a good make from a bad one till worn, and the only safe course to pursue is to purchase a make that is known and guaranteed to wear well. The Diamond Mohair is one of the honest old original makes that first rendered the fabric popular for their brilliancy, color, and lasting qualities, and are as well made now as they were twenty years ago.

Retailers say they are difficult to introduce at first, ladies preferring heavier and more leathery goods. But these goods are warranted double warp, and are as heavy as an alpaca can honestly be made. The leathery goods are produced by elastic dressing and an undue quantity of cotton, and, of course, they soon get fuzzy, crease and wrinkle easily, and lose their color, and the dress is done.

The Diamond Mohairs, made only from the best alpaca yarn, are naturally brilliant, and will not lose their brilliancy; springy, and will not crease: and, having no dressing in them, are not injured by water.

Observe the brand, and do not be persuaded to take any other till you have tried these goods once, and you will find you have a handsome dress that will remain handsome.

Now to be had from nearly all first-class retailers.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

APRIL, MAY, and JUNE purify the blood and beautify the complexion by using HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and

HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

In the Spring and Summer months the system undergoes a change. This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

Prescriptions accurately compounded. French, German, and Spanish spoken. Stores open all night.

P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

OF A FAR HIGHER CLASS

than any other proprietary medicine of the day stands

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT,

And for this reason: it is an exact counterpart of one of the most valuable natural medicines in the world. We refer to the great Seltzer Spring of Germany, to which thousands of the dyspeptic, the bilious, the rheumatic, and the victims of venal diseases resort annually, and return to their homes convalescent or cured. The Aperient is one of the first and by far the most successful of all the efforts made to reproduce, in a portable form, the popular mineral waters of Europe.

FACETIÆ.

A PERSON, hearing "time is money," became desirous of learning how many years it would take to pay a little debt of a hundred dollars.

A QUESTION OF TIME—What o'clock is it?

The wife of an enterprising Yankee has just invented a machine for sewing—discord.

What lady can boast the greatest number of "airs?"—Dame Fortune.

APRIL SHOWERS.

Oh, April showers
Are good for flowers,
And fill the bowers
With perfumes rare;
But twinge erratic,
And pang rheumatic,
And not ecstatic,
Do they prepare!

And though the leanness
And arid meanness
Of lawns with greenness
They hide and clothe;
They, past disputing,
Set corns a-shooting,
Which makes your booting
A thing to loathe!

And of the Future,
Although they suit your Bright dreams, compute you're
The Past's sad prey,
The while you yell a
Vain ritornella
For that umbrella
That's stolen away!

A SUBLIME OCCUPATION—Raising the wind.

SPORT ON A GRAND SCALE.—A correspondent of the Indian Daily News, at Caragolah, in a description of some wild-beast shooting, says of the sportsmen who did it, that, "Besides the four tigers, they had a good bag of buffaloes, deer, and pigs." What a very large bag it must have been! Apparently there are giants on the earth again in these days.

LIGHT EMPLOYMENT—Building castles in the air.

Why is a sword like beer?—Because it's no use till it's drawn.

AN OBSCURE LIFE—The fly's in amber.

A minister once gave a commentary to an old Scotch lady who was well versed in the Scripture. He thought she would enjoy the explanations of her favorite passages. Calling on her a few days afterward, he said, "Did you like the book I gave you?"

"Ay, mon, it's a gude book, and the Bible explains it amazingly!"

A QUESTION.—Can a man eating dates be said to consume time?

A FIRESIDE TALE—The cat's.

A smart boy in one of the public schools, having been required to write a composition on some part of the human body, expanded as follows: "The Throat: a throat is convenient to have, especially to roosters and ministers. The former eats corn and crows with it; the latter preaches through his'n, and then ties it up."

THE GREAT JOINER—The lawyer: he can replace a tenant, empanel a jury, box a witness, bore the court, chisel his client, augur the gains, floor a witness, cut his board, nail the case, hammer the desk, file his bill, and gouge the whole community.

Why should a fisherman be rich?—Because his is all net profit.

"Grammar class, stand up and recite. Timma, parse 'girls.'"

"'Girls' is a particular noun, of the lovely gender, lively person, and double number, kissing mood, in the immediate tense, and in the expectation case to matrimony, according to general rule."

A fond father, blessed with eleven children, and withal a very domestic man, tells this story: One afternoon, business being very dull, he took the early train out to his happy home, and went up stairs to put the children to bed. Being missed from the smoking-room, his wife went up stairs to see what was going on. Upon opening the door, she exclaimed, "Why, dear, what, for mercy's sake, are you doing?"

"Why," said he, "wifey, I am putting the children to bed."

"Yes," says wifey, "but this is not one of ours."

Sure enough, he had got one of the neighbors' children all undressed, and he had to redress it and send it home. After that he left family matters to his wife.

Why are types like criminals?—Because they shouldn't be locked up until proof is taken.

A Pennsylvania widower with four children married a widow with nine, and is now seeking for a divorce. The reason given is that at morning prayer he prayed devoutly for the welfare of his own children, but could not find in his heart to put up a petition for the others, whereupon his wife beat him with the tongs until he implored of the Almighty to have mercy on her darlings.

THE BOARD OF HEALTH—A plain diet.

A light-house keeper was told the other day that complaints were made against him.

"For what?" was the inquiry.

"Why, they say that your lights do not burn after twelve o'clock at night."

"Well," was the reply, "I know they don't, for I put them out myself then; for I thought all the vessels had got in by that time, and I wanted to save the lie."

SIGNAL, DANGER.

CONDUCTOR (confidentially—Train just moving off). "I'd 'ave a Heye about if I wos you, Sir. This Train don't stop no more for Forty Minutes, and She've a bin trying to Kiss us Conductors."

VOL. IV.—No. 23.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

MISSES' POLONAISE SUIT.

WITH CUT PATTERN FOR GIRLS FROM SEVEN TO FIFTEEN YEARS OLD.

TWO views of this pretty polonaise suit are shown in the illustration—the back on a girl of nine, and the front on a girl of fifteen, years old. The pattern is graded, in nine sizes, from 24 to 32 inches, bust measure, to fit girls from seven to fifteen years old. The bust measure is taken by passing a tape straight around the body, under the arms. The suit may be made of any material—piqué, linen, foulard, pongee, silk, or cloth; the original is of green poplin, trimmed with alternate flounces of black silk on the skirt, and black flounces and bows on the polonaise. The suit is equally well adapted to girls of any age within the range above named, or even beyond it.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS suit consists of two articles—polonaise and four-gored skirt.

POLONAISE.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, side gore, back, and sleeve. Each part is notched to prevent mistakes in putting together, and also to show where to lay the pleats in the side seams of the skirt. The pattern is fitted with one dart for girls from seven to twelve years old, or in six sizes, from 24 to 29 inches, bust measure; and with two darts and the usual cross basque seam from the back dart to the seam under the arm, for girls from twelve to fifteen, or in three sizes, from 30 to 32 inches, bust measure. The perforations show where to baste the seams and to take up the darts in the front and the seam across the side of the front at the waist line, and where to cut out for the under part of the sleeve. Take up the darts and baste the seams in the body and skirt according to the notches and perforations, and try the garment on wrong side out. If alterations are needed, take up the seams more or less. The back has a seam down the middle to the waist line. The extra fullness at the top of the skirt is gathered into a belt, and adjusted to the form under the garment, the outside of the garment forming box-pleats in the back, while the front is fitted tight, and closed to the waist line with buttons and button-holes. The flowing sleeves are trimmed with a ruffle two inches wide, set on with a heading. Place the largest part of the sleeve to the notch in the armhole, and hold it toward you when sewing it in. The seven notches in the side seams of the skirt show where to lay the three pleats turned upward. Trim around the back and down the front to the waist line as marked with a ruffle two inches wide set on with a heading, which is sloped thence to a width of three inches, and continued round the bottom of the polonaise. The perforations in the front and across the back show where to set on the trimming.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide (for girl of seven), 3¼ yards.

Extra for trimming, 1½ yards.

For older children, add a quarter of a yard of material for every additional year of age.

FOUR-GORED SKIRT.—This pattern is in three pieces—half of front gore, side gore, and half of back breadth. Only half the pattern is given. Be careful to put the pattern together by the notches, and pay no attention to the grain of the paper. Trim the bottom with four flounces, three inches wide. Lengthen or shorten the skirt at the bottom, always keeping the same shape. The skirt is graded for the average

MADAME RAYMOND'S LETTER.

WE would call the attention of our readers to the interesting letter from our esteemed Paris correspondent, Madame EMMELINE RAYMOND, in another part of the paper. Madame RAYMOND'S position as editor in chief of the Mode Illustrée, the great weekly fashion paper of Paris, renders her oracular authority in matters pertaining to fashion. Our friends will see that the styles described in her letter vary little from those which we have chronicled during the whole season in the Bazar. The polonaise, which is so much in vogue here, is almost universally worn in Paris; the traveling suit with cape, which we illustrated a week or two since, is identical with that of the Paris belles; and the LOUIS XIV. vests, which are beginning to prevail here, are found equally in the French capital. Thus it will be seen that the war, which has so long obstructed communications, has not prevented us from receiving reliable intelligence, and that our friends the modistes and ourselves have contrived to be well informed as to the styles in the beleaguered capital. We are glad to say that we are promised frequent letters in future from Madame RAYMOND'S pen.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Making the Best of It.

MY DEAR EDWARD,—I hope that you and your friends who are about going into the country for your summer vacation, and who will loiter through the woods and fields, lying in the shade by running streams—"for in all true poems there must be running water," says the Bedouin in "Tancred"—and searching for the arethusa and orchis in their sylvan retreats—I hope, I say, that you will all be like Shakespeare's philosopher, and, as you saunter and stroll, find books in brooks, sermons in stones, and good in every thing. Indeed, that is the only true philosophy. It is the principle of the finest conceivable Manners upon the Road. It is the text of a sermon of infinite application, and I have certainly preached from it more than once. I am constantly reminded of this noble philosophy of travel by meeting its practical disciples, and straightway I fall to preaching. To find good in every thing, then, dearly beloved Roger—I mean, my dear Edward—is but another expression for making the best of it. And that is by no means a two-penny and easy resignation. It is something that we have yet not learned. If men had always made the best of it, we should be living in a very different world, my young friend.

The other day, when I was in another city, I was taken to see a very stately and costly house, finished exquisitely and furnished sumptuously. It was a marvel of luxury and skill. Within there were inlaid floors and noble staircases, and halls and drawing-rooms and chambers, full of wonderfully carved furniture, and masterly fresco painting, and gold decoration, and all that is richest in modern work; and without there were lawns and gardens, and terraces and fountains, and the rarest shrubs and trees, and conservatories and orchards, and every thing trained and ordered by a shrewd eye and an apt genius for landscape art. In the soft May evening, after dinner, as groups of lovely women, in superb toilettes, rose from a banquet such as Apicius never dreamed of, and with light laughter and low whispers stepped with the gentlemen out upon the marble terrace, a band of wind instruments, invisible in the grove beyond the lake, played music which the hour itself seemed to have inspired; and as evening closed around the loitering listeners the moon rose large and bright in the cloudless sky, shining over ranges of orange-trees and flowering oleanders, so that I seemed transported to the beautiful world of Boccaccio's stories.

Now, my dear Edward, all this beauty and grace and nameless charm is what we naturally desire—not, indeed, necessarily in this form, for that is a matter of taste. But every body would have his harmless tastes, whatever they may be, gratified, and his imagination soothed. That is the final cause of the constant and eager search for riches. We wish to be rich, not for the sake of money, nor merely that our powers may have the activity that money-making presents, but that our moral and social and æsthetic wants may be gratified. And so every man would like to live in what is to him a fine house, and to be surrounded with congenial society, and the best books, and beautiful pictures, and exquisite music and flowers, and all that gratifies the infinite desire of man. If we had all of us made the best of it from the beginning, perhaps we should have had all this. Now, then, as we did not, to make the best of it in this outward way of living is to have all the pleasure of these things without the things themselves. When old Stephen Girard said that his money could buy nothing more for him than board, clothes, and lodging, he merely announced that his soul was poverty-stricken.

As I came home from the city in which I saw the pretty scene that I have mentioned I stopped in a village, and was asked to take tea one evening with a young man and his wife. They lived in a small neat house—very small, but very full of comfort and simple taste. I remarked that it was a quaint little house, and they showed me a picture of the house as it was when it was built, half a century ago. It looked like a simple frontier cabin. "And in that house," said my host, "my old friend Noah lived when he was first married. There all his children were born, and he had ten; and on this little plot of ground and in that small home he and his wife made the best of it." By-and-by there was need of a school in the little settlement. A teacher could be found, but no room. So one day Noah came in and said, "Ma, if you can get on with the children in the other room, we might give this for a school-room." And his wife, whose heart was all motherly, said that of course she could; and so the school began. "I know people," smiled my host, "who, with less than ten children, find themselves crowded even in a large house; but my old friend Noah and his wife made the best of it."

We had tea in a simple, pleasant way, and then we returned to the parlor. There was no band of wind instruments to play from a distant thicket in the garden; but after a little conversation the wife seated herself at the piano, and she and he sang simple old songs together—songs full of memory and sadness; songs which bring youth back again, as a sponge passed over an old picture revives all the freshness of its color.

> "Ah! what avails the sceptred race?
> Ah, what the form divine?
> And every beauty, every grace—
> Rose Aylmer, all were thine!
> Rose Aylmer, whom these waking eyes
> May weep, but never see,
> A night of memory and of sighs
> I dedicate to thee."

Then there followed cheery talk again; and I observed a few rare and fragrant flowers in the neat room, and the indefinable evidence of taste and appreciation of all beautiful things, although every thing was plain and inexpensive. There was the impression of high and healthy life and sympathy, so that my memory and experience are both richer for that little tea-party; and as I shook hands with the hosts and came away I said in my heart that the good Noah and his wife, who had made the best of it, had left their spirit as a perpetual benediction upon the house and the household.

You see, my dear Edward, that if my young friend and his wife were rich they would have all the terraces and frescoes and carved oak chairs, and gondolas and music that Mæcenas had, to whose beautiful house I was taken. But not being rich, they did what they could, and, by making the best of it, they were as happy as Mæcenas. Their small means were a much larger fortune to them than Girard's famous wealth to him. For that poor man made the worst of it, not the best. He was like a man who, with a sound constitution and sturdy strength, should find nothing in them but freedom from sore throat. There are a great many people, my good Edward, who go about the world with an air of conferring an immense favor upon the Creator by consenting to live at all. They are of the elder Weller's opinion, that this life is "a wale"—a vale of sorrows and humiliations; and they are constantly saying, by the tone of their lives, "You see how patiently I endure it. In common with the rest of you, I am constantly scraping my shins and falling on my nose; but you observe that I don't swear about it. I don't even exclaim impatiently. I propose to bump on uncomplainingly to the end." And they pass, like gloomy clouds in summer, rumbling and growling with thunder.

Perhaps you think that making the best of it is a wretched philosophy, because it paralyzes exertion. If the savage, roaming his native wilds, I hear you saying in a fine declamatory strain, is content to live in a birch wigwam, and to pass his days in hunting and eating like the beasts he pursues, and to live a life sunk in ignorance and squalor, how is he ever to emerge into history as civilized and aspiring? Well, my dear Ned, if you will pardon a familiar strain after your heroics, it is, in the first place, very doubtful whether the savage ever does emerge civilized, and, in the second place, he does not make the best of it, but, like Stephen Girard, the worst. Look at it a moment in the simplest way. My young host of whom I spoke had a pretty marsh near his house when he bought it. It was covered with gracefully waving grass, and it blazed with gorgeous flowers in the summer; but it was also a source of disease. To make the best of it was not to leave it, beautiful as it was, but breeding disease and death. So he drained and plowed and sowed, and it is now a rich garden, and disease is expelled. To make the best of a thing is not patiently to endure it, but to get the best possible out of it. Musidora, whom in other years I knew, had not much voice, but she had a delicate and intense love of music, and she trained her voice so thoroughly that although you could scarcely hear her in a large room, yet her singing was an exquisite delight. She had made the best of her gift, and making the best was not repining that she had not a voice like Jenny Lind or Malibran, but practicing and studying until she sang so that, although I heard and rejoiced in Jenny Lind, I still remember those songs of Musidora's, as we see little stars through the splendor of the aurora.

I know that it is rather a general feeling that to make the best of things is merely to resign yourself to them—a philosophy which would cause us to leave the pegs in our shoes until they lamed us beyond walking: in fact, to subside into sheer fatalism. It is true enough that we can not avoid what is inevitable, but most of the mischief in the world comes from deciding prematurely what is inevitable. In the case of Musidora the limitation of her voice was the inevitable quality. No art and no industry would make it a great, magnificent organ; but it was not inevitable, by any means, that she could not sing exquisitely because she had not a great voice. To make the best of things is the radical remedy for that universal false modesty, which is only inverted vanity, that makes us say that nobody will care to hear or to see what we can do. Go to the daisy, vain skeptic, learn of the star dust and be wise! Shall the violet be ashamed to bloom, because of the Victoria Regia? or the farthest star wish to be extinguished, because of Jupiter? No, my dear Edward, this is the feeling which is so tenderly rebuked by that quatrain of Wordsworth's:

> "Small service is true service while it lasts;
> Of all thy friends, tho' humble, scorn not one:
> The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
> Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun."

And this is the direct lesson of the parable of the ten talents. The servant with the one poor little talent knew that the ten would make other ten and the five other five, but what could he do with one? Who cared for one? Jenny Lind was living, why should Musidora sing? The century-plant was in flower, how worthless the anemone! And what, translated into familiar and tenderer phrase, was the rebuke of him to whom only one talent was given? "Ah, unprofitable servant, thou knewest that it was a life of infinite variety of gifts and opportunities, and therefore thou shouldest have made the best of thine!" So be it, my dear Edward. Don't leave the walls of your room bare because you can not hang an original Raphael upon them, but put there the cheapest pretty picture you can afford. Don't be silent because you can not talk like Coleridge, but say what you think, and chew no opium. The ant in your garden walk, Edward, does not carry stones like those of the Cyclopean walls, but he makes the best of it, and carries what he can. My dear boy, let us learn of our ants.

Your faithful friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

THE UNPROFITABLE SERVANT.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

IN our own country loose thinking upon matters of political economy has not yet been largely disastrous; but over the sea the battle is fought with blood and fire and vapor of smoke. My friend, the mechanic of gas-pipes, who talks of traders as robbers and thieves, is apparently not far from the position of those red republicans of London who avowed to the world on Easter-Sunday "that the accumulation of property was robbery, and that those who accumulated it were not only thieves, but murderers." My friend's reason is that himself, a good workman, makes but hardly a respectable living, while the trader—a man of no more intelligence or education than himself—makes a fortune. To this it may, indeed, be said, "You, if you could do what the trader does, would receive the same returns;" but there are so many points which ought to enter into the comparison that one must be chary in accepting his conclusions. The money which a man accumulates depends not only upon what he earns, but upon what he spends, and upon how he spends it. Two men will work side by side in the same shop, upon equal wages. One buys cigars and wine, frequents balls and billiards, hires horses and carriages, procures fine clothes for himself and his family, takes frequent holidays, and finds himself at the end of ten years no richer than at the beginning. Another abstains from all sensual indulgence, finds amusement in the society of his family, carefully invests his small surplusage every month, and at the end of ten years, without any speculation, or any means except industry and prudent investment, is the owner of ten thousand dollars, and has besides lived a life as happy, and reared a family as comfortable, as respectable, as well educated, as his neighbor who has spent his all. Of course sickness or inevitable disaster may make a man's effort unsuccessful, but that is not robbery or thieving; and I know—for I have seen it again and again—that a good workman, by steady adherence to his trade, by forethought and economy, and a wise disposition of his money, may not only earn a comfortable living, but may lay up resources for his old age, and leave a sufficient legacy to his children. Let me see how a man and his wife manage their earnings before I pronounce robbery and plunder to be the cause of their impecuniosity.

The self-denial, the rigid economy, the wise forethought, which many rich men practiced before they became rich, and which was a part of the system whereby they became rich, is more than many poor people will practice all their lives. To walk when you can not ride is not self-denial. Self-denial is to walk when you can ride, and thrift is to take the money for investment. Expenditure is not extravagance. The poor are often more extravagant than the rich. Improvidence does worse for the former than ostentation for the latter.

It is true that the intelligence of the workman may be greater than that of the trader. A man ignorant and almost stupid in literary, scientific, or æsthetic matters may be successful as a trader; but he is always skillful. He may think SHAKSPEARE "would never have been heard of if he had not writ them plays;" but he is keenly intelligent as to the state of the market, as to what will be a good object to take hold of, as to the comparative value of stocks; and it is this keenness, this special intelligence, which is so handsomely rewarded. If the workman will become similarly and equally intelligent, he, too, will be equally rewarded. But to stand with lowering brow and arms akimbo, and mutter "thief" and "robber," is neither here nor there. He may, like his brother of France, become a red republican, without the excuse which his brother of France can plead; but when he has accomplished his end, and property is redistributed, and trader and workman receive by law the same wage, it is a question whether he will, on the whole, find life any easier.

"Cultivated people," continues my friend, "live on the industry of others. Cultivated people, you say, are what the country needs. We don't need them in this part of it, at any rate, for —— and vicinity are overflowing with them, and a more selfish or meaner class of people don't exist."

Practicing on this sound and salutary principle, it is to be hoped, good friend, you are doing all you can to discountenance and annihilate this mean, selfish, idle class, and to strengthen and honor your country by preaching and practicing the gospel of non-cultivation. You must never go to church, for the clergy are notoriously mean, selfish, and cultivated, lazily lounging in wealth which they have extorted from the pains of their people, riotously living on the industry of others. You must never attend concerts, for the concert is made by persons who have cultivated their voices to the last degree by unintermitting indolence. You must hear no lectures, for the lecturer, unless he is a very poor one, never added so much as a gas-pipe to the world's wealth. You must not buy books or magazines or newspapers, illustrated or otherwise, for you are thereby countenancing the droning swarm of writers and artists who have drifted through college, and sauntered through apprenticeship, and have now fastened upon the hard-working mechanic, the pure and virtuous gas-piper, who has been really doing something for the world, and force him to the book-stall to buy a Harper's Bazar for ten cents, while they themselves do nothing but scratch a wooden block or make black marks on white paper, which nobody can eat, drink, or wear. You must not send your children to school, for you are thereby not only pampering those bloated aristocrats who live on the industry of others, the mean, cultivated, and selfish school-teachers, but you are directly reinforcing their ranks by turning your own children into "cultivated people;" nor must you have them taught at home, for in so doing you will only change the place and keep the pain. You must denude your house of carpets and curtains, and pictures and looking-glasses, and paint and paper, for they are all means of grace and "cultivation." Nay, I do not know on what principle you can retain your gas-pipes, for we can be just as healthy, and some say healthier, without them. People lived contented and died in peace before gas-pipes were thought of. They do not add to the world's wealth, except that mineral wrought into gas-pipes brings more money than mineral in the rough. But, just so, words wrought by those cultivated villains, the newspaper writers, into editorials, or by selfish, idle, cultivated novelists into stories, bring more money than words lying around loose in the dictionary; and it is what cultivated people have done that makes your gas-pipes worth while. When you have sent out of your house every thing which cultivated people have sent into it, you will have very little use for gas. Whether, then, we look at the amount of vital force you put in your work, at the actual necessity of your work to the world, or at the happiness which your work brings to the world, we see no reason why you, as well as the writer, the preacher, the orator, the singer, the trader, should not be reckoned in the ranks of those who live upon the industry of others. It is only when you have steadfastly set your face and your children's faces toward the huts, nuts, and nakedness of the noble savages from whom you descended that you are living up to your principles, and advancing your country in the path of true glory.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MISSES' POLONAISE SUIT.

THE polonaise suit for little girls and misses, represented on our first page, shows how closely children's costumes imitate those for ladies. The cut paper pattern of this costume, if properly lengthened and enlarged every way, would be stylish for a lady; yet it is prettily worn by all girls, from the smallest to misses in their teens. The only important difference between small and large polonaises is in the arrangement of the darts. Small girls with immature figures require but one dart in each front, while those older and more fully developed must have two. The waist and skirt of this garment are cut together, each piece extending the whole length, fitting nicely over the hips, and dispensing with belts and sashes. Various materials are made up by this pattern. For wash goods, such as piqués, satin jean, and linens, we advise that lining be dispensed with; but for wool goods, poplins, and the pretty checked and striped summer silks, a lining of twilled cotton should be put in the waist. Braiding, embroidery, and pleatings trim washing goods; narrow gathered ruffles trim silks and woolens. It is a matter of taste whether the garment be buttoned down the entire front, or left open and drawn back by the bow on each side. Larger girls often have broad vests of solid-colored silk laid on the front, with square cuffs to match. Others have the trimming outlining a vest or a basque in front, and rounded in the back. The dress skirts are, of course, gradually lengthened according to the age of the child. Girls below twelve years show an inch or two of white hosiery above their gaiters. Pantalets are never long enough to be visible. Skirts of girls in their teens reach to the ankle.

The polonaise is commended as the best over garment for girls, because the waist and skirt being in one piece thus prevent that parting at the waist which is so apt to happen when restless, active children wear basques and overskirts. White muslin polonaises, trimmed with ruffles of embroidery, or pleated frills with narrowest Valenciennes edging, will be worn over summer silks by girls on dressy occasions. Piqué polonaises are for plainer dresses. Bows of ribbon, matching the dress in color, are at the sides of the polonaise.

MISCELLANEOUS.

French costumes imported for the summer display very short over-skirts simply draped, and an elegant imported street suit of black silk dispenses with the upper skirt altogether. This is a hint, perhaps, of the future, but at present New York ladies prefer long over-skirts quite elaborately draped. The Louis XIV. vest, very broad, and square below the waist, is seen in many handsome costumes. It is made of the darker silk used for trimming the suit, and often in contrasting colors. White lace and English embroidery on muslin, on colored stuffs and silks, are much used.

A new veil of black lace, with Spanish figures, is a large three-cornered piece of net with lace border. A point falls in front below the throat, while the other ends are tied over the chatelaine. In real lace this costs from $4 to $8. With imitation net and applied border, they are $1 50 or $2. Parker lace veils, three-fourths of a yard long, with one end rounded, cost from $2 to $3 75.

Lace sacques or jackets, partly fitted to the figure, are made of guipure net, with insertions in the seams, and a pretty border of lace. The sleeves are flowing. Black and white guipure sacques are both worn: they cost from $25 to $40.

The Princess Louise skirt is an English skirt of pale buff cambric or of French jean, trimmed with ruffles of the same braided and embroidered with white. They are to be worn as Balmorals, or, with a long over-skirt or polonaise, may be used as the lower skirt of a costume. In buff cambric they cost from $4 to $12; in twilled jean, from $9 to $20.

A useful novelty for nursing mothers, or for ladies to wear at the sewing-machine, or when doing household duties, is an apron of white rubber-cloth, ample, prettily shaped, with bib and pockets, and pinked around the edges: price $2 50.

GENTLEMEN'S FASHIONS.

SEMI-DRESS AND DRESS SUITS.

The spring and summer suit worn by gentlemen to church and on dressy occasions—such as visiting and afternoon receptions—consists of a dark cloth coat, white vest, and lavender pantaloons. The coat is the Newmarket, a frock-coat, longer than that of last season, made to roll low, and fasten with three buttons. The white duck vest is cut low, and double-breasted. The easy-fitting pantaloons are of doeskin, with fine twill and soft nap, or of striped English cassimere. The stripes are two shades of one color—not contrasting tints—or else the cloth is all one shade in lengthwise reps, or in woven stripes of different figures. Checked pantaloons in the English style are occasionally seen, but are not in favor with gentlemen of quiet tastes. Side stripes are not worn. Side seams are broadly lapped, and stitched to look as if corded.

There is no change in the suit worn for full dress. It still consists of a black swallow-tail coat, black pantaloons, and a white vest rolled very low to display an embroidered shirt front.

BUSINESS SUITS.

During business hours gentlemen wear entire suits of dark Scotch mixtures in stripes—not bold, showy stripes, but the merest line of white on black, brown, or gray grounds. The coat is in the Newmarket shape, either double or single breasted, with pockets and flaps. When made to order, the best tailors charge from $60 upward for such a suit.

For general use at this season, for promenades, for house wear, and even, indeed, for "down town," a frock-coat of diagonal cloth, either black or dark blue, will be found useful in a gentleman's outfit. The vest accompanying is of striped Marseilles, white, with a light pencil line of black or dark blue. Gray pantaloons complete this costume. An entire suit of black is seldom worn on the street except by gentlemen in mourning.

OVERCOATS.

Overcoats for the present season, and for cool summer evenings in the country, are of light drab and cuir-colored cloth, sack-shaped, and longer than last year's style. They are worn open their entire length, and rolled back to show a broad facing of silk.

TRAVELING AND SUMMER SUITS.

Traveling suits are of the Scotch cloths, either plain gray or striped, made with sack or frock-coat, buttoned high. Vests to match, with collars.

For summer suits, to be worn at the sea-side and watering-places, there is a novelty shown in Scotch goods of the pale fisherman's green now worn by ladies. The tint is so light and delicate that the most fastidious admire it and predict its success, especially when worn by blondes. The coat should be a negligee sack with cord seams. A suit costs $55 or $60. The choicest importation of the year is white Melton, thick, soft, and fine, not blue-tinged, but of that creamy whiteness becoming alike to brunettes and blondes. An elegant negligee suit, intended for Newport wear, costs $65. Twilled flannel of darkest navy blue is shown for yachting suits.

SHIRTS, COLLARS, AND CRAVATS.

Shirt fronts continue in the styles last quoted, viz., plain doubled linen or one or two wide pleats each side of a box-pleated centre. These are worn with every thing except full dress, when exquisitely fine embroidery is used for ornament. Most gentlemen select slender vines wrought each side of the studs, or else medallions of needlework surrounding the studs. Those more fond of the elaborate have embroidery on all that part displayed by a low vest. Ruffles, puffs, horizontal tucks, and full gathered shirt fronts are not worn. Percale shirts, for negligee wear in the country, for traveling, and for business in the city, have lines of color, either black or blue.

The English standing collar, with turned-down points in front, is much worn at present. Von Beust is the name given to the style most used. For summer the preference will be for deep turned-over collars, quite large, and worn very low at the throat in Byron fashion.

Stripes are in favor both for scarfs and made-up neck-ties. Of ready-made-up ties the Windsor is now the only shape worn. The knot is smaller and the ends narrower than in the winter tie, showing more of the shirt front. Plain blue or black, or else striped with white, are most in favor. Scarfs of twilled India silk, cut bias, and a yard long, are now common property, interchangeable between husband and wife; as those worn by gentlemen are selected out of the same case at the furnishing stores from which ladies make their choice. The same tints are worn by each—dull Watteau colors, sky blue, lavender; while some gentlemen venture, and successfully too, upon pale green scarfs. There is a difference, however, in the mode of arranging them. Gentlemen tie them in a lap-knot, and secure them by a ring. Grenadine scarfs are white, with blue or brown stripes, or else solid colors of deepest, darkest shades.

HATS AND SHOES.

The summer hat that will soon appear on the promenade is of pearl-colored cassimere, with bluish tint. The crown, not quite as tall as last year's style, is six and a half inches high, and has a light band of repped ribbon, fastened by a small buckle on the left. The curved brim rolls high on the sides, and has a binding to match the band. Price $7. The black silk hat now worn is of the shape just described. Undress hats of drab cassimere have half-high round crowns.

Shoes for summer are of the low cut, Oxford shape, tied on the instep in a different fashion from the Molière shoe lately worn. The toes are broad, heels low, and the ample soles show at the sides. Comfort and symmetrical shape are considered, but there is evidently no attempt to make the foot look small. For such shoes made to order of calf-skin fashionable shoemakers charge from $13 to $15. The shoe for full dress is a Congress gaiter of glove kid, with single sole: price $16.

PERSONAL.

AMONG the gentlemen named for the next mayoralty of Philadelphia is M. HALL STANTON, Esq., one of the self-made men of that city. Commencing business on the humblest scale, he has by ability, sagacity, and probity acquired not only the fortune due to and generally attained by such qualities, but has won the esteem of the community in which he resides. Few men in Philadelphia are more deservedly popular with the masses of the people, and no one has achieved popularity by means more honorable and commendatory.

—Two cases of extreme longevity have just come to the knowledge of the Bazar that are noteworthy. A few days since Mr. ANTHONY MURPHY, of Brooklyn, father of Mr. JAMES MURPHY, one of the proprietors of the Quintard Iron-Works, in this city, awoke at his usual early hour, and, having dressed and shaved himself, descended to light a fire. Feeling somewhat chilly, he returned to his sleeping apartment, and mentioned to his wife, who had not yet arisen, this feeling of coldness. She advised him to undress and return to bed, hoping that the warmth of the couch might make him feel more comfortable. He complied, and immediately fell into an easy slumber. After the lapse of perhaps an hour his wife spoke to him, but receiving no answer, placed her hand upon his face, and found it icy cold. The good old gentleman had peacefully slept his life away. The notable fact in connection with this incident is that Mr. MURPHY, who was never ill a day in his life, had attained the great age of ninety-six, and his wife had attained to ninety.

—Mrs. FRANCES MATILDA CONSTABLE M'VICKAR, who died in this city on the 3d of May, in the seventy-fourth year of her age, was the youngest daughter of WILLIAM CONSTABLE, one of the staff officers of General LAFAYETTE in the Revolutionary war, and, with General MACOMB, one of the largest land-holders of Northern New York under the MACOMB patent. She was a lady who united to the highest culture and most brilliant gifts the modesty, simplicity, and gentleness of the humblest Christian. Her daily life was the panorama of a Christian's duty, and closed by a death of peace.

—Of the historic names of New York, Governor SEYMOUR, in a recent address, says that the nine leading families whose names were prominent in the earlier affairs of the government were all representatives of different nationalities. Of these, the LIVINGSTONS were Scotch, the MORRISES Welsh, the SCHUYLERS Hollanders, the JAYS Huguenots, the HERKIMERS Germans, the HOFFMANS Swedes, and ALEXANDER HAMILTON a West Indian.

—Some nine or ten years ago General SICKLES, then a member of Congress from this city, set the example of giving the appointment of military and naval cadetships to the two boys of the public schools who, in open competition, should prove themselves best entitled to the gift. The two boys who were successful—GARRETT J. LEYDECKER and CHARLES SCHULTZ—each graduated at the head of his class, and LEYDECKER, now a captain of engineers, is a professor at West Point. Congressman S. S. COX, following the precedent established by General SICKLES, has given his appointments to the two boys in the public schools of his district who proved themselves most competent. After a very sharp competition, HEMAN DOWD, of Grammar School No. 55, and STEPHEN JENKINS, of Grammar School No. 11, were declared entitled to the honors. The former chose West Point; the latter Annapolis.

—Miss MARGARET FOLEY, who is now in Rome, and who has won a European reputation in sculpture, is a New Hampshire girl, and commenced her artistic life by whittling all sorts of pretty things in wood. By-and-by she got into chalk, and without any instruction cut some very fair portraits. Then she went, studied, and worked seven years in Boston; thence to Rome, where she has gained reputation and the "rhino," and where her studio is the resort of the cleverest people, in art or literature, who reside in or visit that city. She is now at work on a statue of the prophet JEREMIAH—that stern old Jerry who was always predicting to his countrymen the awful consequence of their indifference and faithlessness to the right.

—A party named LEVEL BEST was recently cowhided by his mother-in-law at Jefferson, Oregon. Which calls to mind the verse of genius:

> "Whate'er that woman was sot to do,
> She done it with a zest;
> No matter what her contract was,
> She done her level best."

—Mr. JOSEPH BELKNAP, of this city (no relation of Secretary B.), who has just been appointed supervising inspector of steamboats in the United States, was appointed solely on his merits as an engineer. In that capacity he is known among engine-builders as one of the most accomplished and skillful engineers in America, and as modest as he is clever.

—GUSTAVE DORÉ is not only a painter of quite conspicuous altitude, but a bit of a musician as well. In his parlor hangs a large photograph of Maestro ROSSINI, with this inscription written in the tremulous hand of age: "To my young friend, M. GUSTAVE DORÉ, who is not only the greatest artist-designer of the world, but also an eminent performer on the violin, and a very pretty little tenor, if you please." Being Alsatians, and therefore more German than French, the DORÉS are passionate dancers; and the waltzing there is therefore a serious and very driving matter.

—Mr. DISRAELI, who never permits an opportunity to pass to express one of his polite sneers, recently intimated his opinion of Mr. GLADSTONE'S character by saying it was as objectionable as it could be, and was "unredeemed by a single vice." He likens Mr. JOHN STUART MILL'S manners to those of a "finishing governess."

—When BISMARCK was Prussian embassador in Paris JULES FAVRE was his lawyer. The former is now a prince as well as premier, while JULES is decidedly out of favre.

—The cheerful manner in which the California journalist proceeds to "take the life" of a prominent citizen of that region is pleasantly set forth in the following paragraph in the San Francisco News-Letter: "We have at this office a very fine obituary notice of General A. M. WINN, the friend of the working-man. The old gentleman can not last much longer, and the daily newspapers, especially those devoted to the cause of labor, would find it to their interest to be prepared with a suitable eulogium. We have expended in its production a deal of patent mendacity, and can not but regard it as a very scholarly production. Nothing could induce us to part with it but the fear that General WINN may not die before next spring."

—Alas for fame! The collector of city taxes in Chicago a few days ago sent to the Common Council a communication to the effect that a special assessment of $2200 had been made upon the grave of Hon. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, to pay for certain lamp-posts, curb-stones, and paving in the southern portions of the city, and the courts having given judgment upon the special tax warrant, he should be compelled to proceed with the sale unless the Council directed that the property be not sold. Should this officer be compelled to discharge his duty the result will be that the grave of STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS will be the first grave, in all Christendom or history, that was ever sold to pay taxes.

—The Rev. Dr. WESTON, of Trinity Parish, in charge of St. John's Chapel, certainly had reason to "thank God and take courage" a few days ago, when Bishop POTTER visited that chapel and administered the rite of confirmation to two hundred and twenty-one persons, the largest class ever confirmed in any Episcopal church in the United States.

—Mrs. DIAMOND, of Missouri, broke the continuity of the marriage relation with Mr. DIAMOND a few days ago, and eloped with one GARNETT. A very clear case of "Diamond cut Diamond."

—The most successful book published in London during the year past was Mr. HEPWORTH DIXON'S sketch of the Tower. He has made upward of $50,000 by it already, and the sale is almost as brisk as at first. Mr. DIXON'S style is formed upon the model of MACAULAY. Mr. DISRAELI has realized $50,000 from "Lothair," and is now receiving $5000 a year from his publishers for the copyright of his works.

—JOHN M. FRANCIS, Esq., editor of the Troy Times, one of the best and most prosperous journals of this State, has been nominated as minister to Greece. From the humblest beginnings, but with pluck, patience, and brains, he has, through a quarter of a century's hard work, acquired fame and competence, and has ability enough and tact enough for three or four good American representatives abroad.

—A romance in little has just occurred near Rhinebeck, on the Hudson, near which, in a mansion of magnificent proportions, has for some time resided Mr. HENRY ASTOR, son of Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR. Mr. HENRY ASTOR last week concluded to become a Benedick, and to that end induced Miss SAVINA DYNEHART to "change her local habitation and her name," and become his wife. Miss D. is the daughter of a respectable farmer of that neighborhood, and a handsome, blooming maiden, with whom for several years he has been in love. There was some little protesting against the arrangement, but it finally subsided, and the course of their true love is now running as smoothly and nicely as need be.

—Dr. LIVINGSTONE'S personal existence and tolerable health is at last definitively settled. The last news says that he is not at Ijijijiji, but has gone up to Yxyxyxy.

—Governor CLAFLIN has nominated to the Council of Massachusetts Mrs. JULIA WARD HOWE and Miss MARY E. STEVENS as justices of the peace. Miss S. has had considerable legal experience in the office of the Registry of Deeds in Boston. Judge HOWE has not had any protracted judicial training.

—Mr. CORCORAN, who lies so dangerously ill in Washington, has done very noble things for that city and vicinity, chief among which are the picturesque "Oak Hill Cemetery," at Georgetown; the "Louise Home," a fine edifice for the accommodation of poverty-stricken gentlewomen; the "Surgical Hall" of Columbian College; and the magnificent "Art Gallery," opposite the War Department. This gallery is to contain his private collection, which has cost nearly $200,000, with a gallery for annual exhibitions of the works of American artists, a school of instruction, etc.

—The late ABEL MINARD has left to the Drew Theological Seminary, in New Jersey, one hundred thousand dollars, with which to establish a professorship for the specific purpose of giving ladies a theological education.

—Mr. DARWIN'S theory about the gentlemanly sort of animal from whom SOLOMON, CÆSAR, SHAKSPEARE, and the rest of us are descended, has come to be the subject of rational amusement in England. As the peripatetic Briton now goes to his office or business he improves the time by examining the ears of the people he meets in order to discover whether they bear the "mark of the beast," which DARWIN discovered. It is said that the pointed tip of the ear of our monkey progenitors is inherited by not a few men, only considerably disguised; in fact, quite different from the pointed ears of fauns and satyrs. It may be detected in the rim of the ear, and about one-quarter of the distance from the top, where there is sometimes found a considerable enlargement of the rim, making an obtuse point turned upward.

—Cincinnati papers rather favor the project of consolidating several classical schools in that city into a university, and offering to Mr. HERBERT SPENCER the presidency.

ALPHABETS, MONOGRAMS, VIGNETTES, CORONETS, AND FIGURES.—WHITE EMBROIDERY.

Digitized by Google

Alphabets, Vignettes, Coronets, and Figures for Marking Linen, Handkerchiefs, Fancy Articles, etc.

See Illustration on page 356.

THE upper alphabet is suitable for marking linen. It is worked in diagonal half-polka stitch and satin stitch. The under alphabet is especially designed for marking handkerchiefs. The large white parts are worked in satin stitch, the dots in knotted stitch, and the fine lines in diagonal half-polka stitch. The coronets and figures may be used for marking linen. They are worked in satin and half-polka stitch. The vignettes may be worked in white or satin stitch embroidery; in the latter case they are worked on velvet, cloth, leather, or silk, and are suitable for trimming cigar-cases, memorandum-books, key-bags, etc. They are worked in satin stitch, back stitch, half-polka stitch, and knotted stitch and application.

Directions for folding and packing Clothing, Figs. 1-15.

As many ladies are unacquainted with the proper method of folding and packing clothing, we give herewith descriptions and illustrations thereof, which will doubtless be found useful in the approaching traveling season. Nothing injures garments more than being carelessly folded in packing. Articles of velvet, silk, woolen, or cotton may be folded according to our directions. Of course, greater care must be taken with garments which are much injured by pressure, such as velvet, wool, or silk, than with those which can be freshened by ironing after unpacking them. It is very necessary that each piece should be spread out smoothly on a table of the requisite size, with the seams, ruffles, flounces, and pleats carefully smoothed out and evenly arranged, in order to prevent folds and creases as far as possible. It is well in packing to have a large quantity of tissue-paper at hand. This is spread out, folded, or rolled up in balls, as may be required, and laid between the pleats, pieces turned down, flounces, etc., or spread out over the surface of the garment, in order to prevent the creases, which are so easily made and so difficult to remove in some materials. With the exception of plain, untrimmed waists, all garments should be folded so that the right side (outside) comes on the outside. In folding cloaks, skirts, over-skirts, etc., as here described, the length and breadth of the trunk into which they are to be packed should be taken into consideration. It is of little consequence whether the pieces turned down of garments be wide or narrow, long or short, but of great consequence that the garment should fit as closely as possible into the trunk, and should be held firmly in its place and prevented from slipping backward and forward. In packing, care should be taken that all the pieces turned down do not lie on each other, but come alternately, first on one, and then on the other side of the trunk.

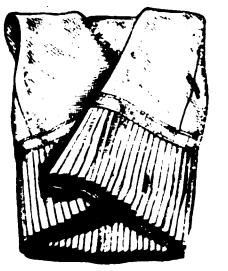

Fig. 3.—MANNER OF FOLDING TRIMMED SKIRT.—THIRD STEP.

Figs. 1-3.—MANNER OF FOLDING A SHORT TRIMMED SKIRT. First fold the skirt double, so that the middle of the front and back of the skirt each form a fold (see Fig. 1), and spread out the skirt smoothly on a table, so that the upper and under edges are even, and the corresponding seams come on each other. Next straighten out the pleats, so that the material lies as smoothly as possible, and carefully arrange the trimming of the bottom of the skirt. Then lay the skirt over on the outside along the dotted line designated by a b on Fig. 1; the under width of the piece thus turned down, which forms a triangle, must be one-third of the under width of the skirt. In turning down the back of the skirt, lay the right hand flatly on the skirt close to the fold to be formed, turn the piece over with the left hand, and then with the right hand smooth out the material inside of the fold, so that no creases may be formed. In the same manner turn the second piece over along the dotted line designated by c d on Fig. 1, whereby the skirt takes the shape shown by Fig. 2. Finally, fold the top of the skirt crosswise; on Fig. 2 the line for this fold is designated by e f, but it should be remembered that the fold is not always formed along the line e f, but that the length of the trunk must be taken into consideration. If the skirt is no longer than the trunk, the fold along the line e f is not formed at all. In this manner not only walking skirts, but skirts with trains of various lengths, plainly or richly trimmed, and also petticoats of all kinds, are folded. In folding trained skirts, more pieces are, of course, turned down, as they are longer and wider than the skirts of walking suits.

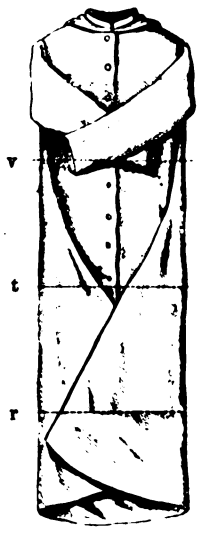

Fig. 10.—MANNER OF FOLDING WATER-PROOF.—SECOND STEP.

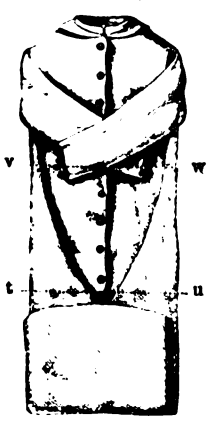

Fig. 11.—MANNER OF FOLDING WATER-PROOF.—THIRD STEP.

Figs. 4 and 5.—MANNER OF FOLDING OVER-SKIRT. The styles of over-skirts being exceedingly varied, we can give only a few general rules, as the turning down of the pieces depends upon length and breadth of the over-skirt. When the over-skirts are elaborately draped and very bouffant, the bands that drape them must be ripped off, the buttons taken out of the loops, and the strings loosened, in order that the skirt may be smoothly spread out and folds and creases prevented as far as possible. When the over-skirt is of the same shape as the under-skirt, it is folded in a similar manner (see Figs. 1-3). When the back breadths are pleated at the sides, as is the case with the over-skirt shown by Figs. 4 and 5, close the binding, and lay the skirt so that the middle of the front comes on the middle of the back; then take up the skirt by the binding and shake it out. Spread it out so that the back of the skirt comes on the top (see Fig. 4), and carefully smooth out the pleats, folds, trimming, etc. Arrange the pleated back part of the skirt in a wide box-pleat, as shown by Fig. 4, and then turn down a piece on each side, as with the skirt above described (the lines for the folds of these pieces are designated by g h and i k on the illustration), so as to give the over-skirt the shape shown by Fig. 5. If the skirt is still too long for the trunk, fold it across at the top or bottom, according to the arrangement of the skirt.

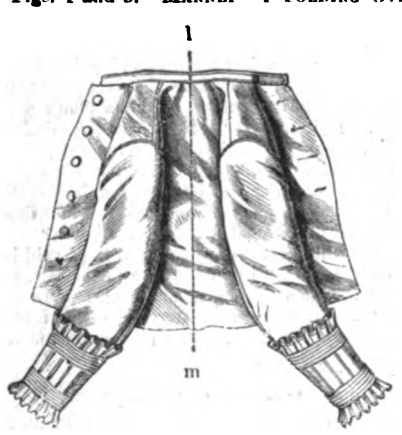

Fig. 6.—MANNER OF FOLDING WAIST. FIRST STEP.—[See Figs. 7 and 8.]

Figs. 6-8.—MANNER OF FOLDING WAIST. First take the waist by the front corners of the neck, shake it out, and spread it out smoothly and flatly on a table, with the right side of the waist turned upward. Then smooth out the darts and all the seams, especially the seams of the sleeves, so that the upper and under part of each sleeve come exactly on each other, and lay the sleeves in the position shown by Fig. 6; in doing this lay the back and fronts each in a triangular pleat from the upper end of the sleeve to the neck of the waist at the puff there. Then fold the waist double along the dotted middle line indicated by l m on Fig. 6, so that the two sleeves lie on each other as shown by Fig. 7, and the inside of the waist comes outside. In doing this take hold of one sleeve of the waist at the under corner and at the upper end at the beginning of the triangular pleat, and lay it on the other sleeve. Then smooth out the pleats and folds again, so that they are in the position previously given them. Fig. 7 shows one front not folded over, so that the exact position of the sleeve may be seen. The waist must now be of the shape shown by Fig. 8. Finally, smooth out the folds and pieces turned down, and form a pleat at both sides of each side seam (see Fig. 8). In this manner fold blouse-waists, high-necked untrimmed waists, basques, jackets, etc. Richly trimmed waists and paletots, or velvet waists, are arranged like the paletot shown by Fig. 15.

Fig. 9.—MANNER OF FOLDING WATER-PROOF. FIRST STEP.—[See Figs. 10-14.]

Fig. 15.—MANNER OF FOLDING PALETOT.

Figs. 9-14.—MANNER OF FOLDING WATER-PROOF CLOAK. To fold the cloak for strapping, close it down the middle of the front, then spread it out smoothly and flatly on a table, so that the fronts come on the top, and the middle of the front and back of the cloak come on each other. Smooth out the side seams and shoulder seams, and turn down a piece along each dotted line indicated by n o and p q on Fig. 9 in the manner described for the skirt shown by Figs. 1-3, and smooth out the material along the folds. Lay the sleeves crosswise on each other as shown by Fig. 10; in doing this always lay one hand flatly and firmly on the water-proof cloak close by the seam of the armhole, smooth out the inner fold thus formed, and arrange the pleats formed by the folding. Then fold the water-proof cloak crosswise, beginning with the first (the under) piece turned down indicated by the dotted line r s (see Fig. 10); the second piece is turned down along the dotted line indicated by t u (see Fig. 11); the third piece along the dotted line indicated by v w (see Fig. 12); in doing this, however, turn down the upper part of the water-proof cloak on the under side, and not on the upper side, like the pieces previously turned down (see Fig. 13), so that the hood now comes on the top. Then fold the water-proof cloak double once more. In fastening the cloak in a shawl strap the hood must come on the outside. If the cloak is to be packed in a trunk, it must first be folded as shown by Figs. 9 and 10, and then crosswise, so that here also the hood comes on the outside. The hood must be smoothed out. Water-proof cloaks with capes are folded in a similar manner, only fold the cape at the same time with the cloak along each shoulder line, and turn down a piece on each side of the cape. Fold Gabrielle dresses, over dresses, morning wrappers, and very long, loose, and half-fitting paletots in the manner described for the cloak, but always turn down the pieces to fit the length and breadth of the trunk, as before remarked.

Fig. 14.—MANNER OF FOLDING WATER-PROOF. SIXTH STEP.

Fig. 12.—MANNER OF FOLDING WATER-PROOF.—FOURTH STEP.

Fig. 15.—MANNER OF FOLDING PALETOT. Close the paletot down the front, and fold it double, so that the middle of the front and back come on each other, hold it on each side of the standing collar, shake it out and spread it out on a table; in doing this let the fronts come on the top. Then smooth it out, smooth out the shoulder and side seams, and carefully arrange the trimming. Lay the sleeves crosswise over each other, in doing which lay the hand flatly on the paletot close by the armhole seam, and smooth out the material of the sleeve along the inner fold. Each sleeve is carefully spread out so that the layers of material lie smoothly on each other. If the paletot is richly trimmed with lace, passementerie, or ruffles, tissue-paper must be used; it is also advisable to lay the same between the sleeves and the fronts along the inner fold. Paletots of heavy silk, velvet, etc., and waists and blouse-waists with trimming, mantelets with sleeves, etc., are folded in the same manner. With the assistance of the directions here given, it will not be difficult to fold any other garment, as, for instance, a talma, burnouse, sortie-de-bal, cape, etc., by carefully following the general rules given in the beginning.

SMALL BEGINNINGS.

WORST of all the small beginnings easy to check, and impossible to subdue when suffered to come to maturity, are those habits of temper, of manners, of conduct, in which we indulge, at first with the idea perhaps that we can break them off when we will, to find, when too late, that the Old Man of the Sea is about the truest allegory ever framed. There is not one person now reading these words who is not conscious for his or her own part of the present tyranny of habits, one or more, which could once have been checked as easily as the Dutch boy stopped the deluge of waters. Now, not the hands of many strong men could hold back what the little finger of a lad would once have been sufficient to overcome. Lives have been wasted, families have been ruined, interests neglected, duties sacrificed, all for the arbitrary requirements of habit, all for the solace of selfisms, which might have been subdued and brought under when the time was young. No man gets up one morning a full-blown drunkard, a confirmed gambler, an irredeemable scoundrel anyhow. He begins, then he goes on, and then he gets fixed and confirmed; at the end, if you will, he is immovable; but in the beginning he and his habits were plastic, and the latter were weak, and might have been crushed like a newly-hatched crocodile, if only he would have set his heel on them. We may be sure that the small beginnings of all things have to be most carefully considered, and their growth guarded against if that growth would be an evil. In its commencement, almost every thing in life is manageable; as the flood let loose, there is scarce any fact connected with humanity that does not go beyond control. Debt, disease, evil passions and unwise ones, bad habits, vices, sinful thoughts, and ruinous practices, all are within one's own power to control in the beginning, if greater than the strength of armies in the end. But we walk willfully, heedlessly, blindly on our way, and let the drops trickle through the rent, and take no notice of them. We do not look on to the time when the dike shall have broken down and the waters have spread abroad. If we could see what was before us! Well, if we could, we would stop the small beginnings, just as Sindbad would have kicked over the Old Man of the Sea, and refused him a mount across his shoulders, could he have foreseen the tyranny that was to follow.

MY LOVE!

A SONG OF SPRING.

Bring me a lily crown! My love is fair!
No bloom less pure upon her brow must rest.
Twine wreaths of May and apple for her hair;
Pluck roses red to rest on her white breast.
Pelt her with golden cowslips when she sweeps
Through meadows daisy-starred, for at her feet
The bluebell hangs its gentle head and weeps.
My love is sweet!

Come to me, Spring, my love! the days are long;
Mourning is over since white winter's death:
The morning-carol and the even-song
Of lark and nightingale, the honeyed breath
Of myriad flowers, the soft scent of hay
Tossed in the meadows, and the sky's true blue,
Tell me that Spring has come, and point the way,
My love, to you!

Kiss me with kisses sweeter than the hay
Or milk-white lilies in the valley grown.
Your touch is tender, and your mouth is May;
Your voice dream-music, and your heart mine own.
Woo me to sleep with woodland melodies,
With breezes sighing through leaf wilderness:
My heart is sick, and hungers for your eyes
And your caress!

Tell me, my Spring, my love, how long 'twill last!
Say will your smile all sunshine melt with May!
Life is so sorrowful when love is past;
And love when warmest whispers its decay.
Nothing is sweeter than the kiss you blow,
No sound more welcome than your fairy feet;
And, as you wander, tears of tender snow
Surround you sweet!

PARIS FASHIONS.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

IF I were to define the character of our present fashions, and what they contain in the germ, I should call them a transition style, which looks forward to a future of simplicity, without letting go, however, of the extreme elegance of the past. We have by no means abandoned over-skirts, the most graceful of all fashions; but their draping is much less complicated, and their trimming much less elaborate.

Whatever may be the material chosen for a summer dress, whether foulard, lawn, mohair, or simple mousseline de laine, the trimmings are almost always composed of two shades of the same color; thus, to cite but one example, which is repeated in every shade and material, I saw a dress yesterday, made by a celebrated modiste, with an under-skirt of pearl gray lawn trimmed with a flounce four inches wide of the same material, but bound with a darker shade; above this flounce were three bias folds, each four-fifths of an inch wide, the first of the same shade as the dress, the second of the darker shade, and the third like the first. The bias folds overlapped each other so as to cover the seams. The over-skirt was trimmed in the same manner, but with narrower bias folds and flounce. The waist was in the form of a tight-fitting cassaque, with two separate and pointed tabs behind, edged with the same trimming, but narrower, as that on the skirt and over-skirt. Half-flowing sleeves trimmed like the waist: the latter had two points in front, which, however, were much shorter than those in the back. This dress is worn in the street without a wrapping, shawl, or mantelet of any kind.

Long or trained dresses are never worn, we may say; these dresses are reserved solely for evening toilettes, and none of these are made this season. A lady who should appear in the daytime with a trained dress would look as ridiculous as if she wore white gloves and diamonds in the street.

The most popular garment of the season is the polonaise. It is adapted to every style of dress, and serves as well for traveling as for walking and visiting toilettes. Before the introduction of the polonaise a lady was obliged to put on first a skirt, secondly an over-skirt, thirdly a waist, fourthly a voluminous sash, and fifthly a paletot. Now three of the aforesaid five articles are gotten rid of, and dressing is made an expeditious affair. The skirt of the polonaise is trimmed in any style that may be desired, and is cut with or joined to a half-fitting waist in the form of a small paletot, so that the garment is put on in the twinkling of an eye. The polonaise is made of black cashmere or the material of the suit, and is worn over any kind of skirt, even black and white striped percale, linen, organdy, or écru pongee, or even white muslin trimmed with white insertion and guipure, or else embroidered in dots or sprigs, in which case the trimming is composed of ruches and flounces of white muslin, or of the material used for the polonaise. For a long time it has been a source of regret that white muslin dresses could not be worn in summer, which was impossible while people persisted in wearing trained dresses in the daytime, for this kind of dresses could not be made in muslin; moreover, the style of draping and looping the over-skirts was too complicated for them, as in sitting down the folds and drapery were crushed out of all shape. But now, with the polonaise, which is neither very long nor elaborately trimmed, and which can be raised or put aside in sitting, these graceful and comfortable dresses can be worn with impunity. White muslin over-skirts are also worn over plain silk or foulard dresses.

Apart from the polonaise, which is only a modification of the large casaques in vogue some two years ago, few other wrappings are worn except short, full, slashed paletots, of the same material as the dress, whatever that may be. The paletot of the moment is the Garde Mobile, which is full, but pleated a little in the back by two tabs trimmed with metal buttons. The same buttons are on the cuffs and the front of the paletot, which is turned back at the top, forming large revers.

The most elegant dresses are of light foulard or silk, always of a neutral tint, such as écru, mauve, and gray above all—gray in every shade. For these dresses the waist, made with large basques in the form of a tight-fitting casaque, almost always has a Louis XIV. vest—that is, very long in front, and descending below the belt. This vest rarely differs in color from the dress, but is always of another and generally of a darker shade, which is also adopted for the trimmings of the dress, ruches, flounces, bias folds, or rolls. The cuffs are likewise of the same shade as the dress; and lastly, the bonnet itself is made, or, if of straw, is trimmed, with the two shades used for the dress, or else with two shades of a different color that harmonizes with it.

Besides flounces, the trimmings of dresses are composed of bias folds, not separated, but, on the contrary, slightly overlapping each other; or rolls, separated, and numbering five or seven. When only three of these rolls are used they are set on nearer together, and a narrow pleated ruche, made of the material taken double, is set under the first and last. This trimming is often of silk on a wool or silk and wool dress. Our modistes are also making up a great many dresses of mousseline de laine—a charming fabric—to which we are right in returning, and which has been too long abandoned. Lastly, we see this year a new kind of striped black and white percale, of which many elegant and inexpensive dresses will be made this summer.

Light silken fabrics, such as satin-faced silk and dead-lustre iron grenadines, such also as crêpe de Chine, and Osaca crape—closely resembling Chinese fabrics—are still used for the most elegant summer toilettes as over-skirts, to be worn over silk or foulard dresses. White, moreover, is now associated with colors to which it has hitherto been deemed incongruous. Over-skirts of while muslin, worsted grenadine, crêpe de Chine, and Osaca crape are worn over brown, gray, and sometimes even black silk dresses. Too violent a contrast of colors is avoided in all the details of the toilette. For instance, over-skirts of a neutral tint are no longer worn with a bright-colored dress, but rather one of the same, or, at most, a lighter or darker shade. The distaste which the Parisian ladies manifest for all but neutral colors in dress is extending and becoming more strongly marked. Not a single lady is to be seen now in the daytime in a dress of bright blue, deep green, or red of any shade whatsoever, but always in black or gray, in all seasons, and écru, Havana brown, or mode, in summer; or, at most, violet—the Prussian color—and its various shades. Decided colors are only used for the accessories to a toilette, such as cravats and bonnet trimmings.

Bonnets are extremely small. They are little more than a small turned-up head-dress, under which the chignon still protrudes, though this is less ample than formerly, for the most marked feature of the present time is diminution—the reduction of size and exaggeration. In front the bonnet rests flatly on the head, where its edge crushes, and is covered by one or more ruches of illusion, blonde, or lace. A great many bonnets are seen of black straw trimmed with black silk ribbons, black lace ruches, and bright-colored flowers. White straw bonnets are generally trimmed with ribbons and feathers of two shades of the same color—light and dark violet, blue, green, pink, etc. Round hats are still much worn, and for these there is no settled fashion. Some are seen very high, and affecting the shape of a turban, while others, on the contrary, are entirely flat. But in any case the rim is very small, so that these hats, which were invented in the first place to keep off the sun, do not shade the face at all, and are not the least protection.

For rainy weather and traveling costumes there are white woolen fabrics, with broad black lines forming large squares. The whole dress is intersected with bias folds arranged so as to cut the squares into lozenges. These costumes are composed of a skirt and polonaise of the same material, to which is added a medium-sized pelerine or cape, also of the same material, and lined with thin red, blue, or violet flannel, which is thrown across the arm or carried in a strap, to provide against changes of the temperature. The same dresses are also made of brown woolen stuff intersected with black lines forming squares, as in the white; but these two styles are almost the only ones seen.

Very pretty satin-striped alpacas are also in preparation. These will be trimmed with bands made of the satin stripes, and set on diagonally and in ruches. These fabrics resemble the Algerian stuffs, which were of wool, with stripes of the same color, but satin-faced.

Elderly persons at last see themselves exempted from the necessity of strictly conforming to the fashion. They wear dresses without over-skirts, moderately short, moderately pleated and gathered, and trimmed with one or two flounces. Then over these dresses, which are without drapery, without panier, and without any of the trimming hitherto deemed indispensable, they wear simple paletots of black silk or cashmere, or, if suitable to the season, their India shawls, which seem to be coming again in vogue.

For the country, white muslin dresses in the following style will be much worn both by young married and unmarried ladies: Under-skirt trimmed with a flounce set on with a heading, and hemmed on each side, with bright-colored ribbon run through both hems. Over-skirt shorter than the preceding, and trimmed with a similar narrower flounce. Casaque-waist like the over-skirt, but trimmed with a flounce still narrower. There is no belt, but on each side of the over-skirt is set a ribbon, the shorter end of which is over, and the longer end under the skirt. The ends are then tied together so as to raise the skirt a little, and form a large bow on each side. A bow of the same ribbon is set on the front of the waist.

Many dresses are also being made of straw-colored and écru foulard, trimmed with three rows of guipure set one above the other, and overlapping each other half their width. The first row of guipure is black, the second écru, and the third black. All three are gathered, and the blending produces the effect of a ruche. White guipure is sometimes substituted for écru in the combination.

EMMELINE RAYMOND.

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER X.

FOR the second time Hannah fled away from her brother-in-law's presence into her own room, and tried to realize what had happened. Something which would forever prevent their two lives from going on together as before—a distinct mutual acknowledgment that they did not love one another like brother and sister, that he would have married her if he could, and that if he had asked her she would not have refused him.

This confession on her part had been unintentional, wrung from her by the emotion of the time, and by the direct question which had been put to her, and Hannah was the kind of woman who never thought of compromising or playing with the truth. Still, when it was made, and henceforth irrevocable, it startled her. Not that she felt it in the least wrong; the idea that to love or marry her sister's husband was a moral offense had now entirely left her mind; but it was such an absolute ignoring of her own past—her dear, cherished, sacred past—that it at first almost overwhelmed her. She sighed, as if it had been an unrequited instead of a fondly sought attachment which she had confessed.

For it had crept into her heart unawares, and not in the ordinary guise of love at all. Pity, affection, the tender habit of household happiness, had drawn her day by day to Rosie's father, chiefly because he was a father and a widower, scarcely a young man in any sense regarding her, supposing she had considered herself still a young woman, which she did not. It was only when her youth forced itself up like an imprisoned stream, when the great outcry for love arose and would be heard, that Hannah recognized how painfully, piteously young she was still.

And yet in one sense this love was as different from the love of her girlhood as autumn is from spring. It did not seem in the least to interfere with the memory of Arthur. True, she had been only eighteen when she last saw his dear face, scarcely twenty when he died; but Hannah was one of those sort of people with whom to be "off with the old love and on with the new" was a thing not needing argument, it was simply impossible. She had never dropped willingly a single thread of love in her life; the threads which God had broken here were only temporarily invisible; she could follow them still, in spirit, to the unseen land. Yet to her intensely constant nature any change was at first a kind of pain.

"Arthur, Arthur!" she sighed, and kept turning his ring round and round upon her finger. "You are not angry with me? I could not help it. He needed me so!"

Yes, there was the secret, as it is of so many marriages, so many lasting loves: people become necessary to one another before they are aware. Propinquity, circumstances, do a great deal; but more is done by the strong, gradual, inner want, the sympathy which grows day by day, the trust which, feeling its way step to step, may be slow of advancing, but never retrogrades. Whether such a love be as perfect as the real passion, "first-born and heir to all"—the lovely dream of youth and maidenhood, which if man or woman ever realizes and possesses must be the crown of existence—I do not say. But such as it is, it is a pure, noble, and blessed affection, the comfort and refreshment of many lives—that is, if they accept it as it is, and do not try to make it what it never can be, nor seek to find among the August roses the violets of the spring.

"Arthur! Arthur!" Hannah sighed once again, and then said to herself in a solemn, steadfast, resolute tenderness, the name she had never yet uttered, even in thought, for it seemed like an unconscious appropriation of him—"My Bernard!"

And the word was a vow. Not exactly a love-vow, implying and expecting unlimited happiness—she scarcely thought of happiness at all—but a vow that included all duties, all tendernesses, all patience; a pledge such as a woman makes to the man unto whom she is prepared to resign herself and her own individuality for life.

It was a change so sudden, total, and overwhelming that beyond it she could at first see nothing, did not recognize the future as a real thing at all. She went to sleep like a person half bewildered, and woke up in the morning confused still, until Rosie came in as usual, while Tannie was dressing, requiring all sorts of "pitty sings to play wid" in her usual sweet exactingness. Then slowly, slowly, Hannah realized all.

"My darling, my darling! my own forever!" cried she, snatching up Rosie in a passion of tenderness. And not even Bernard's fond look of last night, as he put to her and she answered that solemn question, thrilled to Hannah's heart more than the embrace of the child.

Carrying the little one in her arms, she went down stairs and met him in the hall. A meeting just the same as on all mornings, except that there was a glow, a radiance almost, in his countenance which she had never seen before, and his voice whenever he addressed her had a reverential affectionateness which gave meaning to his lightest words. Also he called her "Hannah," never "Aunt Hannah" again.

There is a pathos in all love; what must there be, then, in a love such as this, conceived in spite of fate, carried on through all hinderances, at last betrayed rather than confessed, and when confessed having to meet the dark future, in which its sole reward must be the mere act of loving? These two, forbidden by destiny to woo and marry like ordinary people, were nevertheless not a melancholy pair of lovers. No outward eye would have recognized them as lovers at all. By no word or act did Bernard claim his rights, the happy rights of a man to whom a woman has confessed her affection. He neither kissed her nor said one fond word to her. No servant coming in and out, nor even the innocent little tell-tale, who was just at that age when she was sure to communicate every thing to every body, could have suspected any thing or betrayed any thing concerning these two, who knew they were henceforward not two, but one till death.

They were neither afraid nor ashamed. At the first sight of Bernard every lurking feeling of shame went out of Hannah's heart. Every thought, too, as if her loving the living were a wrong to the dead. Arthur's ring was still on her finger, Rosa's sweet face still smiled from over the mantel-piece upon the two whom in life she had loved best in the world, and Rosa's child clung fondly unto Tannie's faithful breast. Hannah shrank from none of these things, nor did Bernard. More than once that morning he had named, incidentally but unhesitatingly, his child's mother, calling her, as he always did from this day forward, "our" Rosa; and though he was so quiet, he went about cheerfully, as he had not done for long, like a man who has recovered his own self-respect and his interest in life; to whom the past brings no pain, and the future no dread.

Passion is a weak thing; but love, pure love, is the strongest thing on earth; and these lovers felt it to be so. Though neither said a word beyond the merest domestic commonplace, there was a peace, a restfulness about them both which each saw in the other, and rejoiced to see. It was like calm after storm—ease after pain. No matter how soon the storm arose, the pain began again—the lull had been real while it lasted.

They began arranging their day's work, as usual; work never very light. This Monday there seemed more to settle than ever.

"What should I do without you?" said Bernard. "Such a wise, sensible, practical woman as you are! always busy, and yet forgetting nothing. Stay—have you forgotten we were to dine at the Grange to-night?"

The invitation had come a week ago, and Adeline had repeated it last evening. Still Hannah hesitated.

"Must we go? Nay, ought we?"

"Why not? Because of—of what we said last night? That is a stronger reason than ever why we should go. We should not shrink from society. I am not ashamed of myself. Are you?"

"No." She dropped her head, faintly blushing; but when she saw that Bernard held his erect she took courage.

"What Lady Rivers says does not apply to Melville Grange. My sister is mistress in her own house, and Melville, though he is fond enough of his sisters-in-law, is not really so likely to be influenced by his mother-in-law as by his own mother. She is a very good and wise woman, Mrs. Melville. I wanted to have a little talk with her to-night."

Hannah looked uneasy. "Oh, be careful! I would much rather not a word were said to any one."

"About ourselves? No; I have not the slightest intention of telling any body. It is our own affair entirely till we see our way clear to—to the rightful end; for, Hannah, I need not say that must come about, if it be possible. I can not live without you."

He spoke in a low tone, grasping her hand. He was not nearly so calm as she; yet even Hannah felt her heart beating, her color coming and going. Is it only for young lovers, passionate, selfish, uncontrolled, that society must legislate? or criminal lovers, who exact an excited pity, and are interesting just because they are criminal? Is there no justice, no tenderness, for those who suffer and are silent, doing no wrong?

"We will never do any thing wrong," said he. "We will neither fly in the face of the law, nor offend my own people, if possible; but we will be married if we can. I must take legal advice on the subject. Till then let all go on as usual. Is it not better so?"

"Yes."

They stood at the hall door, Rosie sitting queen-like on Tannie's arm, to watch paps away. He kissed his little girl, and then just touched with his lips the hand that held her. No more. No love-embrace, no thought of such a thing; but there was a gleam in his eyes, like the January sun through the winter trees, showing that summer days might yet come.

It warmed Hannah's heart with a quiet, serious joy as she went through her household duties, especially those which concerned the child. She had her darling with her almost all day, and never had Rosie's innocent companionship been so satisfying and so sweet.

"So for the father's sake the child was dear,
And dearer was the father for the child."

Among the magnificent literature in which Tannie and Rosie indulged happened to be an illustrated fairy-tale book, wherein the usual cruel step-mother figured in great force. And she herself should be a step-mother, perhaps, one day! In the glee of her heart Hannah laughed—actually laughed—to think how different fiction often was from reality.

Bernard came home only just in time to dress, and they did not meet till he put her into the carriage. Half their drive passed almost in silence, but by-and-by Bernard spoke in a business-like way, saying he meant to go up to London, and take counsel's opinion there. It would not do to consult any one here. On what subject he did not say, but it was easy to guess.

"Mrs. Melville might give me information—only, of course, I could not ask her direct. I can only find it out in a quiet way, as I have already found out a good deal. It seems till 1835 these marriages were legal—at any rate not illegal, unless an ecclesiastical suit should find them so, which it never did. It was in 1835 that was passed the ridiculous bill confirming all marriages prior to 31st August, and making those unlawful which happened on or after the 1st September."

"Then they are unlawful now?" said Hannah, feeling silence worse than speech.

"Nobody seems quite to understand whether they are or not. On the Continent, nay, in every country except ours, they are certainly legal. Our colonies have several times passed a bill legalizing such marriages, and the mother country has thrown it out. Many persons go abroad to be married, come back again, and live unblamed; but they risk a good deal, and"—he hesitated—"it is not for themselves alone."

Hannah drew back into her dark corner, glad of the darkness. It was a strange and sore position for any woman to be placed in. Betrothed, yet having none of the honors and happinesses of an affianced bride; sitting beside her lover, yet treated by him in no lover-like fashion, and feeling nothing of the shy frankness which makes the new tie so sweet; obliged to talk with him about their marriage and its possibilities with a mournful candor that would have been most painful to bear, save for her own strong, innocent heart and Bernard's exceeding delicacy—she found her lot as humiliating as it was hard.

Yet she had never loved him so dearly, never recognized how well he deserved her love, as when, after their long, dark drive, he said, tenderly, "Now, Hannah, we will forget for the time all these bitternesses—except the love, except the love," handed her out into the bright hall at the Grange, and entered the drawing-room with her on his arm, as at Easterham dinner-parties had been their custom always.

This was a state dinner. All the Moat House people were there, and Mr. Morecamb too. Hannah did not know whether it was pure accident or refinement of ill-nature, but Mr. Morecamb was assigned to her at dinner, and she had no resource but to obey. The poor man evidently knew his fate, and was bearing it like a man. It was either one of the contre-temps in which the unlucky victims can only submit and make the best of things, or done on purpose; but in either case there was no remedy.

Bernard had been placed far down the table; but, whether or not, Hannah knew he could be no shield to her; rather the contrary. She must keep up her own dignity—trust for protection solely to herself. And a nervous consciousness made her look sedulously away from him all dinner-time; nay, as she passed him in the procession of ladies afterward, she kept her eyes fixed so steadily on the ground that Bertha asked, satirically, "if she and Bernard had been quarreling?"

During dinner she had been comparatively safe, even with Mr. Morecamb beside her; afterward there gathered over her the vague coldness which women always know how to show toward another woman who is somehow "under a cloud." The Rivers family indicated it most of all. Scarcely any one of them addressed her except Adeline.

"Don't mind it," whispered the latter, following Hannah into a corner. "We'll stand by you, and people will see you here. Of course it is awkward, very awkward. Easterham is talking about you so much, and my family, of all things, dislike being talked about. But I have thrown dust in every body's eyes by giving you at dinner to Mr. Morecamb. Couldn't you like him? Such a nice old fellow, and so fond of you?"

Hannah shook her head, smiling drearily. It was idle to take offense at silly little Adeline, who never meant any harm.

She sat down, turning over the leaves of a photograph book, and bade her young hostess go back to her other guests.

"No, no; I mean to stay with you. I don't feel as my family do. I can't see why they should make such a fuss even if Bernard did want to marry you. People used to do it—my respected mother-in-law, for instance. And sisters-in-law are not real sisters; never ought to be. If the law made this quite clear, a man wouldn't dare go philandering with them in his wife's lifetime. Now—oh dear!—it's so convenient. He can't marry them, so he may flirt with them as much as ever he likes. It's all right, and the wife can't say a word. But she may feel, for all that."

Adeline spoke bitterly; having evidently quite slidden away from the case in point, not thinking of Hannah at all; so there was no need to answer her except in a general way.

"Yes, I dare say it is at times a little vexing. But I am afraid I do not understand jealousy. I can not comprehend how, after people are once married, they feel the smallest interest in any body else. And the conjugal fidelity which has only the law to secure it must be a very shallow thing."

"You ridiculously simple woman! Well, perhaps you are right. Jealousy is silly. We can't stop every young lady out of our house because our husband may one day have the chance of marrying her. Let him! When we are dead and gone we shall not care. Only don't let her come and steal him from us while we are alive. It's all a sham, this nonsense about sisters," added she, stamping with her white satin shoes, and tearing to pieces her hot-house roses. "And, like you, I am beginning to hate shams. Hannah Thelluson, let us be friends."

"We always were friends, I hope," said Hannah, gently, pitying the young wife, whose skeleton in the house had been so unconsciously betrayed. She was more than sorry, rather angry, when, as the evening wore on, and the gentlemen came in, Herbert Melville, scarcely noticing his sickly, unlovely Adeline, devoted himself entirely to her blooming sisters, especially to Bertha; who, a born coquette, seemed to enjoy the triumph amazingly. The law which barred some people from happiness did not seem to furnish any security for the happiness of others. Hannah almost forgot herself in her pity for Adeline.

And yet she could have pitied herself too—a little. It was hard to sit there, tabooed, as it were, by that silent ignoring which women understand so well, and hear the others talking pleasantly round her. No one was actually uncivil; the Melvilles were almost obtrusively kind; but there the coldness was, and Hannah felt it. Such a new thing, too; for, in her quiet way, she had been rather popular than not in society; she had such gentle tact in fishing out all the shy, or grim, or stupid people, and warming them up into cheerfulness. But now even they quietly slipped away and left her alone.

It was a heavy night. She asked herself more than once how many more of the like she should have to bear, and if she could bear them. Did Bernard see it or feel it? She could not tell. He came in late. She saw him talking to Mrs. Melville, and afterward to Lady Rivers; then trying his utmost to be pleasant to every body. She was so proud always of the sweet nature he had, and the simple unconscious charm of his manner in society. But in the pauses of conversation he looked inexpressibly sad; and when they got into the carriage, and were alone together, she heard him sigh so heavily that if his people had been all night long pricking her to death with pins and needles Hannah would not have complained. The very fact of complaint seemed a certain humiliation.

They scarcely exchanged a word all the drive home; but he took and held fast her hand. There was something in the warm clasp that comforted her for every thing.

"Dear," he whispered, as he lit her candle and bade her good-night, which he did as soon as possible, "it is a hard lot for both of us. Can you bear it?"

"I think I can."

And so for some days she thought she could. She had that best balm for sorrow—a busy life; each hour was as full of work as it would hold; no time for dreaming or regrets, scarcely even for love, except in the form wherein fate had brought love to her—calm, domestic, habitual—scarcely distinguishable from friendship even yet. She and Bernard did all their customary business together day by day. They had become so completely one in their work that it would have been difficult to do otherwise. Nor did she wish it. She was happy only to be near him, to help him, to watch him fulfilling all his duties, whatever bitterness lay underneath them. That pure joy which a woman feels in a man's worthiness of love, keener than even her sense of the love he gives her, was Hannah's to the core. And then she had her other permanent bliss—the child.

Women—good women, too—have sometimes married a man purely for the sake of his children; and Hannah never clasped Rosie in her arms without understanding something of that feeling. Especially on the first Sunday after the change had come—the great change, of which not an atom showed in their outward lives, but of which she and Bernard were growing more and more conscious every day. This bright morning, when the sun was shining, and the crocuses all aflame across the garden, and a breath of spring stirring through the half-budded lilac-tree, it might, perhaps, have been hard for them to keep up that gentle reticence of manner to one another, except for the child.

Rosie was a darling child. Even strangers said so. The trouble she gave was infinitesimal, the joy unlimited. Father and aunt were accustomed to delight together over the little opening soul, especially on a Sunday morning. They did so still. They talked scarcely at all, neither of the future nor the past; but simply accepted the present, as childhood accepts it, never looking beyond. Until, in the midst of their frolic—while papa was carrying his little girl on his back round and round the table, and Tannie was jumping out after them at intervals in the character of an imaginary wolf, Rosie screaming with ecstasy, and the elders laughing almost as heartily as the child—there came a note from the Moat House.

Mr. Rivers read it, crushed it furiously in his hand, and threw it on the back of the fire. Then, before it burned, he snatched it out again.

"My poor Hannah! But you ought to read it. It will hurt you—still you ought to read it. There must never be any concealments between us two."

"No."

Hannah took the letter, but did not grow furious—rather calmer than before. She knew it was only the beginning of the end.

"MY DEAR BERNARD,—Your father wishes particularly to talk with you to-day, as poor Austin, we hear, is rather worse than usual. You will, of course, come in to lunch, and remain to dinner."

"I perceive that, in spite of my earnest advice, Miss Thelluson is still an inmate of your household. Will you suggest to her that I am sorry our pew will be full, and our dinner-table also, to-day?"

"I wish you were more amenable to the reasonings of your family, but remain, nevertheless,

"Your affectionate mother,

"A. RIVERS."

"Well?" Bernard said, watching her.

Hannah drooped her head over Rosie's hair; the child had crept to her knees, and was looking with wide blue eyes up at Tannie.

"It is but what I expected—what she before declared her intention of doing."

"But do you recognize all it implies—all it will result in?"

"Whatever it be, I am prepared."

"You do not know the worst," Bernard said, after a pause. "I found it out yesterday by getting counsel's opinion on the strict law of the case; but I had not courage to tell you."

"Why not? I thought we were to have no secrets."

"Oh, we men are such cowards; I am, anyhow. But will you hear it now? It will be such a relief to talk to you."

"Talk, then," said Hannah, with a pale smile. "Stop; shall we have time? It will be twenty minutes yet before the church-bells begin ringing."

For she knew that the wheels of life must go on, though both their hearts were crushed on the way.

"Five minutes will be enough for all I have to tell you. Only—take the child away."

Hannah carried away little Rosie, who clung frantically to her fond paradise in Tannie's arms, and was heard wailing dolorously overhead for a good while.

"See! even that baby can not bear to part with you. How, then, shall I?" cried Bernard, passionately; and then, bidding her sit down, began giving her in words exact and brief the result of his inquiries.

These confirmed all he had said himself once before in the case of Grace and James Dixon. Of the law, as it now stood, there could be no possible doubt. No marriage with a deceased wife's sister, whether celebrated here or abroad, would be held valid in England. No woman so married had any legal rights, no children could inherit. Thus, even in cases where the marriage was known to have existed, and the wife had borne the husband's name for years, whole estates have been known to lapse to the Crown; but then the Crown, with a curious recognition of the difference between law and equity, had been usually advised to return them piecemeal, under the guise of a free gift, to the children, who otherwise would have been the undisputed heirs.

"Heirship—money! it seems all to hinge upon that," said Hannah, a little bitterly.

"Yes; because property is the test upon which the whole legal question turns. If I had been without ties—say a poor clerk upon a hundred and fifty a year (I wish I had)—we might have set sail by the next steamer to America, and lived there happy to the end of our days; for England is the only country which does not recognize such marriages as ours. Some countries—France and Germany, for instance—require a special permission to marry; but this gained, society accepts the union at once. Now with us—oh, Hannah, how am I to put it to you?—this would do no good. As I said before, the misery would not end with ourselves."

"Would it affect Rosie?"

"Your heart is full of Rosie. No; but she is only a girl, and the Moat House is entailed in the male line. Austin is slowly dying. I am the last of my race. Do you understand?"

She did at last. Her face and neck turned scarlet, but she did not shrink. It was one of the terrible necessities of her position that she must not shrink from any thing. She saw clearly, that never, according to the law of England, could she be Bernard's wife. And if not, what would she be? If she had children, what would they be? And his estates lay in England, and he was the last of his line.

"I perceive," she faltered. "No need to explain further. You must not think of me any more. To marry me would ruin you."

Wild and miserable as his eyes were—fierce with misery—the tears rushed into them.

"My poor Hannah, my own unselfish Hannah, you never think for a moment that it would also ruin you."

It was true, she had not thought of herself; only of him. A clergyman, prepared to break the canon law; a man of family and position, running counter to all social prejudices; a son, dutiful and fondly attached, opposing his father's dearest wishes! The mental struggle that he must have gone through before there ever dawned upon him the possibility of marrying her struck Hannah with a conviction of the depth of his love, the strength of his endurance, such as she had never believed in before.

"Oh, Bernard!" she cried, calling him by his name for the first time, and feeling—was it also for the first time?—how entirely she loved him—"Bernard, you must never think of marrying me: we must part."

"Part!" and he made as if he would have embraced her, but restrained himself. "We will discuss that question by-and-by. At present, hear the rest which I have to tell."

He then explained, with a calmness which in so impulsive a man showed how strong was the self-control he was learning to exercise, that since 1835 many dissentients from the law then passed had tried to set it aside; that almost every session, a bill to this effect was brought into the House of Commons, fiercely discussed there, passed by large majorities, and then carried to the Upper House, where the Peers invariably threw it out. Still in the minority were a few very earnest in the cause.

"I know; Lord Dunsmore is one of them."

"Yes; I had forgotten; I seem to be forgetting every thing!" and Bernard put his hand wearily to his head. "I met Lady Dunsmore in London, and she asked me no end of questions about you. She is very fond of you, I think."

"Is she?"

"She wanted to know if you would come and stay with her, and bring Rosie; but I said I could not spare either of you. And then she looked at me inquisitively. She is a very shrewd, clever, good woman, and a strong ally on our side. For it must be our side, Hannah, whatever my people say, whatever I might have said myself once. Any law that creates a crime is mischievous and cruel. There ought to be, as I once overheard Lord Dunsmore say, no bar whatsoever to marriage except consanguinity. Even if I had no personal concern in the matter, it is a wrong, and I would fight against it as such."

"The Riverses were ever fighters, you know," said Hannah, watching him with a sad, tender smile, and more than ever there darkened down upon her all that he was giving up for her sake.

"But to come to the point, Hannah. I have told you all the ill; now hear the good. Every year public feeling is advancing; this year the bill is to be brought in again. Its adherents are ready for a good hard fight, as usual; but this time they hope to win. And if they win—then—then—"

He seized her hands, and clasped them passionately. It was not the dreamy love-making of a boy in his teens—of her lost Arthur, for instance, over whose utmost happiness hung the shadow of early death; it was the strong passion of a man in the midst of life, with all his future before him—a future that needed a wife's help to make it complete; and Hannah knew it. For a moment, sad, pale, white-lily-like as she was, there came a flush rose-red into her cheeks, and to her heart an eager response to the new duties, the new joys; then she shrank back within herself. It all seemed so hopeless, or with such a slender thread of hope to cling to: yet he clung to it.

"I will never give in," he said, "if I have to wait for years. I will marry you if I possibly can. I will never marry any other woman. You shall not be troubled or harmed—not more than I must necessarily harm you, my poor love, simply because you are my love. But mine you must and shall be. You hear me, Hannah?"

For she stood passive and bewildered. Any one might have thought she did not care until she lifted up her eyes to him. Then he had no doubt at all.

"Oh, give me one kiss, Hannah, to last me all these months and years. It will not hurt you—it is not wrong."

"No;" and she gave it. Then with a great sigh they both sat down.

The church-bells began to ring. "I must go," Bernard said. "But first, what are we to do? Will you go to church to-day?"

"I must. If I sit in the free seats or in the aisle, I must go to church. It is God's house; He will not drive me from it; He knows I have done nothing wrong." And she wept a little, but not much.

"You are right; we have not done any thing wrong, and we ought not to act as if we had. Then—will you come with me?"

"No; I had rather go alone," said Hannah, gently. "I will bear every thing alone, so far as I can."

"What do you mean? What do you wish?"

"That you should in all things do your duty without considering me. Go to the Moat House, as they desire. If they do not mention me, do not you. What does it matter? they can not harm me—not much. And to break with them would be terrible for you. Keep friends with your own people to the last."

"You truly wish that?"

"I do. Now go. Good-by, and God bless you, Bernard."

"God bless you, my Hannah!"

And with that mutual blessing they parted.

USEFUL RECIPES.

CREAM CAKE.—One and a half cups of sugar, one-half a cup of butter, three eggs, leaving out the yolk of one, two cups of flour, half a cup of milk, two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar, and one of soda; for the cream, one cup of cream and the yolk of one egg; flavor and sweeten to taste. Bake the cake as you do for jelly cake, putting the cream between, or cut it in two, insert the cream, and lay the piece back.

CREAM SPONGE-CAKE (very superior).—Six eggs, two cups of flour, the same quantity of sugar, two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar well mixed in the flour, and one-half a tea-spoonful of soda dissolved in a very little hot water; beat together the yolks of the eggs and the sugar until perfectly light and creamy; add to it the well-beaten whites, then the flour, and last of all the soda. Bake, in round tins, about an inch thick.

CREAM FOR CAKE.—Heat one pint of milk, and add to it one table-spoonful of corn starch dissolved in a little milk, two eggs, one cup of sugar, all beaten together; boil it until it thickens. Split the cakes when cold, and fill with cream.

PICKLED EGGS are very easily prepared, and most excellent as an accompaniment for cold meats. Boil for half an hour three dozen eggs, remove the shells, and pack them when entirely cold in a wide-mouthed jar large enough to let them in or out without mashing or breaking. Take as much vinegar as you think will cover them entirely, and boil in it white pepper, allspice, a little root ginger, and, if desired, a very small quantity of garlic. Salt to taste. A few tiny white onions put in the jar some may think an improvement. When the vinegar has boiled enough to extract the spices, take them out and pour it over the eggs, cork tightly when cold, and in a month they are ready to use.

THE COURTIN'. By PROFESSOR J. RUSSELL LOWELL. ILLUSTRATED BY HOPPIN.

"ZEKLE CREP' UP, QUITE UNBEKNOWN,
AN' PEEKED IN THRU THE WINDER."

"SHE HEERED A FOOT, AN' KNOWED IT TU, A-RASPIN' ON THE SCRAPER."

God makes sech nights, all white an' still
  Fur'z you can look or listen.
Moonshine an' snow on field an' hill,
  All silence an' all glisten.

Zekle crep' up, quite unbeknown,
  An' peeked in thru the winder;
An' there sot Huldy all alone,
  'Ith no one nigh to hender.

A fire-place filled the room's one side,
  With half a cord o' wood in—
There warn't no stoves (tell comfort died)
  To bake ye to a puddin'.

The wa'nut logs shot sparkles out
  Towards the pootiest, bless her!
An' leetle flames danced all about
  The chiny on the dresser.

Agin the chimbley crook-necks hung,
  An' in amongst 'em rusted
The ole queen's arm thet gran'ther Young
  Fetched back from Concord busted.

The very room, coz she was in,
  Seemed warm from floor to ceilin',
An' she looked full ez rosy agin
  Ez the apples she was peelin'.

'Twas kin' o' kingdom-come to look
  On sech a blesséd cretur;
A dogrose blushin' to a brook
  Ain't modester nor sweeter.

He was six foot o' man, A 1,
  Clean grit an' human natur;
None couldn't quicker pitch a ton,
  Nor dror a furrer straighter.

He'd sparked it with full twenty gals,
  Hed squired 'em, danced 'em, druv 'em;
Fust this one, an' then thet, by spells—
  All is, he couldn't love 'em.

But long o' her his veins 'ould run
  All crinkly, like curled maple;
The side she breshed felt full o' sun
  Ez a south slope in Ap'il.

She thought no v'ice hed sech a swing
  Ez his'n in the choir;
My! when he made "Ole Hundred" ring
  She knowed the Lord was nigher.

An' she'd blush scarlit, right in prayer,
  When her new meetin'-bunnet
Felt somehow thru its crown a pair
  O' blue eyes sot upon it.

  Snow-hid in Jenooary.

The blood clost roun' her heart felt glued
  Too tight for all expressin',
Tell mother see how metters stood,
  And gin 'em both her blessin'.

Then her red come back like the tide
  Down to the Bay o' Fundy;
An' all I know is, they was cried
  In meetin' come nex' Sunday.

"AN' ALL I KNOW IS, THEY WAS CRIED IN MEETIN' COME NEX' SUNDAY."

SEA SONG.

CALL not the old life back, O sea!
In the grave where it lies, there let it be;
Wake not the pale ghost up for me:
Call not the dead love back.

Bid not the tranquil pulses throng
To tumult and passion, fret and wrong;
Hush the sad memories in thy song:
Call not the dead love back.

Was not its brief life full of pain,
Of weary waiting, and struggle vain?
Bid it not waken to weep again·
Call not the dead love back.

Lurid and bright was its morning ray,
Fierce was the glare of its noontide sway,
Cold o'er its death closed the gloaming gray:
Call not the dead love back.

There let it lie in its fatal charm,
With its closen eye and its folded palm—
There let it lie in its solemn calm:
Call not the dead love back.

Sing of the upward, glorious power,
Sing of the present's harvest hour,
Sing of the future's golden dower:
Call not the dead love back.

Sing on, sing on, in thy mighty chime,
Of the world to come and its joys sublime;
But oh, in the terrible name of Time,
Call not the dead love back!

THE BROCADE.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

CERTAINLY it was a charming dress. As it lay there in its box one could see that; a confusion of gold color, and crimson roses, and black lace. Lovely as it was, however, very little had been expended on it, unless you estimated all the hopes that had been wrought into it—then you would have felt that it was as costly a thing as it was charming. It was, indeed, as Thyrza said, the little shroud of a dead-and-gone summer.

Poor Mrs. Devine, a Treasury clerk in Washington, had, with her daughter Thyrza, been visiting a friend during the yearly vacation, which they took in June. You should know what the life of a Treasury clerk is before you can appreciate what this vacation was. You should understand the need of being at the office at a fixed hour, rain or shine, in the penetrating winds and damps of winter, or in the summer heats that scorch a shower to steam before it touches the pavement—the pavement against which sometimes you hold the parasol to ward off a blistering blast, more unbearable than the rays out of the brassy sky above; you should understand the dependence which makes you tremble at a word, the tediousness of counterfeit-detection, where an error costs you the amount of the note, or of the enumeration of paper whose arsenic poisons your hands and half paralyzes your arms, or of the endless copying, for which men in the same room, doing similar work not half so neatly or swiftly as yourself, receive double the reward; you should understand the crisis at every official change, the apprehension and dread, every fourth year, lest with a new king in Israel you are no longer known; you should understand the absolute fatigue with which you re-enter your rooms with cramped shoulders, weary fingers, aching backs, tired out in body and soul. You would have to enter into all this experience in order to appreciate the satisfaction Mrs. Devine and Thyrza took, the year through, all in dreaming of their coming June, always pleasant, and in this single instance more than ever so, since spent at a friend's whose way had diverged from theirs years ago; for Mrs. Devine's unfortunate husband had died and left her with nothing but his child and his memory, while Mrs. Van Alstyne had never known the touch of trouble, but, wealthy, courted, and surrounded by troops of friends, had passed her life in a palace, and had breathed the breath of luxury.

Of course an invitation to visit Mrs. Van Alstyne was something too unusual not to cause a flutter in the fold of the Devines—the fold being the two rooms of a lodging-house, which had been their home during their Treasury life; and the furbishing of the slender wardrobes for the occasion was almost pathetic to see. They were nearly of a size, the mother and daughter—Thyrza being just eighteen—and thus an allowable interchange made a very little go a great way. But, at the most, there was hardly enough for one, for the mere living in the expensive place had not left them more than twenty dollars a month to spend upon clothes, doctors, recreations, and small charities.

Still, with a couple of cambric gowns apiece for mornings, with Mrs. Devine's black grenadine for dinner, and her old satin for evening wear, and with Thyrza's trained organdy, and the month's pay that would not have to go for board advanced to buy her a check silk and some ribbons and laces—enough remaining for the traveling tickets—they might get through the month respectably. To be sure, the organdy wouldn't wash; yet Mrs. Devine hoped for the best, for she was a young woman herself, with a woman's liking for fine tissues, and with a lovely, proud face to be set off by them. Nevertheless, it was not for herself she was concerned; it was for her daughter. She had forgotten herself long ago in Thyrza; and to see her radiant and well was all she wished for under the sun. And Thyrza was a pretty thing. Fair as a lily, with a forehead so dazzling in its whiteness as to seem the type of an infinite purity of nature, with large, bright, hazel eyes, a mouth that laughed in dimples—dimples that always brought a blush to cover them—she seemed something, in that evanescent brilliance of her youth, deserving of an easier lot than that hard money-counting in the Treasury, that wore upon her nerves till she was half beside herself. Once or twice at Mrs. Van Alstyne's she woke from the slumber into which she fell over her sewing or her book, and began to count, "One, two, three," and, at her mother's eager motion, whispered, "You mustn't interrupt me just this minute—I shall have to begin again—one, two, three, four," until, with a sigh of relief and the motion of putting down a package, she exclaimed, "Fifty! Now I will answer your question," and came to herself with a start that shook her like a spasm, and with a mortified rush of color that was painful. But that was only at first, in the reaction of long fatigue; afterward she was well as nature had intended; and in the toilette made by her pale green silk with its white lustre, ruffled like a rose, and relieved by a very little old thread lace, she made a pleasant addition to the appurtenances of Mrs. Van Alstyne's parlors. The lace, indeed, was darned within an inch of its life, but Mrs. Devine did that sort of thing so that you took the mending for design, and admired it.

Before long Mrs. Van Alstyne was seized with one of her sudden likings—this time for Thyrza—likings to which people with nothing to do are subject, and which they pursue till they throw the exhausted victim aside for the next, without a thought of harm done. Mrs. Van Alstyne had never taken that liking to her husband's ward and niece, Miss Reagan, who was a constant element of her life; and apparently she stood in some awe of the cold and stately girl, whose temper was keen, and who was mistress of a million—a girl, after all, who had not much experience of life, and who, though she gave alms among beggars and day-laborers, had no idea of such a state as Thyrza's, or that she could meet socially a person without an income; setting down the defects of Thyrza's toilettes not to poverty, but ignorance, and growing so tired, at last, of Thyrza's everlasting green check as to close her eyes to it, and become almost unaware of the girl's existence.

But that made no difference to our joyous Thyrza, who was like a honey-bee escaped from some labyrinthine coil, and giddy with the fresh, free air, and who was hurt by no disregard of Miss Reagan's, but looked at her as of different race from herself—one of the beautiful demons of this enchanted life, whose powerful genius was Mrs. Van Alstyne; and she had put far back in a remote past all remembrance of her days of care and toil, and was just basking in the delights of these.

"You happy little thing!" said Basil Van Alstyne to her one morning, as she stood tying up the honeysuckles that the night's wind and shower had scattered about the piazza—"You happy little thing! Can't you teach me the secret of your light-heartedness?"

"'Teach me half the gladness
That thy brain doth know;
Such melodious madness
From my lips should flow,'" sang Thyrza, like a lark herself, taking up the song with which the lofty Miss Reagan in the distant drawing-room was petrifying the morning visitors.

Basil made an impatient gesture. "One is plenty," said he, with a shrug that indicated the other singer. "Don't echo her; don't freeze the little fountain that is always bubbling over, but answer my question, please."

"There isn't any answer," said Thyrza.

"Tell me, then, are you always as light-hearted?" asked the young man.

"Except when I am counting money."

"Counting money?" he repeated, with a look of comical amazement. "Was ever woman made wretched by that task?"

"You know it isn't my money," said Thyrza, naïvely.

"Oh, indeed! that alters the case."

"Dreadfully," laughed she. "And yet, do you know," looking up and pausing, "after all, not so much. I get to hate the very sight of money."

"To think the United States Treasury should bring about such an era of the Golden Age!"

"Oh, not but what I like the things that money buys!" cried she. "I do. I like large room after room, their floors covered with velvet, like those in there, and statues and paintings, and great Sèvres vases, and ormolu cabinets, and inlaid work, and seats soft as clouds, you know, and Erard pianos, and ivory harps, and long, soft dresses to enjoy it all in, and jewels like—"

"And the United States Treasury does not allow its slaves these little enjoyments?"

"Oh no, no," sighed Thyrza. "It gives us two rooms in an old house where the timbers shrank ages ago so as to let in the winter drafts, and where in summer we suffocate if we close the shutters to keep out—such a sun! and burn alive if we open them. There is a photograph on the wall, and there are gray shades at the windows, and there is hair-cloth furniture, and across the street there is a brick wall that strikes back the heat like a furnace. And we sit there after we come home, and gasp, and long for the evening and some coolness, some dew, some stars—for the hour when the music begins in the square, where the great white magnolias, high up in the dark, make it too delicious for any thing, and we can go and get the only happiness there is in life. Oh, how I have longed for it! How I shall again!"

"Heaven forbid!" said Basil. "Heaven forbid, little girl, that you should ever long for any thing like that! Why, your face has grown white remembering it."

"Don't talk of it," said Thyrza then, with a mimic shudder. "I don't want to remember any more. I am in heaven just now, and I mean to stay there;" and she twisted a stem of the honeysuckles round her hair, smiling in her artless and, sooth to say, enrapturing way, and leaning against the pillar, as if she had taken up a position for the summer.

"Are you really so contented, Thyrza?" said Basil.

"Just as a little butterfly is, you know," said she, "that the next storm will beat down into the earth."

"No!" cried Basil. "You never shall have such a fate—" But just here Miss Reagan came sailing up the drawing-rooms with her guests, and stepping upon the piazza, called Basil to her support, and the sentence remained unfinished.

What a month it was—what a June! Never had the pomp of summer swept over Thyrza's senses in such wise before. She could hardly believe it was the same world as that in which she had been living her dreary life. And now, with the close of the delightful days, to go back to the stifling heats of the city and the office-work! it sickened her to say it—to speak of leaving this cool and leafy shelter, into which evil never seemed to come. But she swallowed her tears, and tried to be grateful for what she had had. Perhaps there was something else which it made the poor child sick to speak of leaving.

But she had no need to disquiet herself. Mrs. Van Alstyne had not half exhausted her powers of being pleased with Thyrza. In fact, she was thinking there was no limit to those powers—any thing so fresh, so sweet, so simple, as this little maid she declared she never had seen. She liked to have her about her; it made her feel young again. She liked to hear her bird-like voice; she liked to see her in her morning-room, with her rapt face, as she recited to her some romance of her youth, all alive with her April smiles and tears. As for letting her go back with her mother, it was nonsense. She would like to keep her forever; and if she could not keep her forever, at any rate the rest of the summer might be hers; and Mrs. Devine could easily get her leave without pay, on account of her health, which would certainly be ruined if she returned to Washington in all the stagnant July heats—all which was urged too freely for Mrs. Devine to gainsay, though she knew her own life would be unbearable without her child. But on that thought Mrs. Devine dwelt only long enough to be conscious of thinking it; and, in spite of Thyrza's dissent, she was at her desk on the first morning of the month, and her daughter staid at the Van Alstynes'.

Thyrza was to write to her mother twice a week, detailing her life of every day. Cheerful little letters they were, and meat and drink to their reader. If by-and-by they showed the least constraint or reserve in the world, it did not trouble Mrs. Devine; she had imagined there might be a secret for Thyrza to keep before the summer ended, and she could confide it to her mother—her other self—by word of mouth; and the poor lady had spent half her time building castles in the air whose foundations seemed to her to be laid deep as the foundations of the hills. She had left with Thyrza all her small stock of finery that was suitable, her morning cambrics—since she could wear prints at the office, and she knew if one was dabbled in the garden before breakfast, how nice it was to have another; and her black grenadine skirt, which, with a muslin waist and bretelles, would make a pretty change. The last was spoiled for Thyrza, though, before she wore it, by Miss Reagan's pronouncing a similar dress a pretentious make-shift.

"What do people go into society for if they can't meet its demands?" said Miss Reagan. "The poverty strikes through such a dress, the person who wears it is uncomfortable, and every body else is. I had rather give her a new one than see that again. It really makes me feel as if all the barriers were down, and any body could go any where—"

"As if the beggars were coming to town," said Basil; "some in rags, and some in tags, and some in velvet gowns. Why are your cheeks burning so, little Printemps?" he asked of Thyrza. "Are you guilty of such a gown? I thought it was a very pretty one."

"That is all men know," said Miss Reagan.

"Yes, indeed," answered Thyrza; "and I shall have to wear it, because the wine is spilled on my green one." It was Miss Reagan who had spilled the wine, by-the-way.

"Oh, I beg pardon," said Miss Reagan. "We know how it is. And where people are so welcome they can wear any thing. Still, I must say, magnificent dress does give a splendor to society, and if I couldn't have the one, I should stay away from the other." And Miss Reagan felt of the diamonds at her throat, and caught up her gauzes, and moved away. "My aunt and Basil do make such a fool of that girl," said she to her maid that night, "that I felt it a duty to bring her to her senses!"

Meanwhile every letter of Thyrza's rehearsed the hours of pleasure-taking at the Van Alstynes'—the drives through regions of gardens and lawns; the dinner-parties; the balls, to which they rolled along through the night shadows of the woods; the great ball which Mrs. Van Alstyne was presently to give herself; the rowing down the little river, where the intertwining branches cast perpetual twilight on the water: hours when Thyrza used to think all the dull years to come could be gilded by their recollection.

But what new thing was it that made each one of these hours happier than the one before? Thyrza could not easily have said. She only knew that life was growing bright with an ineffable brightness; that those dull years to come were transforming themselves in a glory; and in all the future, that she had been wont to dread and keep out of sight, there did not seem to be a shadow. Half the day Basil was hovering about her. If she sat reading to Mrs. Van Alstyne in the morning-room, he sat there listening. If she sketched with Miss Reagan on the river-bank, he lay in the grass and studied her. Now and then Miss Reagan also would vouchsafe a glance and word of instruction, for Thyrza was a little blunderer with a pencil, and knew less of the laws of perspective than she did of the laws of Lycurgus; but for the most part, as if she were a child or a cipher, Miss Reagan wrought at her own sketch, absorbed and oblivious, and rather hindered by more of Basil's attention than required him to listen to a bit of gossip, or to say if violet-carmine or rose madder would be best to use, and never dreaming of the drama in the hearts beside her—the tumult of hopes and joys half hidden even from Basil and from Thyrza, as lovers themselves might be hidden in some delicious dusk. When they loitered home with their sketches it was Miss Reagan who reached out her hand and took Basil's arm as a matter of course; but Thyrza, now before and now behind; now crying the discovery of a clump of maiden-hair, now the nest of late fledgelings that her hand uncovered; now tripping from knoll to knoll, swinging her hat by its ribbons till a windy bough caught all the brown chevalure, and held it till Basil came to the release—Thyrza, in such case, was far more a feature of that landscape than the stately heiress who never took a step except by line and measure. Sometimes when her gay spirits had bubbled off—in which you never would have recognized her for the demure little maiden that first came to the Van Alstynes—she returned and walked beside the others; but she never took Basil's arm, and, indeed, so quick and helpful was she that I doubt if she had ever so much as touched his hand. After dinner, when they were at home, and his mother was taking her nap, and Miss Reagan began over again the songs she had practiced half the morning, Basil paid the singing a little dutiful attention, and then strolled off with his cigar, as an excuse, and called Thyrza to his aid, and they sat on the piazza till the bells of the village stole like an echo over the dark still air. Sometimes Thyrza delayed there with him half an hour after evening visitors had gone; or she came down, dressed to go out, before the others were ready, and found him waiting for her there. Short spaces, all of them, but endless in their content, in the satisfaction of the words that said so little and yet confessed so much, of the silences where Thyrza always found that Basil's eyes had been resting on her face with a glance that called carnation to its cheeks, since she could not fail to interpret such glances from such eyes.

Still, what a heedless happiness it was, based on no assurances save those tacit glances, asking no other! But heedless or not, it made the little creature beautiful with all the vividness of its feverish sparkle and color. "I declare," cried Mrs. Van Alstyne, on one occasion, as she sat in her garden chair, and watched the child filling the vases, "I don't know how I should live now without Thyrza. I never saw such an improvement in any living creature. She is very happy here—it is so fortunate—I shall want her so when you two are gone. I don't believe I shall ever let her go away."

Basil looked up from his book as she spoke, but the next sentence made him look down again, and presently rise and go in and stay locked in his room all day.

They were coming home from a wedding-party that night, quite a distance across bad roads before striking their own woods, and they were within a mile of the house when the old coach finally ceased complaining, and broke down.

"What are we to do?" asked Miss Reagan, having righted herself.

"Walk home," said Basil, curtly, out of the glowering mood that had wrapped him all night.

"Walk!" answered she. "My aunt and I? It is impossible! You must arrange something. The idea of trailing this white satin at midnight through the woods!"

And accordingly, after a long struggle with the coachman, Basil pronounced the carriage to be strapped up so that it might possibly take his mother and Miss Reagan at a funereal pace, with the driver at the horses' heads. "Thyrza and I will walk," said he. "She won't mind a mile."

"Oh, I should like it," cried Thyrza, forgetful of her organdy, her only evening dress, that damp and briers and sodden leaves would soil more irretrievably than any white satin.

"You are sure?" asked Mrs. Van Alstyne.

"Quite sure? Very well, then. Get in, my love." And the carriage trundled off, crackling and creaking as it went, and left the two alone in the woods, through whose tossing boughs the stars and the late moon looked in all horned and gibbous. As soon as the carriage was out of hearing, Basil, with a gay, free laugh that echoed through all the depths of the wood, rose from the log where he had seated himself as if he did not intend to stir till morning, and overtook Thyrza, who was standing by herself in the cloud of her gathered muslins.

"What a spirit this night air puts into one!" he said, after they had taken a few paces. "Was ever any thing more delightful than that breakdown—than this walk? Did I ever have you all to myself before?" And he took her hand, and felt the thrill that shot through its pulses as it lay upon his palm, and then he bent and kissed it in the dark. And Thyrza, hurriedly, happily, caught her hand away, and sped on like somebody possessed, without a thought of why or how she sped.

"Stay!" said Basil, detaining her. "This hour is ours. They gave it to us. I do not mean to lose a minute of it. Perhaps—who knows?—we shall never have another like it; never—unless—Thyrza—" But he had silenced himself, and was walking on as fast as she was now, and neither of them speaking except to warn each other of stone, or rut, or bough, till at last they emerged from the thicker wood into the chestnut avenue that ended on the lawn. "You have soiled your little white slippers," said Basil. "I ought to have taken you in my arms. Here; let me lift you over this wet spot;" and he held his hands for hers, but in another moment he had dropped her hands, his arms were flung about her, and he was holding her against his heart, that beat with such swift, strong blows, and his lips were fast on hers. A long, passionate moment, and then Thyrza was free, and she ran on alone as if some evil fate were pursuing her. But at the house she stopped, and in the shadow of the piazza turned and waited for him, and put her hands on his shoulders.

"Oh, is it true?" said she. "Did you kiss me there in the wood? Do you really—oh, Basil! and I love you so!" and the little burning face rested on that passion-cold one, the timid mouth touched his again, and she was gone.

It was that very night that Mrs. Devine, in her little parlor that blazed with the heat of the weather and the gas, was putting the last stitches to her work, the window open, and great gauze-winged flies darting in and out. The great ball at the Van Alstynes' to come off—it had engrossed her of late. Thyrza's toilette—the organdy crushed past retrieve by this time, doubtless—no money for a new one. She had been ready to cry to think of it. Her cheeks had been hot with her girl's mortification. All at once, like an inspiration, she declared, there came to Mrs. Devine a remembrance of an old piece of splendor of her own better days—a brocade, stiff with richness, that she had worn till waist and sleeves were no more, and whose breadths had been ripped and put away for any future use. But Mrs. Devine's mourning, and the poverty that excluded her from society, had given no chance to turn the stuff to account, till she had fairly forgotten it. There was not enough for a whole dress, either, and part of what there was was worn and faded.

I am sorry Mrs. Devine was such a simpleton; but as she was, it may as well be confessed that she lay awake for hours planning and turning in her mind, till she saw the thing complete—the gored breadths for the skirt, the pieces cut out in the gore for the low waist, a ruffle of black Brussels net on the faded part at the bottom, an over dress of the net, heart-shaped in the neck, and fastened with a red rose, its long drapery looped from the shoulders with clustered sprays of the same reddest of red roses. If the sun lay on a bit of waving wheat and a cloud-shadow swept across it, the colors and effect had been the same as they were on this perfect little September dress when the exulting mother finished it—the gold-colored fabric, with its brocade of silver beards and awns, with its cobweb lace and flowers. And worn with the work, Mrs. Devine covered it with a cloth, her heart as light as her eyes were heavy, and went to bed, rising in the morning for her Treasury routine, and unable to procure a box and dispatch it before another day.

That morning, as Mrs. Devine was trudging to the Treasury, blithe for all the heat, thinking of the surprise her girl was to have, of her beauty in the dress, of her pride and pleasure in it as she met her lover's eye—for lover Mrs. Devine was confident he was—thinking of the rich and happy future of her darling as Basil's wife—for that was what the child's transparent letters made her mother sure must one day be—that morning Thyrza was sitting alone with Mrs. Van Alstyne at the breakfast-table, where Basil had not yet appeared, nor had Miss Reagan. Happy little Thyrza—never had a morning seemed so fair, a sky so blue; never had such sun shone, such dew glittered. Presently Basil would be down; and the fresh blush was creaming over her face with the thought.

"You are a surprising little being, Thyrza," said Mrs. Van Alstyne. "Here you are as rosy as if you hadn't been up half the night, and here am I fagged out, and Basil too, and all the rest. We must keep earlier hours if we want any complexions left—and it does put every thing back so, and disheartens the servants."

"Miss Reagan has had her breakfast taken up stairs," said Thyrza, pausing from the letter which John had just brought in.

"Has she? Then I hope she'll sleep till noon. Any body," said Mrs. Van Alstyne, reflectively, "needs all the beauty-sleep to be had who is going to be married in October."

"To be married?" asked Thyrza, looking up from her letter with sympathetic interest and surprise.

"Didn't she ever tell you? I thought every body knew. Why, her trousseau is on the way from Paris! Such point! such duchesse! Oh, my dear, it will do your heart good to see it. We will open them ourselves, you and I. You know it is such a lucky thing, Thyrza; for, if they didn't marry, her fortune was to go to an asylum, except an annuity, and he has very little of his own—during my life. And it has been understood this ten years. Only last April it was made a formal engagement, and the wedding-day fixed for the 2d of October, his birthday. Let me see; this is the 5th of September, isn't it?"

"Basil's birthday is the 2d of October, too," said the innocent Thyrza.

"Certainly. I said so, didn't I? That is the reason they chose the day. And then it comes on Tuesday, which is very nice, because the Russia sails Wednesday, and that is to be the trip; and it will be pleasant for her, because Basil has been once before, and will know all— Dear! dear! splinters? If it had been delf it wouldn't have been hurt. Never mind; don't dream of being vexed. John will pick up the pieces. I shouldn't wonder if they could be riveted. It was a pretty bit of Dresden."

Poor Thyrza! she had been growing cold and white as Mrs. Van Alstyne chatted on; she did not know why. Only certain words rattled in her ears. "During my life," she heard again and again. "His birthday"—the words bewildered her. "Basil has been once before." Mrs. Van Alstyne's voice was cutting through her, grating and rasping like a saw. What had become of all the sunshine? Where was the brightness of the morning gone? What made the world so black? The little cup dropped from her shaking hand as she tried to lift it, and shattered on her plate. She cut her fingers with it, and the blood followed. The sight of that brought her to herself, and every nerve was strung again till she should be alone.

"I am so sorry," she said. "It was a pretty bit of Dresden;" as if Dresden were as common with her as clay. "And so you say Basil is to be married in three weeks? And I must go before the wedding! Oh yes, indeed—please don't—I must. Here is my letter, you see, and I must go to mamma at once—at once! I ought not to stay and talk when the train leaves in an hour. But if you will let them drive me to the station I shall just have time. And short leaves are best leaves, you know," said Thyrza, marveling at herself and her composure that withstood Mrs. Van Alstyne's storm of supplication.

"Poor child, you are alarmed about your mother, I know. But nothing can be amiss. And you will come back?" implored Mrs. Van Alstyne. "You will come back for the 2d?"

"Basil will not miss me at his wedding," said Thyrza. "Perhaps some day, when you are all alone, I will come back, and we will go round the place like two ghosts. I have been too happy this summer." And she ran away to toss the things into her trunk in a fury, and stamp upon the lid, to get on her traveling gown, and then to kiss Mrs. Van Alstyne a swift good-by, and dash off to catch the train and hide herself in a compartment, and lie back with shut eyes—hating the place, burning with shame, aching with a heart as sore as if it had just been torn from the roots—aching for a false, false lover, trying to bury the love and tread upon its grave, and longing, with wild, inconsistent longing, for one look of Basil's, one word, one touch.

Mrs. Devine was alone in her parlor that sunset, folding the brocade for its box, holding it up to let the last light ripple over it, singing to herself so that she did not hear the slow sound of tired footsteps. "Was it for me, mamma?" said a broken voice; and a little hand stole between her and the dress. "Put it away, mamma," said Thyrza; "put it in its box, and hide it out of sight. It is the shroud of a dead-and-gone summer." And Mrs. Devine turned and saw the truth in that wild, white face, and she fell upon her neck, and they comforted each other.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

COULD we examine very closely and carefully into the lives of those who have achieved success—by some attributed to sheer hard work, by others to luck—we should probably find that the true cause of victory had in a majority of cases been overlooked; that it lies in a genius for clearly perceiving the essential vein of work which will prove rich in following. As Carlyle says, "Know thy work." A hard task, confessedly, but not disheartening or useless, like that groping for light amidst higher and intricate speculations, asking explanation of a book sealed to all alike. The talisman is genius to appreciate position, to know the force we can muster to storm the key of that position. This exceeds all the plodding, unintelligent, unrelaxing labor, and is the Fortunatus gift that endows its lucky possessor with never-failing success. The five failing publicans who preceded the sixth flourishing Boniface had the same tools to work with—the same house, bar, and customers de facto or embryo—but they failed to see what might be worked out with those tools, and so blamed every thing and every body but their own deficient mental vision.

Ingenuity, or a perceptive genius, is an imperative requisite to success, if hard work in innumerable cases is an essential supplement; but we must not leave out of consideration an invaluable quality—that of abstraction and concentration—when we have decided on what shall constitute the real business of life. If, for instance, we desire to benefit our fellow-men, we must be persistently unselfish, and sternly resist the myriad cravings of luxurious sense and personal gratification which prowl about our heart like eager banditti, an investing force between it and the crying appeals for our sympathy and aid. Highly civilized times, such as ours, teeming with invention of all kinds to raise or satisfy every craving of the jaded eye, mind, and sense, tend to a dire confusion in judgment on what are necessities, what superfluities, what grain, what chaff. Yet, unless we continually make a right selection, we run risk of losing the power of using a discretion of infinite value in following the narrow war-path to the realms of success.

Unquestionably every powerful genius could force a way, if the period limited for the mastery of difficulties was not so brief—a few years out of the brief span of man's life. From what we can glean of Shakspeare's early life, he would seem to have been without what may be called external aid, or friends and position to facilitate his obtaining a hearing in the Babel-voiced London of Elizabeth's reign; and we have to solve the problem how he arrived at having his dramas represented before royalty, to be lessee, actor, landed proprietor, and sun himself in the intellectual revelry of the "Mermaid" tavern. But I think that the problem admits of a solution in that the greatest dramatic poet was by nature and habit a profound, an accomplished student of men. He was essentially practical, a gift many great poets have had reason to deplore did not accompany that of the sacred fire. For genius, wanting this precious leaven of the practical, often expends itself in twisting ropes of sand, and becomes the sport of the world, in place of one of its masters. A good deal of absurd prejudice is entertained by sympathizers with the "grand army of martyrs," the nipped and silent, the embryo great ones, for success, which they believe is generally obtained by sacrificing sincerity, independence of thought, nay, honesty! They extol failure as the product of a stanch refusal to compromise, and accept things as they are, and so far yield to the social wave as to float prosperously on the Sea of Life. How far are we bound to take up a self-imposed cross, and declaim in the market-place, in the teeth of current modes of thought, to be either roared down or deserted by the multitude? Tact comes to the rescue. Parodying Danton's famous words, "Audacity, audacity, still audacity!" I say, tact, tact, always tact! It comes to the aid of the great man, and by its means he wages as stern, if more subtle, battle with the hated foe as the martyr, and yet secures safety among contemporaries. Tact is armor for the battle, inopportune hostility is the rashness of a Sidney joining the strife without cuishes.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IT is astonishing how many well-educated persons do not know how to write their own names properly. A letter, or a manuscript of any kind, written in a cramped, illegible handwriting, is a trial of patience, if not a vexation of spirit, to the reader. Friendship will sometimes pardon it, though we have seen many a letter laid aside, unread, with some such remark as, "I must take time to decipher that: E—— does write such a dreadful hand!" or an impatient, "It's really more than it is worth to try to read this letter!" But in matters of business it is a sort of imposition to send an ill-written epistle, and the receiver generally feels it to be so. Who gets any compensation for spending half an hour in puzzling out the meaning of a carelessly written scrawl? Much experience, great patience, plenty of time and ingenuity, will generally enable one to make out the substance of a letter, be it written ever so badly, by the connection of one word with another; but conjecture is of no avail in deciphering the signature. Hundreds of people write their own names with as little care and distinctness as they would write the word and, disfiguring the capital letters with innumerable flourishes, and making the small letters appear like a line of m's, n's, or u's, nobody could tell which. We have known cases where, it being found perfectly impossible to decide what the individual letters in a name were, an exact copy of the hieroglyphics supposed to be the signature has been made as the address to a letter. The amount of paper, patience, and postage-stamps utterly lost because people can not write their own names plainly is incalculable, to say nothing of all the trouble which arises from the supposed neglect of the receiver to attend to commissions sent in letters. Every intelligent person can learn to write his own name and place of residence, with every letter plainly formed, no matter how illegible his general handwriting may be. And if an answer is desired to any letter, the full address, distinctly written, should accompany that letter.

A new style of wedding presents has been inaugurated at Fairibault, Minnesota. A bride there recently received one dozen oranges, one dozen lemons, five pounds of figs, five pounds of assorted candies, and six cans of assorted oysters.

The Queen of Holland has the reputation of being one of the strongest and most sarcastic writers for the press in the Netherlands. To her is attributed certain vigorous and bitter articles against Germany which have appeared in several leading journals of Rotterdam, the Hague, and Amsterdam, and have attracted much attention.

The landlady of Bismarck, at Versailles, wanted compensation for the injury done to her house and furniture. Bismarck's reply is worthy of the most enterprising Yankee. "Why, madame," he said, "your house is a fortune. Don't alter a single thing; leave it all just as it is, and the Americans will flock to see where the treaty was signed, and you will make ever so much by showing your rooms."

Musical criticisms nowadays run something after the following style in certain sections of these United States: Miss —— wore a rich purple suit trimmed with a handsome shade of lavender, a white over-garment, tight-fitting, with flowing sleeves, and a white bonnet trimmed with the same shades of purple and lavender—and she sang finely. The singing seems to be a consideration quite secondary to the dress.

When Paris capitulated Émile Deschamps could not restrain his patriotic grief, but exclaimed, "Alas! I have lived too long." Had he lived to see the Paris of to-day, blind in its madness, he would have realized the civil war to be a greater horror than the capitulation.

Auber, the eminent musical composer, who recently died at Paris, had attained the advanced age of eighty-eight.

Newport is preparing for the summer rush. It is rumored that the English members of the High Commission will spend part of June at Newport.

Those who have visited Paris, and remember among its works of art the famous column in the Place Vendôme, will feel a peculiar pang of regret at the mad Vandalism of the Commune. True, this column was a memorial of the victories of the first Napoleon. It was 135 feet high, and completely covered with bass-reliefs representing the battles through which that great soldier had conducted the armies of France; twelve hundred captured cannon were cast into ornaments for this triumphal monument; and if its destruction could have brought peace to distracted Paris, nobody would object. But as it is, a bronze column, harmless and senseless, but of wonderful artistic merit, has been torn down. Paris has one less attraction, and the fallen bronze is one more evidence of the impulsive fickleness of its populace.

The frightful ravages of the yellow fever in Buenos Ayres is attributed largely to the filthy condition of the city. There is no drainage in the city, and the most insufficient arrangements exist for the removal of refuse matter. The custom is to keep a box in every house for kitchen fragments. Meat is cheap in Buenos Ayres, and much finds its way into these boxes, and is soon decomposed in that climate. When the carts come to remove the contents, the whole atmosphere of the city is affected by the decomposing mass, which is dumped not far away, and from which constantly arises a death-dealing miasma.

The newspapers of the period teem with sayings and doings which we discard from our columns as unwholesome family reading. The records of crimes of every name and nature which are presented to the public every morning in some newspapers are repulsive to any but a vitiated taste. The habitual reading of such matter must be demoralizing to the young. While giving to children such information as may be protective and valuable in the exigencies of life, parents can shield them in the family circle from undue familiarity with criminal reports by providing them with an abundance of useful and entertaining reading. Thus, in some measure, will their purity of mind be preserved—for a mind well stored with good things will not readily receive that evil with which it may come into contact.

Every spring there is a floral concert in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, the proceeds of which are used to supply the beautiful flowers which every Sabbath gladden the eyes of those who assemble in that church. In speaking of these concerts recently Mr. Beecher contrasted the gloom and discomfort of many churches in olden times with the less austere arrangements of the present day. He remarked: "Since Christ was pleased in his discourses to make flowers symbols of instruction, and all the products of the field to be channels for the conveyance of Divine truth, we need not be ashamed to employ them in the same way. I should be glad if every young person brought up in this congregation were so imbued with a love for these incarnations of beauty that when the most inconspicuous of flowers should present itself by the roadside it would make him think of his church, of his home, and his childhood; so that every summer should renew those symbols that by the fortune of his education have become associated with the happiest days of his life. I desire not to make the church gorgeous, but I do desire to see it made happy. I desire to see it resemble the household in all the sweet familiarities of life and interchange of affections. I do not object to veneration and awe, but these, I hold, should be reserved for special occasions. The spirit of the Christian religion is not awe, but liberty in love; it is cheer, hope, faith, and radiance. Our churches should shine, not gloom."

Chicago is progressing in morals. The Common Council of the city object to the granting of licenses to newsboys and boot-blacks unless they can produce certificates of good moral character! How large would the City Council be if each member were forced to furnish a like certificate before being elected? It is a poor rule that does not work both ways.

One of the census enumerators for an English village gave in a schedule filled out as follows, minus the name of the parish and the parties:

—April th 3, 18701.
William — farm La Bour, aged 305.
his wife Eliza aged 28 all born
Ruth his daughter aged 8 years in this parish.
Robat his sun aged 6 years.
Elizabuth — aged 704 a widow.
all liven in one house, Born at —

A party of distinguished visitors from the west of England visited, not long ago, the British Museum. One of the officials informed them, when they came to a collection of beautiful antique vases, that they had all been dug up at Herculaneum. One of the party echoed his words with the greatest astonishment.

"Dug up?"
"Yes, Sir."
"What, out of the ground?"
"Undoubtedly."
"What, just as they now are?"
"Perhaps some little pains may have been taken in cleaning them, but in all other respects they were found just as you see them."

The gentleman, turning to one of his companions with a most incredulous shake of the head, assured him in an audible whisper, "He may say what he likes, but he shall never persuade me that they ever dug up ready-made pots out of the ground."

Two thousand muskets were found in Notre Dame, having been placed there during the siege by General Trochu.

"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" One well-known physician tells us that, on peril of loss of health, we must eat nothing between meals—"not even an apple or a peach." An equally wise doctor—so far as we know—says that "an occasional apple, peach, or melon is a healthy lunch." One says that tomatoes are one of the most wholesome of vegetables, or fruits, whichever you choose to regard them. Another assures us that they will seriously injure the stomach. In short, there is scarcely an article in the whole civilized bill of fare which has not at some time been condemned by some distinguished doctor as positively dangerous. And if we should take the combined verdict of them all, we should have little or nothing to eat or to drink.

A Rhododendron arboreum upward of twenty feet high, and covered with innumerable clusters of deep red flowers, was in full blossom recently in the centre of the great conservatory of the Royal English Horticultural Society. It was thought to be the most magnificent specimen of a flowering plant ever seen in Europe.

THE ELLIOTT SILVER MEDAL.

WE are always glad to record a woman's triumphs, and take pleasure in presenting to our readers illustrations of the Elliott silver medal, which the National Academy of Design recently awarded to Miss Marie Louise Bascom as the first prize for the best drawing from a full-length figure in the first exhibition of the drawing-class. The work thus crowned was copied from the cast of Silenus holding the infant Bacchus, the original of which, in the Louvre, is esteemed one of the finest works of ancient sculpture. The second prize, the Elliott bronze medal, which is given for the best drawing of a torso, was awarded to Miss H. Sidney Baylies; and honorable mention was made of the works of Miss Almira C. Fitz and other ladies. The medal, which we illustrate, is of solid silver, with an admirable profile likeness of the distinguished artist Elliott, in whose honor it is instituted, on one side, and on the other the name of the recipient, and is inclosed in a blue velvet case. This is the first time that it has been awarded, and women may take pride in the fact that in a mixed class the honor has fallen to one of themselves.

It is worth while for both men and women to know that a class has been in operation for a year and a half, under the auspices of the Academy of Design, where students—male and female—receive gratuitous instruction in drawing from the antique, aided by a fine collection of plaster casts. This class is under the charge of Professor Wilmarth, and its results thus far have been most creditable to teacher and pupils.

CHILDREN MASQUERADING.

THE little folks here have evidently been left to their own devices, and are making the most of the golden opportunity. The little fellow in the foreground, with his papa's hat over his eyes, a huge umbrella under his arm, and a cigar in his mouth, is enjoying the effect in the glass, and evidently satisfied with himself. One of his sisters is vainly endeavoring to manage a train, another is aping the graces of some fine lady, and a third is trying some new arrangement of the hair; while the girl on the floor ties a cap on the dog's head, regardless of the puppy that is worrying her doll; and the urchin behind her risks his neck in the attempt to reach his mamma's best bonnet. We suspect that the originals will be recognized in many households, wherein similar dramas are enacted wherever there is a chance.

JUST ONE TURN MORE.

See illustration on page 364.

IN this pretty picture our artist has given us a scene of Southern life. The hero of the sketch is evidently the handsome young man who is pleading with the belle of the evening for just one turn more among the group of waltzers whom we see in the distance. We can fancy that the elderly gentleman by her side is disposed to resent this interruption of the pleasant chat which he was enjoying; but the chances are that his remonstrances will avail little against the dark eyes of the youth, who is likely to carry off the prize in spite of every thing.

THE FORCE OF EXAMPLE.

MANY an argument for the intrinsic worth or wickedness of a creed has been based on the private lives of its professors. If a system of faith, they say, produces a certain practical result in the charity, patience, purity, or the like, of those believing, then the example is quoted as the power which gives life to the words taught, and what men are is the guarantee that what they think is wholesome. Not that the argument is philosophically sound all through, good men and bad being pretty equally divided among all the sects that the world has ever seen—even a Thug, who slays his fellowmen in honor of his dread goddess, having certain virtues of no mean calibre, among which obedience is not one that Christians ought to contemn. In this way nothing is more important to the propaganda of a new system than to put in front, well in view of the world and posterity, those members of the community whose example will animate others by its own beauty, and whose brave words are supported by noble deeds. If they can not do this they can do nothing. The preacher of charity who is intolerant to all who differ from him, of purity who is licentious, of generosity who is mean, of magnanimity who is selfish, of love who is hard, may preach in the wilderness in vain. His hearers are as stocks and stones; for, however good the thing he says, the divine breath of example is wanting to vivify his words, and they fall, therefore, dead, like the empty shells of rifled treasures. Let another—a doer without words—show the ideal life of his faith by action, and he gets a crowd of imitators. His deeds warm the soul of the young like fire newly taken from the altar, and his influence extends like the infinite ripple of stagnant waters when a stone is thrown into their midst.

Perhaps no example bears such fruit, carries such weight, as that of patience. The patient (not the mean of spirit) have a kind of divine healing in their lives by which others are led and blessed. Again, take the example of a sweet temper. We often say a word on the various phases of the home temper, because we know that nothing in the whole ordering of human life is so important for happiness, and for virtue too, as a reasonable and well-ordered temper in the home. Its example is invaluable, and of all that can be named this has most of that electric and cumulative force of which we were speaking. When the head of a household has this lovely grace of mind and character, when he or she bears the unavoidable disagreeables of life with the courage of good-humor, others are shamed or heartened into a like line of action. But when mamma breaks down into peevish complaining, when papa bursts out into louder and noisier remonstrance, then our sons and daughters think themselves privileged to follow suit, and to make themselves and every one about them sad or savage at the unreasonable tempers they display with so little reserve.

There is no great good in the axiom "Do as I say, and not as I do." This is but a lazy, shiftless kind of morality—a morality that has not much more substance in it than the stereoscopic slide which seems to stand out so four-square and solid, but which is nothing more than a flat surface focused. What I say, especially to the young, falls very dry and dead; but what I do is the living fact, which bears a long line of imitative facts, all made in its own likeness. And then the young are so cruelly sharp. It is all very well for mamma to say, Be tidy, be patient, be punctual, be good-tempered, and so on; but when she is just the reverse in deed—when she strews and litters all over the place, when she fumes and rails at every passing inconvenience, when she is always half an hour too late, and always more or less cross and scolding—what good does it do to preach and not practice? No, "Do as I say, and not as I do" is but a stupid kind of moral teaching, and at the best but an excuse for moral indolence of a bad sort. "The force of example" is a better motto, and when we add to it the force of a noble, an honest, a patient, cheerful, loving, trustworthy example, we have preached as beautiful a sermon in our deeds as the sweetest singer of them all has ever idealized in his words.

LITERARY.

THE republication of "Nothing to Wear" in the last number of Harper's Bazar, together with the announcement that another poem by the same author was to appear in Harper's Magazine for June, doubtless set many of our readers on the qui-vive for that number of this popular periodical. We are sure that none were disappointed either in the quality of the promised poem or in the other literary attractions of the magazine. In accordance with the general plan on which Harper's has been conducted from the start, this number presents such varied features of entertainment and instruction that he must be a captious reader indeed who does not find something to his taste within the compass of these beautifully printed pages. Those who remember the delightful Southern sketches of our old friend Porte Crayon will give him a cordial greeting on his re-appearance in this number. As a guide through romantic scenery Porte Crayon deserves the pleasant reputation he has won. His pencil is always graceful, his eye quick for points of interest, and his mind stored with anecdotes and historical and personal reminiscences. "Watkins Glen," through which he now conducts us, is one of the most romantic spots in the country, and the next best thing to going there in person is to read Porte Crayon's descriptions, and study his picturesque sketches. Turning from country to city, we find an interesting and valuable account of the New York Custom-house, by Colonel Thorpe, with illustrations, from which a very clear idea may be obtained of the manner in which the business of that establishment is transacted. The three papers we have named constitute the principal attractions of this number of Harper's Magazine, but the others are all of excellent quality. The editorial departments display talent and careful supervision. Taken as a whole, the number may be accepted as the model of a magazine which, ever since the publication of the first number, has been welcomed from month to month as the most entertaining and instructive collection of household reading in the English language.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. S.—Read children's fashions in Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV.

ECONOMY.—A grenadine polonaise-casaque would look well over your ashes-of-roses silk. Do not alter your linen lawn suit. A lace sacque may be made from a lace shawl after any favorite sacque pattern. Make the shawl border edge the sacque. Sew with very small seams.

FRENCH.—Ask your merchant for pillow-slip muslin. Sheeting the width of the bed is preferred to that with a seam in the middle. Square pillows with plain muslin slips for night and handsome square overalls for day are nicest. They are described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 18, Vol. IV.

J. D. S.—Use the sacque and upper skirt pattern of Short-Sacque Suit sent you for garments of black Canton crape. Trim with fringe and passementerie.

ROBERTA.—The Postilion-Basque Suit pattern sent you looks beautifully made in black grenadine over silk. White bonnets no longer form part of a bride's outfit. If a black lace hat matches your suits best, get it by all means.

HAMLET.—The best authorities sanction the quotation written thus: "A native to the manner born."

MARY ANNE.—It is customary for the gentleman to take the initiative in proposing a correspondence with a young lady.

CHROM.—John Howard Payne was the author of "Home, Sweet Home."—You can get the thread at a fancy store.

MRS. M. A. B.—Well-grown boys of four years may wear knee-pantaloons with blouses, though most mothers keep their boys in skirts until they are five.

OWYHEE.—The Worth basque and the burnous overskirt are often used together. Your idea of the silk and grenadine is good. Trim with bias ruffles of the grenadine.

C. T. C.—Make your gray dress with basque and flounced skirt, or trim with bands of dark brown silk. A demi-train skirt and basque, with ruffles of the same over white muslin pleatings, will be pretty for your silk.

"ZUYDER."—Dresses are worn higher at the throat this season than is usual for spring, and standing collars will remain the style. Very few ladies wear hoop-skirts. The smallest possible size is worn if any. A large tournure is universal.

EUGENIE.—There is an effort to bring plain walking skirts into favor, with only bias bands for trimmings, but elaborate flounces are still popular. Very long over-skirts, like that shown in Short-Sacque Suit in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV., are most worn. Basques are universal. A basque and short upper skirt trimmed with embroidered ruffles is a stylish plan for little girls' piqués. For a child of two years a loose Gabrielle is still used.

FLETA.—The over-skirt and basque should be trimmed to match, either with fringe or ruffles. Wear open pleated muslin sleeves to fit inside the half-flowing sleeve. A yard of black dotted net, with string in one end tied around the front, is the veil worn with gypsies.

MRS. D. W. W.—Read answer above to "Fleta." The Bazar has not given a pattern of the Nilsson collar.

MISS L. M. C.—Linen cuffs are not worn so much as formerly, because coat sleeves are not so generally worn.

MRS. W. A. M.—Ruffles of the same, piped and headed with black or dark brown silk, will trim your gray samples. Gray and brown are much worn together. Fringed ruches are not so popular as last year. Bias bands of the silk edged with narrowest black lace are more stylish. Take the pattern of Postilion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., as a model for silk suits. About twenty yards of twenty-four inch silk are required. Guipure lace is much used on silks. Wear a white Swiss muslin polonaise over your blue silk, or loop the blue skirt over black. Your gray poplin will also look well over a black skirt. For further replies we refer you to New York Fashions of our back numbers.

QUEDAR KNOLL.—Read answer above to "Marion."

MRS. R.—Make your linen lawn by the Apron-Polonaise pattern, and the white dress with demi-train and French waist. Salmon or rose colored neck-ties for a brunette. See the first page of the present number for model of dresses for girl of fourteen years.

VALUABLE TESTIMONY FROM ABROAD.—Vincent Lundberg of Stockholm, Physician-in-Chief to the King of Sweden, recommends Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer for the scalp and for the hair.—[Com.]

TAKE AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL to stop your Colds, Coughs, and Bronchial Affections before they run into Consumption that you can not stop.—[Com.]

ASK your grocer for Dooley's Yeast Powder—the best Baking Powder. Prepared at 69 New St., N. Y.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

DIAMOND D MOHAIR.

It is an old maxim that a good article is always the cheapest in the end, and to nothing does this more fully apply than alpaca. Unfortunately, it is almost impossible for the consumer to know a good make from a bad one till worn, and the only safe course to pursue is to purchase a make that is known and guaranteed to wear well. The Diamond Mohair is one of the honest old original makes that first rendered the fabric popular for their brilliancy, color, and lasting qualities, and are as well made now as they were twenty years ago.

Retailers say they are difficult to introduce at first, ladies preferring heavier and more leathery goods. But these goods are warranted double warp, and are as heavy as an alpaca can honestly be made. The leathery goods are produced by elastic dressing and an undue quantity of cotton, and, of course, they soon get fuzzy, crease and wrinkle easily, and lose their color, and the dress is done.

The Diamond Mohairs, made only from the best alpaca yarn, are naturally brilliant, and will not lose their brilliancy; springy, and will not crease; and, having no dressing in them, are not injured by water.

Observe the brand, and do not be persuaded to take any other till you have tried these goods once, and you will find you have a handsome dress that will remain handsome.

Now to be had from nearly all first-class retailers.

PYLE'S O. K. SOAP,

Saleratus, and Cream Tartar.

First-Class Household Articles.

Designed for the Best Family Trade.

Good Soap is the desideratum of every economical housekeeper, yet the market is flooded with that which has the semblance, but not the qualities of real soap; and consumers thereof unconsciously incur an extravagant expenditure in the course of time. Pyle's "O. K." is a pure article, the economy of which has been thoroughly established. Pyle's Saleratus and Cream Tartar are also unadulterated articles that are well known to thousands of intelligent consumers in New York and New England. We can refer to the editors of this paper, or parade columns of testimonials, but knowing that our articles will speak for themselves, we solicit a trial. If your Grocer recommends some other, depend upon it he has his own interest in view, and not yours. JAMES PYLE, Manufacturer, 350 Washington St., New York.

APRIL, MAY, and JUNE purify the blood and beautify the complexion by using HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

In the Spring and Summer months the system undergoes a change. This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

Prescriptions accurately compounded. French, German, and Spanish spoken. Stores open all night.

P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

The King of Mineral Springs

Is the German Seltzer; and

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT

Is its duplicate. Letters attesting its wonderful Tonic, Aperient, and Anti-Bilious qualities swarm in from every source. The question has been settled whether artificially medicated waters may not be equal to those which burst sparkling from the earth itself. They can; and the Seltzer Aperient, when undoubtedly pure and genuine, proves the fact.

Be cautious. Accept none other.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

FACETIÆ.

A DENTIST'S office is not improperly called his drawing-room.

HARD TO BEAT—A boiled egg.

AN UNHEALTHY PLACE.—We would advise all affectionate heirs expecting money from wealthy relatives to adjure them, for the sake of their precious health, not to go to New Orleans. During the last twelvemonth no less than a dozen people have died there who were over a hundred years old.

A ROUND OF PLEASURE—A round of delicious toast.

PEN AND INK.—Nature, with a natural wish to sit upon Art, informs us that there is in New Granada a plant (Coriaria thymifolia) known as the ink-plant, which gives a writing-fluid better and more durable than the manufactured article. Let the province be at once renamed, and let all writers be given free passes to Inksylvania and Pennsylvania. All we want now is a paper-plant.

THE FIRST ROSE OF SUMMER—Shad roes.

Fashionable dogs in New York, the fashion authorities announce, are to wear silk necklets this summer.

QUERIES.

Of what crime is a carver most guilty?—Of stealing his knife.

What parts of the body are most useful to carpenters?—The nails.

When does a man impose upon himself?—When he taxes his memory.

When is water most liable to escape?—When it is only half-tide.

What dress is most durable?—A habit.

POOR BOGG'S PRESENTS.

MAKES PRESENT OF A FAN, WHICH IS USED TO HIDE HER LOVING GLANCES AT OTHERS.

OF MUFF, IN WHICH RIVAL'S HANDS ARE ALLOWED TO CREEP.

OF A WATCH SHE FREQUENTLY CONSULTS WHEN HE IS STAYING TOO LONG.

OF A HAT, WHICH SHE LIKES SO MUCH THAT SHE IS NEVER HOME.

OF BOOTS, THAT ARE ADMIRED DAILY BY HIS RIVALS.

OF A VEIL, WITH WHICH SHE VEILS HER FAULTS, AND LEADS HIM TO THE ALTAR.

RHYME WITHOUT REASON.

We commend these stanzas to any French ladies or gentlemen who may be desirous of mastering the peculiarities of English pronunciation:

Peasant Arcadian,
Guiding the plough;
Coarse are your garments,
Your aspect is rough.

Peasant imprudent,
I hear you've a cough;
Do you feel sure
You're clad warmly enough?

Bibulous peasant,
Your voice it is rough;
You're no disciple
Of temperate Gough.

Home to your cottage,
You hear the wind's sough;
Even the birdies
Sing hoarse on the bough.

Home to your cottage,
And bend o'er the trough,
Kneading in loaves
The digestible dough.

Though the bread's heavy,
Unyielding, and tough,
Chawbacon's teeth
Will get easily through.

A Western lady who had been deserted by two consecutive husbands has contracted a third matrimonial alliance, which she hopes may be permanent, with a gentleman whose legs have been amputated.

An idiot at a wedding pointed a gun at the bride "in fun," and blew a lot of her wedding dress off. He "didn't think it was loaded." Ought he to be let off himself? His wife has reserved that question for a future discourse.

An Iowa correspondent eulogizes the smartness and economic tenderness of a wife who helped her husband to raise seventy acres of wheat. The way she helped him was to stand in the door and shake a broom at him whenever he sat down to rest.

THE STRAIGHT TIP.

MRS. P. "Going out to see what Time it is, Mr. Penhecker? Well, I'd advise you not to be long, or you'll know What's o'Clock when you come Home, anyhow?"

NATURE COULDN'T AFFORD IT.—A young gentleman who had just married a little beauty says she would have been taller, but she is made of such precious materials that nature couldn't afford it.

RAPID TRAVELING.—The science of aerostation is farther advanced than is commonly supposed, but at present the expenses attending this mode of transit are so great as to make it available only for royal personages. This will explain the announcement that "The Duke of Genoa is paying flying visits to the most interesting English towns previous to his return to Italy."

The Correct Portrait of a Young Gentleman of Fifth Avenue, who said Doctor Darwin's Theory was all Humbug.

VERY DREADFUL FOR TALLBOY.

OLD MR. TODDLES. "Sir, I look DOWN UPON YOU WITH SCORN!"

A CAUTION TO NURSE-MAIDS.

ACUTE MOTHER. "I hope, Jane, that you are not in the Habit of Reading when you Wheel the Perambulator?"
JANE. "Me, Mum? Lor' Mum! I shouldn't Think of sich a Thing, Mum!" [Of course not.

FASHIONABLE INTELLIGENCE.

Chignons having gone out with the Ladies, it is expected that the Gentlemen may take them up in this Style.

Dress of brown faille. The skirt of the dress is trimmed on the bottom with a wide gathered ruffle, a narrow box-pleated ruffle turned upward, and a fold of the material. Black gros grain paletot, trimmed with black guipure lace, pipings and tabs of black gros grain. Bonnet of black figured tulle and lace, trimmed with a spray of yellow roses and brown leaves.

Fig. 4.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 9 TO 11 YEARS OLD. Skirt of pink barége, trimmed on the bottom with two gathered ruffles of the material. The over-skirt, which is draped at the sides, and the sacque are made of pink and white striped barége; folds of pink gros grain form the trimming. Belt, with sash of pink gros grain. Round hat of white straw, trimmed with pink gros grain ribbon and a spray of flowers. To make the sacque cut of barége and white Swiss muslin lining from Figs. 1 and 2, Supplement, each two pieces, and from Fig. 3 one piece. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 4, observing the contours of the under part. Baste the material on the lining, and join the back, side forms, and fronts according to the corresponding figures. Bind the front and bottom and slits with pink silk three-quarters of an inch wide, and cord the neck. Furnish the right front with several hooks, and the left front with a fly and the corresponding eyes. Join one upper and one under part of the sleeve each from 7 to 8 and from 9 to 10; trim the sleeve as shown by the illustration, and sew it into the corded armhole, bringing 10 of the sleeve on 10 of the front.

Fig. 5.—FOULARD WALKING SUIT. This suit consists of a skirt and over dress, and is made of gray foulard. Folds of dark gray gros grain and twisted gray silk fringe form the trimming. The revers collar and cuffs are also of gros grain. Round hat of tulle and lace, trimmed with gros grain ribbon and pink roses. To make the over dress cut of foulard from Figs. 5–7, Supplement, each two pieces, after joining on the pieces turned down in the Supplement, and of foulard and muslin lining one piece from Fig. 8. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 8 of No. II., Black Velvet Basque, Supplement to Harper's Bazar, Vol. IV., No. 22. After lining the side forms and fronts with shirting from the top to four-fifths of an inch below the bottom of the waist, sew up the darts in the fronts, and join Figs. 5–7 according to the corresponding figures. For the back part of the skirt cut a straight piece twenty-six inches and three-quarters wide and thirty-six inches and three-quarters long, which is sloped off toward both sides at the bottom from the middle of the back, corresponding to the length of the side pieces; lay the top of this part in pleats corresponding to the width of the back, and join it with the latter. Join the back with the fronts and side forms according to the corresponding figures, and the side edges of the back part of the skirt with the side edges of the side pieces (Fig. 7), and arrange these side pieces each in a pleat at the end of the waist, bringing × on ●. Join the neck of the over dress with the revers collar cut from Fig. 9, and cover the edges of the seams on the under side with a strip of gros grain. For draping the over dress fasten to the inner side at the end of the waist, at a distance of two inches each from the middle of the back, bands each four inches and three-quarters long, the other ends of which are fastened each to the place indicated by * on Fig. 7.

NAMING CHILDREN.

IN speaking a few words for children a short time since it occurred to us that something should be said on the grave and important subject of "naming" the little ones.

The highest poetical authority can be quoted to prove, as far as a poet's authority can prove a matter of fact, that a "rose by any other name would smell as sweet." The mere matter of smelling, it is quite true, would be unaltered by any name we might attach to the glowing queen of the flowers; but if the rose had always been nameless, and now a name which had most unrosy associations should be assigned to it, the fragrance might be as sweet, but the associations would be disagreeable; and every time our minds connected the most sweet scent with the unsweet name we should be afflicted by a sense of incongruousness.

A man's progress through life is helped or hindered by every thing that belongs to him; and the least we can do for our fellow-beings is to abstain from creating any, even the least, impediment to advancement. Men are the balloons sent up in society. As civilization advances the medium becomes rarer, and rising more difficult, and ballast less needed. One of the hardest things to throw off is one's name. It adheres. Even a nickname sticks. How much more a name gravely selected by parental responsibility, and solemnly assigned amidst religious ceremonials at a baptismal font.

The atrociousness of giving bad names seems all the greater when we reflect upon the helplessness of the recipient. The poor babe can make no protest. Years elapse before he becomes acquainted with the wrong done him, and then, perhaps, that wrong is irreparable. There will be some one to remember the misnomer, and to fix it upon him in later life, at a period when such a reminiscence may be for him a most awkward thing.

The taking of the census in Indiana is said to have discovered a child bearing the name of "Lena Luella Josephine Roberta Musidora Jones." The child was reported to be as well as could be expected under the circumstances; but think of her having to carry such a name through life! It is a case for legislative interference. A fortnight ago a young delinquent was brought before one of our police courts, and the name he was compelled to give in was, if we recollect rightly, "Jefferson Davis Lincoln Stonewall Jackson!" Parents capable of giving such names as those we have quoted are not fit to be intrusted with the rearing of young children, who should be taken from them, renamed, and committed to safer hands.

The more common the surname the greater the disposition of parents to attempt a distinction by the long preface of high-sounding, aristocratic, or classical "Christian names," as they are called, some of which are eminently unchristian. This propensity was satirized by a humorous English poet, who described the perplexity of an anxious couple in securing the right name for their precious babe: "So they called the child Prince Albert Saxe-Cobwebs Tommy Jones!" But how preposterous to send a child upon the world laden with such names as "Tiberius Gracchus Smith," "Aurelius Augustine Constantine Brown," and "Maximilian Alexander Fitzherbert De Grey Billings!"

The first-born is generally the heir to such troubles. The young parents seem to think that there never was such a child, and never will be such a child again, and they strive to boil down all names that are great and sweet into the very sirup of a prenomen.

Sometimes great blunders are made through affection or affectation. Mr. Frog, in one of the English cities, had only one great friend; the mayor, who seemed to him to be the glory of human dignity, and that friend's name was Mr. Bull. So the child was christened "Bull," and the fond father never awoke to a sense of his condition until the infant's name was registered "Bull Frog." The Bazar once had a friend whose surname was uncommon, and uncommonly ugly and disagreeable—so much so that we do not choose to record it. He had no need for singular names for his children; but he had just begun the study of Hebrew, and was fain to take a word from that venerable language and give it to his son, being well assured, as he might be, that child of mortal birth had never borne that name. The trouble was that after the child had been baptized and had grown into some years, and the father was dead, it was discovered that the word did not mean what the father had supposed, but had a very different signification, which he would never have given his child. But from respect for the deceased father the young man still staggers under that name.

Why call a child Alexander or Julius Cæsar unless you know that he is to be "a brave?" Your Wellington may prove a coward, and your Augustine a reprobate. The little babe you call "Rose" may be pale as a lily, and your little "Lily" grow up to be a sallow young woman, and your "Charity" be a gossiping slanderer, and your "Grace" an awkward lump.

Let the child have a simple, good name, and let him make it illustrious if he can. Let it be remembered that all those great names you have selected gave no glory to the great men who bore them. The men made the names glorious, but it is a glory which can not be reflected. Moreover, let it be recollected that an unfortunate name does harm to three generations. People will think that parents who make a mistake in the important matter of naming their children can not be persons of good sense. Their folly, it will be fancied, is in some measure inherited by the son, who is the second generation of the injured; and his children, in the third generation, will be embarrassed by the conspicuous impropriety of the paternal nomenclature.

We seriously commend this subject to all personally interested, our concern being only that of what we consider our good taste, and what we know to be our philanthropy.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Chimes.

MY DEAR CHARLES,—In the golden age, which is that of youth and travel, I came one evening to Antwerp. It was the soft sunset hour, and the life of the quaint old city was all picture as I passed slowly through the streets. When I had reached the hotel, and was shown to my room, I opened the window, as usual, and stood for a long time looking out, introducing myself to my new home, making acquaintance with its general aspect, and becoming familiar with certain spires and towers with which I knew that I was about to associate for some time. It was long ago, and the vision has become a very beautiful picture in my memory. But as I leaned out over the tranquil evening street the air was suddenly full of soft rippling music, near and far away—a murmur that every body could hear, that floated in at every open window; indeed, a benediction of music breathed upon the city. It was the ringing of the chimes of Antwerp: neighbor of Bruges and Ghent—"quaint old Flemish cities," of which Longfellow has sung.

Long afterward, one Sunday morning in summer, I walked out with a little fellow of six, in a pleasant New England village; and as we sauntered along the green road, he chasing the butterflies, and constantly returning to my side, like the ship's jolly-boat to her shadow, we both stopped and listened. There was the same clear, near yet remote, soft clangor of mingled bells, filling the air with the melody of "Days of Absence," a tune familiar to the boy. He was awe-struck, as he looked at me, drawing nearer, and he whispered, "What is it?"

"They are the chimes, dear boy—the new chimes of St. Mary's—bells that make music in the church tower."

"Who plays them?" he asked, perhaps thinking that some angel had descended in the beautiful morning to call sinners resistlessly to church. All day he was thoughtful, and now that he has grown to be a man he confesses that he never hears chimes without feeling that he is holding my hand in the green lane, and listening with awed delight to the melody of St. Mary's in the pretty village of Seamoor.

Memory, indeed, is a harp of a thousand strings; and one of the thousand, resounding, stirs how many of the others! As I recall the evening at Antwerp, dear Charles, and the morning at Seamoor, I remember another evening also, at Salzburg, in the Tyrol, the romantic city in which Mozart was born. We had been walking through that lovely region, where there were no railroads then, and came at sunset, as at Antwerp, to the comfortable hotel upon the great square—to the trout and the salad, and the light, pleasant wine and the mild cigar. And there, as usual, I leaned out of the window, charmed with the picturesque town, and looking at a statue of Mozart in the centre of the square. He stands with a tablet in one hand, and a pencil raised meditatively to his lips with the other, while his eyes are fixed upon a high tower opposite, as if he were just inly hearing the first strains of a fresh melody. It is a graceful, placid figure, and seemed the genius of that soft twilight hour. But, while I was looking at it, from the very tower upon which his eyes were fixed one of his own familiar melodies came sweetly murmuring from the chimes; and then it seemed as if I also heard the strains that were audible in his own mind, or as if, in the very moment of inspiration, he had been arrested by the familiar music of an earlier time. I shall never think that the Mozart I saw did not hear the music I heard.

And very recently, my dear Charles, I was passing a few days in a pleasant village near a lovely lake; and as I sat one hot morning in my room hearing the cool plash of a gentle fountain in a neighboring garden, and smelling the odor of the apple blossoms which little breezes lazily lifted into my open window, once more the air was full of that pervasive music of melancholy bells. They were playing the "Highland Laddie," and their plaintive question pierced the silent woods and echoed over the hill-sides and fields; and far across the gleaming lake the farmer in the furrow and the traveler loitering along the road heard the pensive prayer, "Oh, where, tell me where, has my Highland laddie gone?" I shall not forget that summer morning. It is immortal in that music; and whenever I hear the melody I shall always think of that placid lake, and of the noble woods that crown the hills, which daily hear the melodious entreaty, and only sigh inaudibly in response.

But when I walked out, and stood under the tower in which the bells hung, and saw them ranged peacefully side by side, each of a different tone, and adapted to be touched by skill into music and not into discord, I could not help feeling that, fortunately for us, there are other chimes than those of bells, and that the blessing of their music is not confined to the few solitary towers in which the bells are hung. For as I lay the next morning upon the hill-side, looking over the lake, and the chimes began to ring, I know not how I began to think of a certain household in which there are father and mother, and sons and daughters, and little grandchildren. And when you are there you feel as if some apostle had passed and given his benediction of "Peace be with this house!" and you feel also that the blessing has remained. From grandpapa down they are all courteous, thoughtful, respectful of each other. They do not make the home a reservoir of all their ill-humors. They do not snarl and snap, or sulk gloomily. Their talk is not miserable gossip, but there are ease and fun and infinite good-nature. I have seen the little grandson bringing the earliest violet to grandma, and no birthday is forgotten. If the domestic order is disturbed, the wife is all the more anxious to restore it, because she knows that there will be no scolding. The husband is always neat and careful in his dress, because he does not respect his wife less than his sweetheart. There is universal mutual forbearance: no petulance, no heart-burning, no discord; and when you come away your memory is full of music, as if you had been listening to the sweetest chimes.

Now, my dear Charles, if you think that such a result is merely the result of nature, of temperament, you are gravely mistaken. Temperament counts for much, I allow. But you might as well suppose that the music of the chimes is due entirely to the bell-metal as to explain that household by what you call nature. The bells must be carefully tried, tunefully adjusted, and then played by a skillful hand, inspired by a musical sense, before they will be melodious. And it is a similar training which makes that happy household a tower of chimes. That husband is no more fond of a cold dinner than you are, my young friend: he would like to yield to his impatience, probably, as well as another man. But from the beginning they have been strictly taught otherwise. They have not been allowed to be selfish. They have been made to feel that it is quite as bad to "let yourself go" among those with whom you live most intimately as with those whom you only occasionally see. Mutual respect is the law of that household. And what is that but harmony? What wonder, then, that the effect is that of tuneful chimes? When I have passed an evening in that family, and come sauntering home to my lonely rooms, I am an old man no longer. Once more I arrive in the soft twilight at the Antwerp inn, and, leaning out of the window, I am aware that the air is murmuring with music; and again I am looking at the Salzburg Mozart, and listen with him to his own melody tenderly ringing from the tower at which he gazes.

I thought, too, dear Charles, as I lay there that happy morning, that some men, like certain households, are towers of chimes. How friendly Serenus is! how full of appreciation! How little his great knowledge, his essential superiority, obtrudes! For he is so truly modest that he stimulates you by sympathy, and does not in the least oppress you by an overpowering conceit of humility. He knows more than the rest of us in every direction. He has seen all the famous people, and bears himself a most influential part in the world to-day. But his great powers all play without jar or friction. He has sacrificed neither body, nor mind, nor heart. He has the simplicity of a child, the sweetness of the noblest woman, the manliness of the truest man. What am I saying, then, but that he is exquisitely harmonized, that his heavy bass does not overpower his treble, that all his powers and graces move in tune, and that this richly gifted man is a tower of far-heard, penetrating chimes? When I staid one summer week with Mæcenas in that delightful chamber looking out upon the Arcadian hills, every day at noon the great hall clock rang out a grave chant which trembled through the whole house, filling every room with sweetness. So when I am in a house and hear the voice of Serenus, I seem first to hear the soft music of that clock telling the hour; but when I think of his genius—of his wisdom, devoted to helping mankind to obey the celestial summons to come up higher—I seem to hear the lofty chimes that the poet invoked to ring out the old, ring in the new, bursting into that triumphant tumult of melody which shall fulfill the poet's prayer.

And still, as I lay there upon the hill-side under the tower of chimes, and thought of that household and that man, and how they, too, made music like that in the tower, my fancy took a wider sweep. As the faculties of one man, as the members of one household, as the families of a neighborhood, as the neighborhoods of a nation, why, also, should not all the nations themselves in happy harmonies of peace make the whole world a tower of perfect chimes? What else is the millennium but that? What is the lying down of the lion and the lamb together but the accord of the bass with the treble? These musical bells in the tower, then, I said to myself, in the summer morning, are not merely murmuring an endless plaint for the "Highland Laddie;" they are ringing the sublimest of prophecies. This is the voice of Isaiah that I hear—vast, multitudinous—foretelling the glory of Jerusalem. Even as those little bells, hung in order in this tower, fill this landscape with sweet sound, so shall all the powers of humanity, harmoniously combined, fill the world with endless music.

Once more, as I mused, the bells of Antwerp Cathedral rang, and the fresh hopes and joys of unworn years filled my heart again.

Once more in the Salzburg evening the tender melody of Mozart rippled from the tower, not less sweet than in that long-past twilight. Once more I held the little hand of that dear boy in mine and heard his whispered question, which my own heart asks when I hear the voices of children like him—"Who rings them?" And as I arose and walked slowly away, the chimes followed me with their mournful, beseeching refrain, "Oh, where, tell me where, has my Highland laddie gone?"

Your friend, dear Charles,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

ROUND HATS.

AT the beginning of the season it seemed probable that round hats would be entirely superseded by the becoming little gypsy bonnets; but with the approach of summer, and of preparations for sojourning in the country, there is such a demand for the old favorite chapeau that milliners have held special openings of round hats to supply their customers. And these round hats are not for the country only, as is evinced every morning on the Avenue and Broadway. Bonnets are de rigueur on all dress occasions, for church, and visiting; but round hats are not relinquished for morning walks, shopping, and traveling.

Two principal shapes of hats are shown—the wide-brimmed flat, and the English turban with high, broad crown and upturned brim very close about the crown. Of the flats, or shade hats, those of real Leghorn are the handsomest for morning strolls, or for driving about in low basket carriages. Those trimmed with white are most admired. Shells, ruches, or bows of white gros grain surround the crown; ribbon streamers fall behind; the brim is widely bound with white velvet; a long white ostrich plume is fastened on the left side, and passes over the crown. These all-white hats have the advantage of being appropriate with almost any summer toilette. They cost from $30 to $35, the untrimmed flat being $18 or $20. Rivaling the white hats in beauty are those trimmed with black velvet ribbon and white and black ostrich tips. A narrow black lace is sometimes added on the brim, but we prefer the simple, graceful outlines of the fine Leghorn without fanciful garniture. The brims of flats may be caught down at the side, like a bathing hat, or left plain, in the picturesque Maud Muller shape. A Leghorn flat, elegantly trimmed to wear with brown, écru, or black costumes, has two shades of gros grain ribbon—écru and chestnut brown—in standing box-pleats around the crown, while on the left side are ostrich tips of each shade, and a lovely cluster of tea-rose buds; long streamers of ribbon behind: price $35. Another Leghorn has a scarf of écru China crape around the crown, with black lace edging the scarf. Pale pink and deep crimson roses form a cluster on the side.

Garden hats and useful shade hats are shown in the ordinary braid, both black and white, with brims slightly fluted, like rays from the crown. Fanciful little butterfly bows of narrow ribbon surround the crown, and a ribbon ruche is under the brim.

A light summer hat for equestriennes is of brown or black straw, with square high crown and stiff brim. A gauze scarf and mask veil form the trimmings. A beaver for riding or traveling has a crown about half as high as a gentleman's silk hat. The trimming is gros grain bands, wing feathers on the side, and a square gauze veil very tastefully arranged to envelop the head and shoulders, and protect them thoroughly from dust.

Dressy round hats for driving in the Park, and for visiting at country villas, are English turbans of the finest undressed chip, far softer and lighter than any before imported. The brims are covered with velvet, or with thickly repped gros grain laid on plain or in three small folds. The crown is surrounded almost to the top by two or three broad folds carelessly made of gros grain ribbon doubled. Two ribbon ends float behind, and there is the inevitable group of flowers and feather tips on the left side. These are stylish and in most exquisite taste. When the hat is not trimmed with reference to one especial suit, very dark shades of the peculiar neutral tints now in vogue are used, such as scarabée green, plum-color, reddish maroon, and the grayish-blue called elephant-color. The contrast between the pure white of the chip and the dark, soft shades of velvet or faille is very rich. The flowers and their leaves are tinted to harmonize with these colors, and look exceedingly pretty, though not copying nature very closely. A French hat in most refined taste is of pearl gray chip. The upturned brim is covered plainly with gros grain of the same shade; white gros grain folds are high about the crown, some tea-roses on the left, and a long scarf veil of gauze of the same shade of gray twined around the crown. Price $35. A plainer hat, simply trimmed, but very stylish, is easily copied. It was of English straw, with three bias folds of black gros grain covering the upturned brim. A scarf of black dotted net with lace border was twined around the crown, with streamers behind. A black ostrich tip and white heron's plume were on the left side. Price $20.

SUMMER BONNETS.

Ladies are going through the summer in straw and chip bonnets. A few bonnets imported directly from Paris are of lace and tulle, but the preference here is for straw and the undressed chips. These chips are so fine that tulle is used for trimming them, and does not look incongruous. A French gypsy of pearl-colored chip has doubled pleated ruches of tulle of the same gray shade arranged around the crown and on the head piece. There are long tulle scarfs at each side, to be carelessly tied under the chin, and gros grain ribbon ends fall over the chatelaine. To give more character to this dainty bonnet, a facing of scarlet silk appears at the edges, and a cluster of dark scarlet roses is placed on the side. The face trimming is a queen's ruche of gray tulle.

Two contrasting colors of gros grain ribbon appear on many gypsies. Among these, pink and gray, and pink and lavender, appear to be most popular. One made by a tasteful modiste is a white chip gypsy, with alternate shells of pink and lavender gros grain, and a spray of buds. A pink tulle ruche is inside the front.

A dress bonnet is a white net foundation, with Parmesan violets arranged on the crown and coronet, and closely covered with white tulle. A white aigrette of heron's plumes and knots of violet gros grain are on the crown.

THE MARGUERITE POLONAISE.

Many of the richest costumes of the season are made with the new Marguerite polonaise, so called from the skirt being caught up at intervals by bows and ornaments, like the dress worn by Marguerite in the opera of "Faust." This graceful polonaise has the body and skirt in one, without a belt, or any fullness at the waist, and has the effect of a basque with an upper skirt sewed to its edges. It is simply a close-fitting corsage, sloping low over the hips, like the old-fashioned polka waists worn years ago, with drapery attached, forming an upper skirt. This drapery is not sewed on, but is merely the full breadth of the material of which each part of the corsage is cut. The front is cut in the ordinary way, like any polonaise; the back of the corsage falls smoothly over the tournure to the depth of six inches, sloping shorter on the sides. At the end of the close-fitting part of the polonaise the full skirt is caught up in each seam and held by a bow or passementerie ornament. This garment displays a fine figure with full rounded hips to great advantage, as the body has no postilion pleats or other fullness, but simply follows the natural curves of the figure. Black cashmere and silk suits are made in this way, the over dress serving with a variety of skirts. This fashion is also admired for grenadine. The upper part of the polonaise of grenadine is lined with thick silk; the skirt is not lined.

HINTS ABOUT DRESSES.

Some very stylish modistes are again using three darts in the front of basques, or else a side body is formed in front, the seam having the appearance of a third dart. This is necessary to produce the full busts that fashion now requires on all corsages. We notice also that side forms in the back are carried up very high, the upper seam of the form reaching the armhole about an inch below the shoulder seam. A seam down the middle of the back of corsages is almost universal. Ample drapery on the bosom adds much to the beauty of house dresses. For instance, a cluster of lapping folds is arranged in the Marie Antoinette square when the shoulders are broad, while narrow figures are given the appearance of breadth by Greek folds sewed in at the top of the sleeve and pointing low in front. These folds are cut bias and attached to foundation net, so that they can be worn or removed at pleasure. They add greatly to the beauty of simple striped lenos, mohairs, and the summer silks worn at this season.

Coquettish little aprons of various materials, from Swiss muslin to black silk, now form part of afternoon costumes for the house. The prettiest pattern, with a bib, has bretelle pieces beginning just back of the shoulder, and passing down in a basque-like curve of the apron, and forming pockets there. This is exceedingly pretty in Swiss muslin or bishop's lawn, trimmed with a little pleated ruffle of the same, with or without an edging of patent Valenciennes. A row of black or colored velvet may be placed through the centre of the pleats, and bows of the same are sometimes placed down the middle of the apron. When made of black silk, the bib is usually dispensed with, and the whole tablier is so elaborately trimmed with ruffles, lace, and passementerie that it becomes an ornament for almost any dress.

Suits of white woolen fabrics, such as twilled flannels and English serge, are being made abroad for the sea-side resorts. They are made with two skirts and a sacque with a hood that is large enough for use. The jacket serves as a wrap with any costume. The cretonne suits lately described in gay Watteau designs of cotton satine are also made up for the country. They are trimmed with colored laces and muslin pleatings.

—The Marquis of Bute, DISRAELI'S last hero of romance, has never been presented to the Queen. His mother, who was sister to Lady FLORA HASTINGS, exacted on her death-bed a promise from him that he would never be presented to the Queen, on account of the cruel treatment of VICTORIA to Lady FLORA, and the baseless slanders she permitted to be circulated about her, which have long since been disproved. When the Queen some years ago visited Rothesay Bay in her yacht, and lay for several days in sight of the superb residence of the Marchioness of Bute, Mount Stuart House, the Marchioness not only refrained from attempting to pay her court to the Queen, but actually ordered all the blinds of the windows in Mount Stuart House to be kept closed so long as the royal yacht lay within sight of them. Time has not softened in the son the bitter sense of injustice which hardened the mother's heart. It is even said that horror at the notion of being obliged to consider Queen VICTORIA the head of his Church played no small part in inducing the Marquis of Bute to abandon that Church for the communion of Rome.

—Mrs. MYRA CLARK GAINES mentions it as a bit of retributive justice that of more than one hundred lawyers who were opposed to her New Orleans suits seven committed suicide, and fifty-six drank themselves to death. Does it follow that "their loss was her Gaines?"

—Our bankruptcy courts, so far as big scandals are concerned, show small when compared with the "magnificent busts" of young English swells of high degree. A late London journal gives a summary of the case of Lord COURTENAY, son of the Earl of Devon, whose debts amount to the mere bagatelle of four millions of dollars. Among the unsecured creditors are the Marquis of Anglesea, $55,000; the Earl of Devon, $500,000; the trustees of the Duke of Newcastle, $170,000; and Mr. F. YATES, $152,000. There is some prospect that a satisfactory compromise will be effected.

—The Empress of Russia has purchased RAPHAEL'S celebrated little picture (it is only seventeen centimeters in diameter), entitled the "Madonna del Libro." This is the fifty-second Raphael which has been disposed of to foreign purchasers, out of eighty-three which Italy formerly possessed. The Empress bought it as a present to her consort on his birthday. The picture was offered first to the Italian government for $60,000; but as the Italian government is impecunious, it couldn't trade, and the Empress became the purchaser at the paltry figure of $64,000.

—Some two weeks ago the Rev. Dr. THOMAS WORCESTER celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his settlement over the New Jerusalem Society in Boston. A coupé and harness, and several hundred dollars were sent to him as presents. It is said that his is the largest society of that denomination in the world, and has a larger number of church members than any other Protestant society in Boston.

—Should Dr. HODGE, Professor of Theology in Princeton Seminary, survive until next spring, he will have completed fifty years of service in that institution. They propose to do something about it.

—BISMARCK is of opinion that, on the whole, German statesmen have ruled more benevolently, if more clumsily, than those of France; and beneficence, he estimates, is sure to make itself felt in the end.

—The most successful instance ever known in France of the co-operative system is that of M. PAUL DUPONT, the great Paris printer. Prior to the war his business yielded him $250,000 per annum, ten per cent. of which he divided with his workmen, according to their individual merit. It is to be said, in honor of this establishment, that in connection with it are schools, baths, reading-rooms, libraries, savings-banks, and gardens for the benefit of its employés.

—The Grand Duke ALEXIS is positively coming to see us this summer, rumors to the contrary notwithstanding. The Russian minister, M. CATACAZY, and the Russian parson, Mr. BJERRING, are officially posted, and they say the thing is to be done.

—Hon. ALBERT FEARING, without fearing what envious persons might say about it, has given $10,000 to the public library of Hingham, Massachusetts, at the same time intimating to the trustees that it would be pleasing unto him to have the people of the six neighboring towns to visit the library for reference, study, etc.

—Another member of the BATEMAN family, Miss ISABELLA, is about to début on the Edinburgh stage in a piece written by her brother, entitled "Fanchette; or, the Will-o'-the-Wisp," an adaptation from the French of Madame George Sand.

—Mr. SPURGEON, who is a foe of pulpit pedantry, says: "As a general rule, it may be observed that those who know the least Greek are sure to air their rags of learning in the pulpit; they miss no chance of saying, 'The Greek is so and so.' It makes a man an inch and a half taller by a foolometer if he everlastingly lets fall bits of Greek and Hebrew, and even tells the tense of the verb, and the case of the noun, as I have known some to do. The whole process of interpretation is to be carried on in your study; you are not to show your congregation the process, but to give them the result, like a good cook, who would never think of bringing up dishes, and pans, and rolling-pin, and spice-box into the dining-hall, but, without ostentation, sends up the feast."

—A young American lady in Paris gives the following graphic account of a concert lately given by the Commune for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the republic, at the Tuileries, which was used for the first time, the programme stated, for a patriotic work:

"In the evening we went to a concert given at the Tuileries by the Commune, the programme of which I send you. We secured our tickets beforehand, and at eight o'clock arrived at the palace doors. What was our dismay to find hundreds of people there before us, and arranged in a long line, waiting to get in. Those who had tickets and those who had not stood the same chance, and as the prices were so low as to be within the means of all, you may imagine the rabble gathered there. We had no means of entering but by joining the queue, which extended from the door down to the end of the garden, and forming an immense curve back to the door again—four persons abreast. We took our places, and one hour and a quarter after our arrival we entered the doors. We knew it was a sight worth seeing, so we would not give it up. By the time we got in the first-class room was packed, for, of course, our republicans took their seats utterly regardless of the prices of their tickets. We got places where we could, and great fun we had. There was such a noise that not a sound could be heard from the concert-room, but nobody minded that. When those inside applauded, the others did the same, and roared with laughter at the joke. People sat round peeling and eating oranges, men in blouses beside decorated gentlemen, who, I don't think, enjoyed the égalité and fraternité principle. The most amusing part of all, however, is yet to come. The people in the room in which we were seated, if they were in front, could hear all the music of the concert, and, of course, enjoyed it exceedingly; those in the back could hear nothing, as a band was stationed there, and in the midst of a brilliant song of the prima donna it struck up a waltz for the benefit of those in the rear. Such a hubbub! the rear applauded, the front hissed and hushed, all to no purpose; the band continued, and its notes must have penetrated to the very end of the concert-room. We laughed until we cried; I don't think I ever enjoyed any thing more, and we were all well repaid for waiting so long outside. PASCHAL GROUSSET, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, was there, and he has as bad a face as I ever saw. After we left the concert we wandered through the palace. In the chapel were National Guards playing on the organ, in the halls National Guards smoking and humming the Marseillaise. In the court-yard there were quantities getting the worse for liquor; others, by way of showing their discipline, were quarreling with their captains; in fact, you never saw such desecration. On entering, every body was presented with a red cocarde, ornamented with a liberty cap. When we left, a little before eleven, the people had not stopped pouring in, so you may imagine the crowd that was there—and such a crowd!"

—It was a source of much jocularity between Mr. SEWARD and Earl Mayo, Governor-General of India, that the former presented a letter of introduction from BRIGHAM YOUNG, whom his earlship had never seen. BRIGHAM had once met Lord Milton, and thought he was the representative of the majesty of England in India. It was kind of Mr. YOUNG to do this little bit of courtesy to a man so appreciative of that sort of thing as Mr. SEWARD.

—Professor G——, of Rochester University, perpetrated the following the other day in his class-room. He had been dilating on the character and career of LYLWARCH HEN, the Norwegian poet, and wishing to illustrate the author's style, he remarked, "I will read you one of his lays." A slight smile came over the faces of a few students at this, which gradually spread, until the whole class was in a tumult of laughter before the Professor saw his joke.

—The widow of the late Rev. ELEAZER WILLIAMS, the "lost Dauphin," is still living near Green Bay, and shows the remains of great physical beauty. The present Dauphin, his son, JOHN WILLIAMS, is engaged as sailing-master on one of the lake crafts, and resides at Oshkosh. He is now about forty, but has none of the accomplishments of his father.

—Lady ANNA DE ALSAKOFF, a noble lady of Russia, noted for her piety, her surpassing beauty, and her benevolence, and who is attached to the imperial household, has given to the pastor of the Greek Church in this city a donation consisting of three gorgeous and elaborate pieces of gold embroidery on heavy and lustrous crimson velvet, the color always used in the vestments of the priests and altar-coverings of the Greek Church. There are two pieces cut in the form of the Greek cross, with the Christian emblem worked in massive gold embroidery in the centre, and relieved with traceries in gold of a most artistic and fanciful design. These are intended, the one as a covering for the chalice, and the other for the holy disk. Then there is another piece, even more elaborate, delicate, and superb, both in its design and handiwork, than the two specimens just mentioned, which is to be used as a veil for all the sacred vessels. The Greek cross is, of course, the most prominent figure, but the tracery and intricate pattern of the tasteful embroidery which surrounds it is truly most marvelous. The three coverings cost several thousand dollars. The lace-work, requiring months to manufacture, is of the purest refined gold.

Cravat Ends in White Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1 shows one end of a cravat worked, as shown by the illustration, in white embroidery. Work the outlines of the medallion in button-hole stitch, and cut away the material inside of the medallion and work in lace stitch. Work the remaining embroidery in button-hole, half-polka, and knotted stitch, as shown by the illustration. Cut away the material between the simulated crossed ribbons, as well as at the outer edge, and make a narrow hem on the remainder of the cravat.

Fig. 2.—The ends of this cambric cravat are also ornamented with white embroidery in the design shown by the illustration. The outer edge of the cravat ends are worked in button-hole stitch, and the surplus material is cut away.

Parasol Cover.

THIS cover consists of eight parts of the size shown by the illustration, which are worked each separately with point lace braid and fine thread in the design shown by the illustration, and joined along the straight side edges. This cover is fastened on the parasol in such a manner that the under scalloped edges of the cover project over the outer edge of the parasol. If the parasol for which the cover is intended is larger than the cover, the separate parts of the latter must not be joined close together, but so as to leave an interval between the side edges, which is filled up with lace stitch.

Braided Alpaca Basque.

See illustration on page 373.

THIS gray alpaca basque is ornamented with a braiding of gray silk soutache, satin stitch embroidery, and gray silk fringe. Cut from Figs. 36–38, Supplement, each two pieces, and cut the sleeves from Fig. 39, observing the contour of the under part of the latter. Sew up the darts in the fronts, join the back from 12 to 13, and join the back, side forms, and fronts according to the corresponding figures. Work the braiding and embroidery on Fig. 38 as shown by the illustration and partly indicated on the pattern. Face the front, bottom, and slashes with a bias strip of silk three inches wide, and set on the fringe. Set on a double standing collar four-fifths of an inch wide furnished with hooks and eyes for closing.

Sew up the sleeves from 16 to 17, and trim them as shown by the illustration; face the bottom with a bias strip of silk three inches wide, and sew them into the corded armholes according to the corresponding figures.

Embroidered Cashmere Basque.

See illustration on page 373.

THIS black cashmere basque is lined with silk. The trimming consists of bias strips embroidered in point Russe and satin stitch with silk of various colors, black silk fringe, and passementerie buttons. Cut of cashmere, net interlining, and of silk lining from Figs. 10, 11, and 14, Supplement, each two pieces, from Fig. 12 one piece, and the sleeves from Fig. 13, observing the contour of the under part of the latter. Cut out a piece in the upper part of the sleeve along the contours at the under edge of Fig. 13. Baste the material on the net, sew up the darts in the fronts, and join the back, side forms, and fronts according to the corresponding figures. Sew up the darts in the lining, Fig. 10, join the back, side forms, and fronts, and baste the lining in the basque along the seams, letting the stitches show as little as possible. Fell the lining to the material along the outer edge, except the neck, and finish the latter with a double standing collar. Furnish the basque with embroidered bias strips, and the remaining trimming as shown by the illustration; the design for the embroidery is given on Fig. 13 of the Supplement. Fold the back over on the outside along the dotted line, and fasten × on ●; then also fasten × of Fig. 11 on ● of Fig. 12, and set on a button at each place, as shown by the illustration. Set a fly on the left front, and put on hooks and eyes. Cut a slit in the sleeve along the double line on Fig. 13, and join it with Fig. 14 from 29 to 30. Line the sleeve with silk, and sew it up from 31 to 32. Run the material and lining together along the outer edge, fold the inserted part over on the outside along the dotted line, and fasten × of Fig. 14 on the corner marked 29; also fasten the place indicated by × on Fig. 13 on this corner. Finally, trim the sleeves with fringe and buttons, and set them into the corded armholes, bringing 32 on 32 of the front.

BURIED TREASURES.

WHAT is the amount of chance that a buried treasure, worth the trouble and expense of searching for—a great treasure, say of millions—exists any where in the world? A notion that such a thing might be, that a man helped by fairies, or grateful natives, or a talent for dreaming, might find somewhere a treasure which would make him the richest man in the world, "rich beyond the dreams of avarice," has lingered among men from the very dawn of literature, and has been the subject of innumerable legends; but it seems to have been born partly of the wish latent in every man's heart to become enormously rich without the protracted and monotonous efforts through which immense wealth is usually attained, and partly of the sort of admiring awe created by wealth itself—an awe which in one particular case, the wealth of Solyman the Wise, our Solomon, has infected the legendary literature of whole countries. Sunk treasures there must be, for plate ships have been sunk, and fleets which may have had treasure on board—why does not somebody dive about Salamis?—but the amount of treasure in any particular ship can hardly have risen often to the Monte Christo level. We do not know accurately of the loss of more than one private fortune belonging to a Spanish viceroy, and in the royal galleons the treasure was usually much divided, to escape both wreck and capture. Besides, the sums which seemed so enormous in those days would be worth comparatively little now. The proprietors of the Nelly Gay, which is now starting from New York to fish up the galleons wrecked in the harbor of Cumana, off the Venezuelan coast, expect to find $3,000,000, but they were worth, when they were lost, just fifteen times that amount. It was the enormous comparative value of gold in the time of Elizabeth which impressed the tradition of these galleons so strongly on the popular imagination; but if a band of adventurers could recover all ever lost, they would probably make less than the shareholders in the Devon Great Consols or the Burra Burra made out of their lucky venture. Of the recovery of buried treasure to any great amount the only story which looks authentic is that of Herodes Atticus, and it is rather difficult to imagine where he found the treasure "too great for a subject." At the present time it would be difficult even to imagine a place where the Monte Christo scene could be enacted in real life. So very many conditions must perforce be brought together. In the first place, the treasure must be of considerable antiquity, or must exist in the East or South America. The modern world does not heap treasure together in a form which will admit of its being buried with safety, preferring to keep it in bankers' safes, which are never lost sight of or forgotten. Somebody knows, if the Reds do not, where the Bank of France keeps its money.

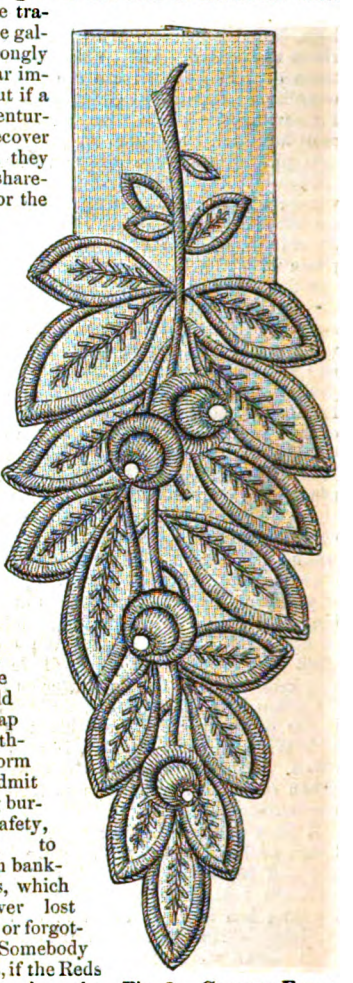

Fig. 2.—CRAVAT END IN WHITE EMBROIDERY.

A fit of insanity might seize a jewel-dealer, say in Paris; he might bury his stock in secret, and might then be shot as a foe to the Commune; but the occurrence is exceeding improbable, modern jewelers being usually quite able to find some one worthy of trust. It is not the habit of modern life to keep much cash in a house, and the few men who possess enormous quantities of plate or jewels, such as the Duke of Brunswick, are usually too far beyond ordinary danger to take such extreme precautions as burying or concealment of their treasures. A monastic order might have money enough to make up a treasure, and be by accident sufficiently in danger from a mob to wish to bury it; but the practice of monastic orders just now is to keep their wealth in bonds which a mob can not use, and bonds are perishable articles, while an order would have too many devotees whom it could trust with the secret to be in danger of forgetting the clews. In the Middle Ages, no doubt, fortunes may have been buried—Dumas hit the true point there—for it might have been often expedient to conceal wealth from every body except its owner and one or two hereditary dependents. But then it is not likely that such a treasure would be exceedingly great. The condition of preservation requires that it should be in gold, or silver, or jewels, and it is very unlikely that any noble ever had gold, or silver, or jewels that would yield a quarter of a million now. If he had, he was as rich as a man would be now with four millions, and it is exceedingly doubtful if any body in the Middle-Age world not a reigning prince ever had any such sum in personalty. Personal wealth was very scarce indeed, and very minute millionaires, if they commanded ready cash, were very great people. It was a prodigious effort for men like the Fuggers to lend a quarter of a million to

Charles V., and the Fuggers rose by sheer force of wealth almost to sovereign rank. A noble or two in Constantinople, before its final fall, may have had large accumulations, and have buried them to avoid proscription, killing his slaves afterward; but there is no traceable record of any such incident, and Constantinople was very often plundered. It is, however, conceivable that to avoid these plunderings money may have been buried and lost there, and still more conceivable in the case of Rome and Ravenna, where lived persons whose wealth has probably never since been rivaled. The information existing upon this point is not complete, the ancients having had little idea of accurate statistics; but enough is known to make us suppose that, say under the Antonines, a first-class Roman fortune, belonging perhaps to the heir of a patrician line which had been "suspect" for a good many years, might comprise a larger personalty than has ever been accumulated since. A man of that kind had estates in a dozen countries, all yielding tribute, and palaces full of wealth, easily guarded by regiments of armed slaves. But then it was the practice to employ the gold in lending at usury, the palaces were all plundered by the barbarians, and a multitude of persons must have been aware where the treasure was deposited. To make up a reasonable story of that kind we must have a good many conditions united; a palace full of treasure liable to be plundered, but not plundered; and occupied by servants so faithful that after all heirs were dead they abstained from spoiling their property. If the money was in no danger, it would not be buried; if it were buried, aid must have been sought; and if the heirs were not killed, they would have returned to the spot to search. It is just conceivable that that may have happened in the case of some temple, the priests being killed and the crypt undiscovered; and the wealth of a temple, being the accumulations of ages, might have been very great indeed. We should like very much to have a good, scientific, patient dig about Delphi, even though it was so eagerly plundered. It is curious that a tradition of a treasure of this kind, guarded as we have supposed that the treasure of a Roman noble could not be guarded, is immovably fixed in the minds of the Indians of Peru. They say that Atahualpa's great reservoir of gold, a temple with rooms full of the metal, never was seized by the Spaniards; that it exists still, and that the secret of its existence is kept by a family or tribe of Indians, who religiously guard the treasure for the day when the heir of the Incas shall resume his ancient throne. Considering the way in which priesthoods and persecuted tribes and secret societies have guarded traditions, there is nothing absolutely impossible in the story, more especially as the guardian family, if faithless, could not hope to preserve its wealth from Spanish greed; but it is much more probable that the Indian secret so jealously preserved is the locality of the mine where the Incas must have obtained their supplies of the metal. There is, we have read, no proof that it has ever been found, and after the discoveries made by the Americans in California we can believe any thing of Spanish inertness in the pursuit of wealth.

A buried treasure may exist in the East, and one of considerable magnitude. The changes of fortune there have been startling, the practice of burying treasure has been general, and the religious communities have been very wealthy, very enduring, and very fond indeed of collecting gems. Any prince may have fled, as Nena Sahib undoubtedly fled, with very vast treasure, have been abandoned but not betrayed, and have buried his wealth and wandered forth a devotee, leaving no clew to his secret, which might also, even according to our ideas, cover considerable amounts of imperishable property; for these men will go on buying gems for generations on generations, till, like the Shah of Persia, according to Mr. Murray's account, they can produce precious stones in bucketfuls. They are quite exempt from robbery; they manage in their wildest moods to respect the secret treasure-house, and they are subject to very strange turns and freaks of fortune. Shah Soojah, for example, might have buried the Koh-i-noor, instead of racing about with it, and have forgotten the place, or have been unable to return to it. The Maharajah of Burdwan might die, and the secret of his treasure, believed to be buried in a tank on the estate, might perish with him. A good many circumstances besides flight from an enemy might predispose an Oriental prince or noble to bury treasure; and one would like to know, only it would be of no use to know, if any thing has been ascertained about the dispersion of the treasury, "full of the plunder of a world," which must once have existed in Samarcand, or if any search has ever been made in the ruined capital of Cambodia. But though such a treasure might exist, there is little hope of its discovery except by accident; and men hungering after sudden wealth will do much better to expend their energies in hunting for mines than in searching for treasures of coin and gems.

RUDIMENTARY ORGANS.

NOT one of the higher animals can be named which does not bear some part in a rudimentary condition; and man forms no exception to the rule. Rudimentary organs are either absolutely useless, or they are of such slight service to their present possessors that it is denied they could be developed under the conditions which now exist. Rudiments of various muscles have been observed in many parts of the human body; and not a few muscles which are regularly present in some of the lower animals can occasionally be detected in man in a greatly reduced condition. Every one must have noticed the power which many animals, especially horses, possess of moving or twitching their skin. This is effected by the panniculus carnosus. Remnants of this muscle in an efficient state are found in various parts of our own bodies; for instance, on the forehead, by which the eyebrows are raised.

The muscles which serve to move the external ear, which also belong to the system of the panniculus, are in a rudimentary condition in man; they are also variable in development, or at least in function. Mr. Darwin has seen one man who could draw his ears forward, and another who could draw them backward; one celebrated medical lecturer used to amuse his pupils by exhibiting to them the movements of his ears. It is supposed to be probable that most of us, by often touching our ears, and thus directing our attention toward them, could, by repeated trials, recover some power of movement. But no man possesses the least power of erecting his ears—the one movement which might be of use to him. The ears of the chimpanzee and orang are curiously like those of man, and the keepers in the Zoological Gardens assert that those animals never move or erect them. Why these animals should have lost the power of erecting their ears we can not say. It may be that, owing to their arboreal habits and great strength, they were but little exposed to danger, and so during a lengthened period moved their ears but little, and thus gradually lost the power of moving them. This would be a parallel case with that of those large and heavy birds, which from inhabiting oceanic islands have not been exposed to the attacks of beasts of prey, and have consequently lost the power of using their wings for flight.

It appears as if the posterior molar, or wisdom-teeth, were tending to become rudimentary in the more civilized races of men. These are rather smaller than the other molars, as is likewise the case with the corresponding teeth in the chimpanzee and orang, and they have only two separate fangs. They do not cut through the gums till about the seventeenth year, and they are much more liable to decay and are earlier lost than the other teeth. In the Melanian races, on the other hand, the wisdom-teeth are usually furnished with three separate fangs, and are generally sound. Professor Schaaffhausen accounts for this difference between the races by "the posterior dental portion of the jaw being always shortened" in those that are civilized. This shortening Mr. Darwin attributes to civilized men habitually feeding on soft, cooked food, and thus using their jaws less. It is becoming quite a common practice in this country to remove some of the molar teeth of children, as the jaw does not grow large enough for the perfect development of the normal number.

UNDER THE BEDCLOTHES.

I WOULD give so much now if I'd only
  Obeyed dear mamma, and not read
That horrible ghost-story. Gracious,
  How strangely it runs in my head!

I've crept deep down under the bedclothes;
  I'm trying as hard as I can
To care not a bit for the darkness,
  But just go to sleep like a man.

The story was nonsense, I'm certain;
  Such things never happen—oh no;
How queer that I shouldn't believe it,
  And yet should be shivering so!

I've counted a hundred and fifty,
  But that doesn't alter my fright.
I'd rather have lots of sound whippings
  Than pass through another such night.

Of course I deserve to feel frightened;
  Mamma was so careful to say,
"Remember, don't touch this book, Johnny,"
  The morning she put it away.

And then, like a bad, silly fellow,
  I read it all through on the sly,
Forgetting what God did to Adam
  When he disobeyed, by-the-bye.

THE EMBROIDERED SURPLICE.

SUCH a season as I have had with my two nieces! and I must say I have been heartily provoked at Harriet Dimock, sister Ann's child though she is. However, that is all over now, and I shall take her to Washington with me this winter, if nothing happens. We have been spending the summer at Leicester, a quiet little town up among the hills. I took Harriet because her mother did not want her with her at the Springs, where there are too many flirtations going on for a city girl just out of school; and I took Antonia, my other niece, because her life has been in such a narrow groove for years, and I thought the sight of the grand hills around her all summer would do her good. And so it did at first; her eyes kindled, and her cheeks grew round and pink; the mountain air benefited Harriet too; she felt "up to any thing," as she said, flashing her saucy black eyes at me, as if she knew I was afraid of what she might do.

But after a little the girls seemed to get used to the mountains, and did not rave so much about the beautiful sunrises and sunsets. I thought that was natural enough, and went quietly on with my letter-writing and lace-work, letting the girls ride and walk as they chose, for Tonie could be trusted any where, and I did not hear of a single person in the neighborhood that Harriet could flirt with. But I was startled when she began to go to church service every morning at eight o'clock in little, old, ivy-covered St. Mark's, at the other end of the village. Tonie (we call her Tonie, because Antonia is such an absurdly stately name for the child) had done it regularly ever since the first day we came; but one always expects that of Tonie, she is such a devoted little High-Church Puseyite, and thinks nothing too much for the laity to do. She has even had a crucifix in her room, and a rosary, which some one brought from Rome and gave her.

So, as I hinted before, no one would think strange of Tonie's going to church every day—she would go ten times a day if she could. She thinks churches ought to be kept open continually, year in and year out, as they are in some countries. But when it came to Harriet's going, that was a different matter; and so the third morning that she started out in her stylish walking suit, à la Eugénie, with prayer-book in hand, I put on my bonnet and went too. The morning service was in the chapel—a small room with narrow pointed windows and stained glass that turned the sunshine into "dim religious light." There were not more than eight people present, counting ourselves. But then there was the clergyman! I know not what visions of priests and monks and anchorites trooped through my mind in the moment of his entrance and approach to the reading-desk, with his eyes on the floor and his arms folded cross-like on his breast. But when he began to read the sentences his voice, full of devotion and sweetness, pleased me. His face, too, was a handsome one, though young and boyish, and his close-cropped hair gave him a look of quaint simplicity, which accorded well enough. It was a pleasant little morning service, and I enjoyed it because of the young man's evident sincerity; he did not rattle over heedlessly the words of the prayers and lessons, but gave them with a fervor and earnestness that touched the heart. But I smiled a little to see, in the oft-repeated glorias, my two nieces bowing so lowly and crossing themselves just as he did. It might not be surprising in Tonie; but Harriet!

When the service was over I waited for the girls, who stood devoutly till the young priest had passed out. A well-meaning neighbor whom I had met once or twice stepped up to me and said how glad she was to see us there—"such an acquisition to our little flock!" I asked her who their rector was.

"Old Dr. Graves. He's gone across the ocean for his health," she replied; "and so Ralph Holland is supplying his place for the summer. The Reverend Ralph Holland, I should say, for he was ordained a month ago. He's just from the Theological Seminary, and 'most too ritualistic, we think; but he is so active in doing good we can't help but like him. Has he called on you yet? If he hasn't, he will before long."

Here Tonie and Hattie joined me, and we passed out through the little Gothic door. The Rev. Mr. Holland had had time to take off his surplice already, it seemed, for we saw him leaving the chapel by a side-door, looking more priest-like than ever in a close-fitting cassock buttoned tightly down in front.

"You've found me out, auntie," said Hattie, laughing saucily. "But now tell the truth, hasn't he a heavenly face?"

"Like the St. John in the chancel window in the church," murmured Tonie. "You will go to church next Sunday, won't you, auntie?"

"To see the St. John? Yes, I think I will," I said, smiling.

That very afternoon the young clergyman called on us. I always liked boys, and I liked him at once, for he seemed to me not much more than a boy, although he told me he was twenty-four years old, and in spite of his priestly dignity. He evidently had seen nothing of the world in a worldly way, but had confined himself to his books and to the church services with a spirit of self-sacrifice, and a pure purpose in his heart; harmless as a dove, but very, very far from serpent-wise. In ecclesiastical knowledge, however, he was wise enough, I soon thought, when I heard him quoting the fathers and the councils in a conversation with Tonie.

Now what did Harriet Dimock know or care about Nice, or Trent, or Ignatius? But she composed her mischievous face to a look of teachable humility, and asked bright little questions, and now and then fluttered off into some gay speech, or a ripple of light laughter, that brought pleased smiles to the grave young clerical face, and made him almost gay himself before he left us. Meanwhile, for my own part, I had discovered that his mother was an old school friend of my youth. This gratified him, and he promised to take me to see her some day, if I would venture so long a drive, she living far out in the country.

Either this or some rare congeniality found in us brought the Rev. Ralph Holland very frequently to visit us after that first call. Almost every day he stepped in with a book, a flower, or our letters from the office, our little cottage lying directly in his way.

On Sunday I went to hear him preach. Eloquent? No, scarcely that. Our young priest would never be a Luther or a Père Hyacinthe. It was the sermon of a youth; you have all heard such; but this was better than some, in that it did not spend itself in flowers of rhetoric. His views were narrowed by education and by prejudice, but he showed an anxious good-will toward mankind, and an eagerness to lead his little flock in the right way, that could but incline one's heart toward him. I listened, gently critical, while Tonie sat absorbed, intent on every word; and as for Hattie, I never saw her so wide awake in church before.

That afternoon Tonie took a class in Sunday-school. She said she should feel a great deal better to do so, as she had always had one at home. Not to be behindhand, Harriet would have taken one too, instantly, if she had had any idea what to say to the children; but knowing her inability, she modestly declined when Mr. Holland proposed it, saying she felt the need of instruction herself; and forthwith he took her into his Bible-class.

Days passed, and the plot thickened. Tonie made a set of book-marks for the Bible and prayer-book in the chapel, and Harriet inveigled Mr. Holland into playing croquet and taking mountain drives. She said all the young clergymen in England played croquet, for she had read about it in novels, and why shouldn't he? Tonie would never have thought of proposing such things herself, but she enjoyed the crumbs of gayety that fell to her share. I think she wished sometimes, when Hattie was making sparkling little speeches, that she could say bright, quick things too, bonmots and retorts; but that was not her way: her brightness was of a dainty, delicate type, that Hattie dazzled into insignificance at once. So she intrenched herself in her duties, my shy, sweet violet of a niece. It was a pretty sight to see her Sundays with her little scholars around her, singing hymns with them, or drilling them in the catechism with serious earnestness. She found two or three sick people that she could go to read to week-days, and a poor woman for whom she could make baby-linen. Harriet declared she believed Tonie meant to join a sisterhood when she went back to the city, and become Saint Antonia for life.

One day I heard the girls talking in low tones in the next room, and such mysterious words reached my ears as "altar cloths," "fald stool," "fringe of gold," "stoles," "neck bands," "chasuble," and then I lost several sentences; but presently Tonie's voice uttered, rapturously,

"And, oh! with white lilies worked all around the border!"

"Just the thing!" exclaimed Hattie. "You'll do it, won't you, Tonie? And I'll get the materials this very day."

"The very finest, finest linen," said Tonie, impressively—"fine enough to be drawn through a ring!"

"Some work for the temple," I thought to myself, with a smile. It was one of my favorite little fancies about Tonie that if she had lived in the days of Moses she would have been one of the wise-hearted maidens who spun with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, both of blue and of purple, and of scarlet and of fine linen, for the service of the tabernacle. She could stitch and embroider with such a beautiful daintiness that she was a perfect treasure to sewing societies and to people who wanted to get up presents for poor clergymen and poor churches. She never did such work for self-ornamenting—it was always in some way for the church. I could easily imagine her reverently fashioning mitres and girdles for the sons of Aaron, and making upon the hems of the robes pomegranates of blue and scarlet, and purple and twined linen.

That evening the girls took me into their counsel. They wanted to make something appropriate to give to the Rev. Mr. Holland, to testify their regard for him as a clergyman. The Leicester ladies had just given him a dressing-gown, it seemed.

"A green one!" exclaimed Hattie, laughing; "and green is not at all becoming to him!"

"And what do you think of making?" I asked, with interest.

"A surplice, auntie," said Tonie, softly. "You know I have nothing to give but my work. So Hattie buys the material, and I shall make it up."

"Just the thing, auntie, isn't it?" said Hattie. "The one he wears is at least six inches too short. I can see his boots as he walks into the chancel. I am sure it is one of Dr. Graves's old ones that he left behind. Every clergyman ought to have a surplice of his own."

"But will you know how to cut it out?" I asked, looking dubiously at the yards upon yards of exquisitely fine white linen that lay upon the table before me.

"I made a surplice once," said Tonie. "It was for a missionary. There was no embroidery on it, though; but I saw a beautifully embroidered one once, and took a copy of the design. It is like a running vine of lilies around the neck and down the front and all along the hem."

"And she is going to work a tiny Maltese cross on every button!" exclaimed Hattie, enthusiastically.

So the work commenced, and from thenceforth Tonie had no leisure moments. Harriet did not set a single stitch; she had no "knack at such things," she said. So she dressed herself bewitchingly, and frizzed little curls on her forehead, and sat in the cool piazza to be ready if Mr. Holland should call; for she confessed, in reckless, city-girls' phrase, that she was "dead in love with him." I began to think whether I ought to write to sister Ann; but remembering that I had heard Hattie say the same thing the year before of her music teacher, and then of her Italian teacher, I hoped this fancy would prove as evanescent as those. But I was particularly annoyed on the young clergyman's account. I was sure that there was gossip already abroad in the village about him, while such had been his indifference to the belles of the parish before we came that it had been the current belief among the people that he was under a vow of celibacy.

Tonie's beautiful work progressed beneath her skillful fingers. Lily after lily, in pure white embroidery, was wrought upon the fine linen. She could hardly be made to leave her needle when we called her out on the lawn to make up our game of croquet. Sometimes she brought her sewing out and sat with us in the piazza; but if Mr. Holland chanced to appear in the distance she fled away with her work-basket before he could get there, for the surplice was to be a profound secret till it was done.

One day she sat with us, with the whole white flowing robe in her lap, stitching at a seam, when Hattie sounded the alarm.

"Quick, quick, Tonie! He's coming round the corner!"

Tonie caught up the armful of snowy breadths and flew in-doors. She had no time to think of her work-basket, and the young man was even then at the gate, so Hattie drew it toward her on the bench, and began winding silk, as if it were her own, to divert suspicion.

Mr. Holland sat down by her, and as he talked of the weather and the mountains and the parish, his fingers strayed into the work-basket, as any idler's might, and drew from one of the silken pockets a strip of fine linen wrought with white lilies. Hattie uttered a little cry, and seized it from him, putting it in her pocket.

"Can you do such dainty needle-work as that, Miss Hattie?" he asked, in amused surprise.

"Of course I can, Sir!" she said, saucily. "Do you think there is any thing I can't do, even to embroidering a collar for auntie?"

"No, I don't believe there is any thing you can't do, you little wonder-worker!" he said, half seriously.

I pursed my lips as I sat, aunt-like, in the corner, watching the scene. "Now, when he gets that surplice," I thought to myself, "he'll remember the strip of lilies in the work-basket, and he will think Harriet Dimock worked every bit of it herself; I know he will!"

But as the whole thing was so very secret, and nothing could be said about it, I contented myself with walking up stairs and telling Tonie.

"Never mind, auntie! I don't do it for the praise of it," she said, flushing up a little; and then she added that she thought Hattie had done the best she could under the circumstances; and how vexatious it was that the work-basket had been left on the bench.

Meanwhile Hattie and Mr. Holland had strolled into the shady parlor where the piano stood, and presently she began to sing, and gay little morceaux from "Traviata" floated up to us on the summer breeze.

Hattie Dimock is a fascinating little thing, and that morning she was as pretty as a clove carnation, and as spicy. She is a true city girl—a creature reared for gas-light and ball-rooms and conservatories, standing on the verge of her belleship with glowing anticipations. She is not innocent and flower-like, like Tonie, but she is bright and keen as a diamond, in the glamour of her youth, and with, after all, a pretty good little heart beating under her fashionable bodice. She represented the world that summer to the young clergyman, and he was off his guard. He had kept himself aloof from it effectually thus far; but I suppose all people have to have their fight out with it sooner or later.

I knew just as well then as afterward what would happen. Tonie was the right girl for him, but I knew he would fall in love with Hattie.

The summer suns rose and set, and the great guardian mountains around us never relaxed their vigil. I never failed to spend at least two hours every day watching the mountain-tops and the clouds, even though the girls seemed to forget all about them.

One day the surplice was done. It was beautiful in its snowy whiteness and fineness, and the raised embroidery of lilies on its border was of the same snowy whiteness too; and upon each white button was a tiny white embroidered cross. It seemed, indeed, fitting raiment for one who ministered about holy things. That was Tonie's thought, I know, as she sat looking at it with solemn content, while Harriet raved over the perfectness of it.

It was carefully folded and laid in a box, and sent to the Rev. Ralph Holland on a Saturday evening, with the simple card, "From the ladies at the cottage." My nieces gracefully included me in the giving, though I had nothing to do with it; but I believe Hattie thought it looked more respectable.

Not for any thing would we have staid from church on Sunday. We all went; and sure enough the young priest appeared in his new surplice, more priest-like and dignified than ever. It was certainly much more becoming to him, if that was a proper subject of consideration, than his old one, which, as Hattie said, was undeniably too short.

He walked home with the girls from Sunday-school that afternoon, and staid to tea with us. He thanked us most gracefully for our remembrance of him, and said he had little thought, when he considered the lilies of the field, that he should ever be clothed with lilies himself.

"And I know whose little fingers made the lilies grow there," he added afterward, looking at Hattie; but she was absorbed in a search through the music-rack for an anthem, and did not hear him.

Tonie was more at liberty, now that her work was done, to join us in the parlor or at croquet; but the others had got used to doing without her, and they often strolled away in the twilight or the moonlight, leaving her shy and silent at my side. One evening they lingered late, and at last came with slow footsteps and low, murmuring voices that made me vaguely uneasy. Hattie followed me to my room that night, and sat down before me with bright, excited eyes and glowing cheeks. I was hardly surprised when she said, impressively,

"Oh, auntie, only think! he has proposed!"

"And you?"

"What could I do? Was this right, auntie? I asked for a few days' time before I answer him, and he granted it."

"Do you love him?"

"I don't know, auntie. Do you suppose I do? He looked so handsome to-night when we were walking under the trees. I felt as if I should like to go on walking so all my life, hearing him whisper nice things."

"Harriet Dimock!" I exclaimed; "what shall I do with you, you thoughtless girl? What will your mother say to such an abominable flirtation?"

"Poor mamma!" laughed Hattie; "she'll be in despair to have her eldest marry a poor young minister before she's even come out. But then he may be called to Grace Church some time, you know, auntie, or they may make him a bishop. I should like to be a bishop's wife."

For this wild air-castle I had no words.

"Besides," continued Hattie, more earnestly, "I suppose you think me nothing but a butterfly. But I am not at all sure that I want to give myself up to fashion and gayety all my days. Ralph is so good, if I marry him he will make me good too, and lead me to better things."

I looked at my stylish, handsome niece, more perplexed than before, remembering how often lives are influenced in the most unlooked-for ways. But I was troubled with doubts, and sat down to write, as soon as she left my room, a long letter to sister Ann at Saratoga.

For the next two or three days the Rev. Mr. Holland called often. Hattie received him with a dignified graciousness, still withholding her answer; while Tonie, informed of the state of affairs, kept aloof in by-ways and corners, busy as ever over her work-basket again, for she had taken some new Dorcas work in hand. Once Hattie, passing hastily, upset the basket, and gayly summoned Mr. Holland to help her gather up the scattered contents. He collected stray spools and silk-winders, and, reaching under the table, picked up a small white button bearing an embroidered cross. He looked at it with a flash of recognition.

"Tonie is a perfect little bee," said Hattie, noticing him. "Didn't you think she embroidered your surplice beautifully, Mr. Holland?"

"Was that Miss Tonie's work?" he inquired, surprised, hesitating. "I thought—I had a fancy—that it was yours."

"Mine!" laughed Hattie, frankly. "No, indeed! Tonie did every stitch of it. I don't know how to sew, can't even darn a stocking; mamma never brought me up to it."

And then she merrily told the story of how Tonie had run away with her work whenever he came, and of the afternoon when she left her basket in the piazza.

On the fourth day Ralph Holland invited Hattie to take a long drive with him through the lovely country around Leicester. It was growing dark when they returned, and Mr. Holland drove rapidly away when Hattie had alighted, without stopping for tea, as I expected him to. Hattie looked sober, and beckoned me up stairs with her. There she told me that she had come to a decision, and had declined the young man's proposal.

"It never would have done in the world, auntie," she said. "Why, don't you think, his mother lives in a little, old, tumble-down, brown house, and she was out under an apple-tree making soap! I begged him not to stop, so she didn't see us. Now, of course, I admire self-made men; but I couldn't undertake to live on eight hundred a year, and that is all he will get, even if Dr. Graves resigns and they give him a call to settle here. You know, just my clothes this last year have cost a thousand dollars. It never would do. Mamma would be furious at me, and quite right. But it is too bad, isn't it, auntie, when I like him so much? I never shall see any one I like so well again!" And Hattie sighed over her hard fortune.

To my relief the next morning's earliest train brought sister Ann from Saratoga. She had taken alarm at my letter, and came to look out for her daughter. Great was her relief when she found how the affair had terminated, but she declared she would not leave Hattie in Leicester any longer; and bidding her pack her trunks at once, made ready for departure, and in twenty-four hours Tonie and I found ourselves alone together.

It would have been too bad to shorten Tonie's season of recreation because of Hattie's misdeeds, so I determined to remain among the mountains till the middle of September, just as we had first planned. It was a long time before Mr. Holland came to our cottage again, but we heard on every hand that he was devoting himself to his parish duties with excessive energy. We saw him at church, of course, but not to exchange words; and when we met on the street he greeted us kindly, but never stopped. He knew that we knew his secret, and naturally it could not be pleasant to him.

At last one evening he called, and in a hurried, anxious manner told Tonie that one of her little Sunday scholars was dangerously ill, and that she kept begging that her teacher would come to see her. The sickness was not infectious, and the child's distress was so great that he had promised her parents to try and get Miss Tonie to come. I knew the child—a pretty, engaging little girl, very poor, but bright and affectionate. Tonie got ready hastily, and putting up a little basket of delicacies, started forth with Mr. Holland, who had waited to escort her. An hour later he returned without her, and told me that the child continuing very ill, my niece had determined to stay and watch with her during the night.

"You ought to see her there by that poor little bed," he said, warmly; "she is just like an angel of light in that house. You never saw any thing like the change she has wrought."

I begged him to call there again as he went back, and tell Tonie to come home the first thing in the morning, for I was afraid she would tire herself out.

"I will see to it myself," he said; "she shall come back very early."

And she did. She came back the next morning just as I was sitting down to breakfast, and Mr. Holland with her, so I made him stay for a cup of coffee. The child was better, and Tonie looked bright and glad in spite of the sleepless circles under her eyes. Mr. Holland appeared slightly nervous, yet pleased to be sitting there familiarly with us again. No allusion was made to Hattie or to his previous visits. In fact, by tacit consent, we all turned over a new leaf.

He came to see us frequently after that; we spent quiet hours together in the cool piazza; we took quiet walks together among the beautiful hills. Tonie brightened; for once in her life she had just the right setting to show her for the gem she really was. Her brooding eyes gained light; her lips learned pretty little tricks of smiling; she changed before my eyes from a shy nun to a very sweet little beauty indeed. You know the handfuls of May-flowers we get in the spring, fresh and pure, with forest fragrance and tinted loveliness. Tonie seemed to me just like a cluster of May-flowers.

September began to slip away from us. There came a time when we must set our day for leaving Leicester. The evening before that day Mr. Holland spent with us; we were none of us very talkative; but when at last Tonie went up stairs to collect some books he had lent her, the young clergyman crossed the room to my side and said, abruptly,

"I made a blunder once: ought that to stand in the way of my happiness for all time to come?"

I smiled upon him encouragingly.

"In my view it ought not," I said; "but I am not good at abstruse questions. Here comes Tonie; ask her."

And as Tonie entered with the books I slipped out.

It is December now. Yesterday, while on one of my shopping excursions, I found in an antiquarian bookstore a medieval missal, richly illuminated, and heavy with its carved covers. I will lay it among Tonie's wedding gifts—it will be such a delight to her little ecclesiastical heart.

She is to be married next week; the hands that worked the lilies are to strew flowers for a lifetime in the young clergyman's pathway.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

A FEW weeks ago printed notices were scattered through Paris announcing that citizens of all classes might see the apartments lately occupied by the ex Emperor and Empress on payment of a few francs; but that if they desired to purchase tickets for the concert, "whereby these saloons might be at length rendered useful to the people," they should be permitted to enjoy the extra show gratis. The opportunity was not disregarded. Every class of Parisian society was represented in the throng that surged through the apartments, from which most of the decorations and many of the necessary appendages had been removed or torn away by ruthless hands. The velvet-covered seats were occupied by the motley crowd, and portraits which yet hung upon the walls were covered with red cloth. Curious eyes peered into secret places, querying concerning the customs of the banished imperial family. And when the concert commenced the frivolous Parisians laughed and applauded with their usual gayety. Alas, poor Paris! and pity mingles with our instinctive indignation against the mad Parisians. The Tuileries lies in ruins, the Louvre is at least partially destroyed, and other noted buildings have been injured—to what extent we scarcely know at this writing—by the crazy populace. The glory of Paris has departed.

A noticeable improvement at Saratoga this season is the new and commodious dépôt. The baggage-room connected with it is extensive enough to accommodate any number of "Saratoga trunks."

A paper was presented to the French Academy of Medicine some months ago by Dr. Revillout, in which he stated that in his experience he had found lemon juice one of the most efficacious medicines which can be applied to diphtheria. The throat should be freely gargled with the juice, and a little swallowed occasionally to act on the more deep-seated portions of the membranous formation.

A handsome and resolute American girl who happened to be in Paris when Rossini died desired to attend his funeral. Notwithstanding the efforts of her brother, the proper arrangements were not consummated; no ticket of admission could be purchased at any price. But she proved equal to the emergency. She dressed herself becomingly, and early in the morning repaired to the church where the services were to be held, and secured a seat. After hours had passed the authorities desired to clear the edifice to make room for the legitimate mourners and audience. But all efforts to make the young lady comprehend what was wished were vain. A gendarme was called in, but the choicest Parisian at his command was useless. Nor could she understand his emphatic gestures. Finally politeness conquered duty; the authorities left the lady in possession of her seat, and she heard the grand music.

It is said that the Empress Eugénie has become very nervous and discontented with her surroundings at Chiselhurst. The exiled imperial family live in perfect seclusion, and the household arrangements are modest and economical. Yet the financial resources of Napoleon must be ample for the future needs of his family.

Charles Dickens was a charming letter-writer, as letters which are from time to time made public assure us more and more fully. In a letter to Professor Felton he tells, in his peculiar style, the following story of "Dando:"

"Perhaps you don't know who Dando was. He was an oyster-eater, my dear Felton. He used to go into oyster-shops, without a farthing of money, and stand at the counter eating natives until the man who opened them grew pale, cast down his knife, staggered backward, struck his white forehead with his open hand, and cried, 'You are Dando!' He has been known to eat twenty dozen at one sitting, and would have eaten forty if the truth had not flashed upon the shop-keeper. For these offenses he was constantly committed to the house of correction. During his last imprisonment he was taken ill, got worse and worse, and at last began knocking violent double-knocks at death's door. The doctor stood beside his bed, with his fingers on his pulse. 'He is going,' says the doctor. 'I see it in his eye. There is only one thing that would keep life in him for another hour, and that is—oysters.' They were immediately brought. Dando swallowed eight, and feebly took a ninth. He held it in his mouth and looked round the bed strangely. 'Not a bad one, is it?' says the doctor. The patient shook his head, rubbed his trembling hand upon his stomach, bolted the oyster, and fell back dead. They buried him in the prison yard, and paved his grave with oyster-shells."

An English gentleman, while driving through the Central Park one fine May afternoon, declared that he had visited all the fashionable parks and pleasure-grounds of the world, but that he had seen nothing equal to the New York Central Park for variety of charms. Other parks may possess some special excellence which makes them noted; but the harmonious and beautiful variety in ours contents our citizens, and makes them proud of it.

Here is something for women to reflect upon: "Why do you oppose the giving of the ballot to women?" asked a lady the other evening of a confirmed bachelor.

"Excuse me, madam," replied he, "but I have not sufficient confidence in their capacity to conduct government affairs."

"What evidence of their mental inferiority to mankind can you adduce?" queried the lady.

"A simple fact is enough to satisfy my mind, and that is the frightful way in which they put up their back hair."

During the months spent by Professor Huntington and his party on Mount Washington, about thirty-five different persons visited the summit, several of them being so much entertained by the excursion as to make a second visit. Two Dartmouth students, who were led by their love of adventure and the pursuit of science to investigate these upper regions in term time, without obtaining permission to absent themselves from college, were "rusticated" on their return—which must have put a damper upon their fondness for scientific study.

Although the history of the old Louvre is somewhat obscure, it is believed to have been commenced by Philip Augustus in the thirteenth century. The tower of the Louvre was used as a state-prison at that time. But Francis I. rebuilt it, commencing in reality the Louvre of the present age. Improvements were made by Henry II. and Louis XIV., and later by Napoleon Bonaparte and Louis Napoleon. It has been considered as superior in artistic design and execution to any other building in Paris. Its famous colonnade, known as the Colonnade du Louvre, and built by Louis XIV., was considered one of the masterpieces of the age. It consisted of twenty-eight double Corinthian columns, the façade being 525 feet in length. The idea of connecting the Tuileries with the old Louvre by the new Louvre originated with the first Napoleon; but political events prevented him from accomplishing this, and it was left for his nephew to carry out his design. The entire palace, with the Tuileries, covered about sixty acres of ground. The library of the Louvre, which was formerly the private library of Louis Philippe, comprised nearly 90,000 volumes. The museum of the Louvre has long been celebrated for its exceeding rare and valuable collection of paintings, sculptures, and antiquities of various kinds. Its painting gallery has been esteemed the finest in the world, considering both the quality and the number of rare masterpieces there collected.

The inauguration of the Mont Cenis Tunnel is announced to take place in July.

A rumor exists in London that the Royal Mint is soon to be transferred to the Thames Embankment. This is objected to by the press and the people on the ground that although it is a great and important institution of state, it is none the less a huge factory, and its chimneys send forth unpleasant and unwholesome exhalations, quite out of place on the beautiful river-side promenade. We do not know whether the objections of Londoners will avail any more than numerous similar objections which for years past have been made by citizens of New York concerning nuisances.

The palace of the Tuileries was commenced in 1564 by Catherine de Medicis. It has been the scene of many a riotous demonstration during the revolutions of Paris. More than one sovereign has been forcibly ejected from it. It was the official residence of the First Consul. After the Restoration Charles X. and the royal family lived there. In 1830 the mob entered and drove out the king. It was the residence of Louis Philippe until the revolution of 1848. In 1849 it was occupied as a gallery for the exhibition of paintings; after that time, until the flight of the Empress Eugénie, it was the city residence of the imperial family. Many of its apartments were very magnificent.

Chili has been visited with two earthquakes more violent than any which have been experienced there for twenty years. Fortunately there was no loss of life, but many accidents occurred, and buildings were thrown down and otherwise damaged. In Valparaiso the streets were instantly filled with terror-stricken people, who were in such a state of excitement that the utmost confusion prevailed, and every one seemed to have lost his presence of mind.

The style of observing frequent anniversaries of weddings, as a sort of "gift enterprise," is, happily, less fashionable than it was a few years ago. Such occasions are always pleasant to be remembered in the family circle; and when they come to be the fiftieth or seventy-fifth anniversary, some more extensive recognition of them is agreeable and appropriate. But when it is deemed necessary to invite all friends and acquaintances to a special visit every fifth year, the whole matter degenerates into a mere begging contrivance, which is repulsive to sensitive and delicate-minded persons. What wonder that it is repulsive, when the custom becomes reduced to such a programme as the following? We mistake in saying reduced—swollen would be the appropriate term. First anniversary, iron; fifth anniversary, wooden; tenth anniversary, tin; fifteenth anniversary, crystal; twentieth anniversary, china; twenty-fifth anniversary, silver; thirtieth anniversary, cotton; thirty-fifth anniversary, linen; fortieth anniversary, woolen; forty-fifth anniversary, silk; fiftieth anniversary, golden; seventy-fifth anniversary, diamond. Moreover, this list can not be quite complete, for a "paper wedding" comes in somewhere, and we think we have heard of still other kinds not mentioned.

A writer in Home and Health, in speaking of the emergencies which often arise in the family, calling for household help from the husband, says:

"I can not tell why it should be any more degrading, even for a man of culture, to make fires, sweep the parlor carpet, do the washing or cooking, or even wash dishes, than it is for his cultured wife to do the same things; nor why it is not just as honorable for him to help her thus about any work for which his nerve and muscle is more adequate as it is for her to indite his letters and attend to his business in his absence or illness, or to read Latin and Greek to him if his eyes should fail him in time of need. The acme of attainment in this direction is that when all men and women are allowed to follow the pursuits for which they find themselves best adapted, those shall be considered the most accomplished lords and ladies of creation who shall be able most readily to adapt themselves to the circumstances in which they may be placed, and do what is needed."

Chinamen in Sacramento are selling their long queues for three dollars apiece. Sacred as is this appendage, money is valued more by them. The tails are to be made into chignons, or something of the kind, in which form they will be better appreciated by Americans.

USEFUL RECIPES.

BROILED PORK-STEAK.—The tenderloin is by far the nicest part, but any lean, white meat is very good. Split the steak, so as to allow its cooking through without burning or drying, and broil it slowly. When ready to turn over dip it into a gravy of hot water, butter, pepper, and salt, which should be kept hot on a dish; after this baste and turn it frequently. It takes about twenty minutes to broil a good-sized piece thoroughly. If it is not convenient to cook it on a gridiron, baking it in a dripping-pan and basting it often is almost as good.

CHICKEN SALAD.—The chickens should be well fatted ones of a medium size (not overgrown), and the flesh delicate and white. Cook them in the morning, using the water they were boiled in for soup, omitting all seasoning until the fowls have been taken out. When entirely cold, cut in pieces the size you wish (having previously removed the skin), and place in a cool, dry cellar until wanted. If the meat inclines to dry, throw over it a clean cloth slightly dampened in cold water. Having selected the finest, whitest heads of celery, cut it the size desired. The best "fancy cooks" do not mince it, but have both the celery and chicken in pieces about an inch long and half as thick. When ready, put the celery between clean, sweet cloths to make it perfectly dry, and then prepare your dressing as follows: To a pair of chickens allow three-quarters of a bottle of the freshest, sweetest salad-oil you can find, two scant table-spoonfuls of the best Durham mustard, the yolks of two raw eggs, and of ten or twelve hard-boiled ones. To prepare the hard-boiled eggs put them in a saucepan of cold water over a hot fire, and let them boil as hard as they can for ten minutes; longer will not hurt them; cool them by plunging into cold water, and remove the shells. Break the raw eggs, dropping the yolks into a large dish, and stir the same way for about ten minutes; then slowly add the mustard; mix it in well; then add a tea-spoonful of the best vinegar, and when this is incorporated, add the oil a drop at a time, stirring it all the while, and always the same way. Into the hard-boiled yolks, which have been well smoothed and mashed, mix lightly about a tea-cupful of vinegar, and pour slowly into the first preparation, mixing as lightly as possible with a fork. Season the chicken and celery with salt and pepper to taste, and pour on the dressing. It should not be allowed to stand long after mixing. In cold weather, if set where it is too cold, the ingredients of the mixture will separate and ruin it. Chickens or turkeys fattened on mush-and-milk, and kept in a dark and not too cold place while fattening, make the nicest, whitest meat imaginable.

RICE MERINGUE.—One cupful of carefully sorted rice, boiled in water until it is soft; when done, drain it so as to remove all the water; cool it, and add one quart of new milk, the well-beaten yolks of three eggs, three table-spoonfuls of white sugar, and a little nutmeg; pour into a baking-dish, and bake about half an hour. Let it get cold; beat the whites of the eggs, add two table-spoonfuls of sugar, flavor with lemon or vanilla, drop or spread it over the pudding, and slightly brown it in the oven.

DELICIOUS PUDDING.—Bake sponge-cake batter in a flat, square pan so that it will be about an inch in thickness when done. Let it cool, and cut it in pieces about three inches square. Slice and butter it, and lay the pieces back as they were before you split them. Make a custard with four eggs and a quart of new milk, flavor and sweeten to taste; it is very nice if you use almond flavor in the cake and lemon or vanilla in the custard. Lay the slices in a baking-dish so that when the custard is poured over them it will be nearly full. Bake half an hour.

PUFF OMELET.—Beat well the whites of three and the yolks of six eggs until they are light. Mix together a tea-cupful of new milk or cream, a table-spoonful of flour, salt and pepper to taste; pour this on the yolks and whites that have been beaten together. In a pan melt a piece of butter; when it is hot, pour in the mixture and set the pan in a hot oven; when it seems to thicken up, pour on the three whites saved out, and which have been beaten light; return it to the oven and let it brown. Slip it out on a dish so that the top part may remain up.

A very nice way of boiling eggs is to put them in a saucepan of cold water, place it on a hot part of the stove, and take them out when the water boils. It is said they are more delicate this way than when put right into boiling water. If they are not sufficiently cooked by the time the water boils, they can be left in a minute or so longer.

Ladies' Summer Hats and Bonnets, Figs. 1–14.

Figs. 8 and 6.—ITALIAN STRAW HAT. The trimming of this hat consists of black lace, bows, loops and ends of black velvet ribbon, a black ostrich feather, and a tuft of white azaleas, with long hanging grasses, at the right side of the hat. Fig. 6, on page 372, shows the hat without the trimming.

Figs. 9 and 2.—NEAPOLITAN BONNET. The trimming of this bonnet, which is of light gray Neapolitan braid, consists of black lace, black ostrich feathers, and a dark red rose. Ribbons of dark gray gros grain, trimmed with pipings of light gray gros grain and black lace, as shown by the illustration. For this may be substituted narrower ribbons without trimming, which are sewed on the bonnet and tied in a bow at the back under the chignon. Fig. 2, page 372, shows the bonnet without trimming.

Figs. 10 and 1.—TULLE AND LACE HAT. This hat of black lace is trimmed with gathered black lace, black gros grain ribbon, black ostrich feathers, and a dark red flower with long drooping sprays. For the frame cut of a double layer of black stiff lace from Figs. 27–30, Supplement, each one piece. Sew up the pleats indicated on Fig. 28, join all parts according to the corresponding figures, sew covered wire to the frame as shown by the illustration, and as indicated on the pattern, and bind the frame all around with black gros grain, at the same time fastening a piece of covered wire. Finally, cover the hat with black figured tulle, line it, and trim as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 12.—ENGLISH STRAW BONNET WITH REVE [See Fig. 3, Page 372.]

Figs. 11 and 5.—CRAPE BONNET. This bonnet is of light brown crape, and is trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with lace, brown gros grain ribbon, and brown flowers and leaves. Brown gros grain strings. For the frame cut of a double layer of stiff lace from Figs. 24–26, Supplement, each one piece, sew a piece of covered wire to each piece along the outer edge and along the dotted line given, join the parts according to the corresponding figures, and bind the bonnet all around with gros grain two-fifths of an inch wide. Finally, cover the frame smoothly with a three or four fold layer of crape, and sew on the puffs of plain crape and the trimming. Fig. 5, page 372, shows a straw bonnet of the shape of the bonnet shown by Fig. 11.

Figs. 12 and 3.—ENGLISH STRAW BONNET. WITH REVERS. This bonnet is of white English straw. The revers are bound with narrow black velvet. The trimming for the bonnet consists of black lace, black velvet ribbon, and grape leaves with grapes. Black velvet strings. Fig. 3, page 372, shows the latter untrimmed.

Figs. 13 and 4.—CRAPE AND LACE BONNET. This bonnet of violet crape is trimmed with violet lace, velvet, and gros grain ribbon. For the frame cut of white stiff lace one piece from Fig. 31, Supplement, sew up the pleats in this piece, edge it with covered wire, and bind it with violet gros grain. Cover the frame smoothly with a threefold layer of violet crape, and then with puffs of crape, as shown by the illustration. At the front edge of the bonnet sew a row of violet lace turned upward, and two rows turned downward, as shown by the illustration, and cover the seams made by doing this with a bias strip of violet velvet a little Walking or Traveling Suit (Dress with Mantelet).

See Illustration on page 377.

THIS traveling suit consists of a dress and mantelet. Box-pleated ruffles and piping form the trimming. To make the mantelet, cut of the material and lining from Figs. 32, 33, and 35, Supplement, each two pieces, and from Fig. 34 one piece, having previously joined the piece turned down in Supplement on Fig. 32. After running the material and lining together, join the pieces, Figs. 32–35, according to the corresponding figures, and cut a slit at the middle of the back along the double line on Fig. 34. Face the outer edge of the mantelet and the slit with a strip of silk an inch and three-quarters wide, and trim it with ruffles and piping as shown by the illustration. Sew the back on Fig. 33 from 3 to ● along the straight line given; and to the under side of Fig. 34, at the end of the waist, set a belt, which is closed under the front. Finally, sew hooks and eyes to the corners indicated by * on Fig. 35. In adjusting the mantelet, the fronts are crossed at the middle of the front, and the basque part is closed at the middle of the back under the back. The first illustration shows the mantelet made of ladies' cloth, and the second of the material of the dress.

THE POPULAR NAMES OF PLANTS.

THIS subject is one of much interest, as it throws a great deal of light upon ethnology, philology, the manners and customs of our ancestors, and similar matters relating to the history of our race.

Many of the popular names of plants are derived from the doctrine of signatures, or signs and significances applied to the plant, or to some part of it, which betokened, as our forefathers believed, the uses to which the Creator intended it should be applied. According to this doctrine, the Lungwort (Pulmonaria officinalis) must be a specific for tuberculous lungs, because its spotted leaves were supposed to resemble lungs thus diseased; the seeds of the Gromwell (Lithospermum officinale) must be good for the gravel, because they are hard and stony; the roots of Scrophularia for scrofulous glands, because its knotty and tuberous roots resemble certain forms of scrofula; and so with numerous other plants. An old writer, speaking of the Garlic, says: "The seed of the garlic is black; it darkens the eyes with blackness and obscurity. This is to be understood of healthy eyes. But those which are dull, through vicious humidity, from these garlic drives that viciousness away. The tunic of garlic is ruddy; it expels blood. It has a hollow stock; and it helps affections of the windpipe." In this extract we not only have a recognition of the doctrine of signatures, but also of Hahnemann's doctrine of "similia similibus," etc., in the contrary effects produced by the garlic upon healthy and diseased eyes.

In the English name of Bed-straw, given to the Galium verum of the botanists, we have an allusion to one of the domestic economies of the olden time, when its soft, puffy, floculent stems were used as bedding, even by the upper classes; and from this use came the expression, "in the straw," as applied to ladies in their confinement.

The name Belladonna, or Fair Lady, is applied to the Deadly Nightshade, or Atropa belladonna of the botanists, because its berries were used by the Italian ladies as a cosmetic—a use to which, if report be true, it is still put in the form of extract of belladonna, taken to give brilliancy to the eye and enlargement of the pupil.

The name of Forget-me-not, as applied to the pretty blue Myosotis, is of modern application, having been given to the plant since the beginning of the present century. Formerly it was applied to the Ajuga chamæpitys, or Ground-Pine of the English, on account of the nauseous taste of the plant, which it is hard to get rid of after tasting it. In this sense it was also applied by the French and the Netherlanders; but the Danes applied the name to the Veronica chamædrys, referring to the blossoms falling off easily.

The names Maiden-hair and Maid's-hair have been applied to three different plants; the first to a species of Fern, on account of its fine, hair-like stems; and also by the Dutch to the Bog Asphodel (Narthecium ossifragum), because it was said to be used by young girls to give their hair a golden tint; maid's-hair was applied to the Galium verum, or bed-straw, because its soft, yellow stems resembled the hair of maidens "made yellowe with lye," a fashion still in vogue among us.

Meadow-sweet, applied to the Spirea ulmaria of our gardens, is a corruption from Mead-wort, the flowers of the plant having been used to mix with mead to give it the flavor of certain wines; it was also, in like manner, used to give flavor to beer and other drinks.

The Nettle derives its name from net, a form of the Indo-European verb ne, to spin or sew; our word needle being derived from the same source. In former times the fibres of the nettle were used by the Germanic and Scandinavian nations to make thread and twine, but it has been since superseded by flax and hemp, whose names import that they were introduced among the northern nations from the south. It is a curious fact that the now much talked of Ramé grass, a fibre plant, is allied to the nettle family, and is a native of Northern India.

The name Primrose, as applied to the Primula auricula of the botanists, was not originally applied to that plant, but to the Daisy (Bellis perennis). Formerly it was written pryme rolles, or primerole, because "it beareth the first flouer in pryme tyme." The word primerole is an abbreviation of the French primeverole, and this comes from the Italian primaverola, a diminutive of primavera; hence fiore di primavera, or the first flower of spring. This being a foreign word, it was soon transformed into prime rolles, and again into primrose, although neither the Primula nor the Bellis has the remotest similarity to the rose.

The name Snowdrop, as applied to the pretty Galanthus nivalis, has not reference, as is generally understood, to its resemblance to a flake of snow, or to its piercing the snow in the early spring season, but to the large pendants or drops worn as ear-rings or hangings to brooches by the ladies of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

The name Gillyflower, formerly spelled gilofre and gyllofer, is a curious example of the changes a word undergoes in being transferred from one language to another. Originally it was, in Latin, caryophyllum, a word compounded from two Greek words, karyon, a nut, and phyllon, a leaf, in allusion, no doubt, to the nutmeg odor of the flowers. From caryophyllum it became, in Italian, garofano, from thence, into French, giroflée, and finally, in English, through gilofre and gyllofer into our modern gillyflower. This name was originally given to the Carnation, which was called Clove Gillyflower; it was afterward applied to the Wall-flower, as the Wall Gillyflower; and lastly to the Stock, as the Stock Gillyflower; the word stock being prefixed to distinguish it from the Clove Gillyflower, because the stem and branches resembled the stock or stem of a tree or shrub. In connection with this the name carnation has no reference or derivation from the Latin carnis, as relating to its color, but is a misspelling of coronation, the flowers being formerly used in making coronæ, or chaplets.

The name Yarrow, as applied to the Achillea, is another instance of similar transformation; it comes from two Greek words, hiera-botane, signifying holy herb. In the northern languages hi is replaced by y or j, the latter in German having the sound of the former; hence hiera becomes jera, and, to express our English-Germanic pronunciation, yarrow, in the same way as Hieronymus becomes Jerome.

Bleeding-heart and Heart's-ease were names applied in former times to the Wall-flower, and not, as now, to the Dielytra and the Pansy; these names were given to the Wall-flower on account of its being used as a medicine "for the passions of the heart." It was also called the Bloody Warrior, on account of its petals being tinged with crimson.

The Blessed Thistle (Carduus marianus) is so called from an ancient legend that its virtues, medicinally, were owing to the milk of the Virgin Mary having fallen upon its leaves when nursing the infant Jesus.

The Pansy, or Paunce, is supposed to derive its name from the French pensee, thought, from its habit of hanging its head and half hiding its face. But, aside from this, the flower has always had an amatory significance, for what reason we can not divine, and from this significance has received a great number of quaint names, such as "Kiss me at the garden gate;" "Jump up and kiss me;" "Kiss me ere I rise;" "Cull me," an abbreviation of "Cuddle me to you;" "Live in idleness;" "Love in idleness," an abbreviation of the line of an old song, "To live and love in idleness," and this, perhaps, from "love in idle," which, in its old literal sense, meant "in vain"—"love in idle pances," or in "vain thoughts;" "Tittle my fancy;" "Pink of my John;" and numerous others. It was called "Herb Trinity," and "Three faces under a hood," because of its three colors combined in one flower; also "Flamy," or "Flame-flower," on account of its color; and, by some confusion of names, "Heart's-ease," a name properly belonging to the Wall-flower.

In going through the whole list of the popular names of plants we find that they all have their derivation or significance from similar sources to those above indicated; but, unfortunately, the names are so often indiscriminately applied that it is difficult to readily ascertain the plant intended. For instance, the name "Wandering Jew" is applied to four or five different and distinct plants, and it is for this reason that, where precision of nomenclature is desired, we have to fall back upon the, to many uncouth, names given by the botanists.

Generally speaking, our American names are the same as the English; some are derived from the Indian names, and others have direct reference to the medical, useful, or other qualities of the plants.

SIGISMUND THALBERG.

TOWARD the close of the fourth decade of the present century there was well known in Venice one of those large and ancient palaces on the Canal Grande, close to the Piazetta—the Palazzo Wetzlar, the proprietress of which was not only popular in Venice, but, through her family relations, enjoyed a European, almost a world-wide, celebrity. At that period the Baroness Wetzlar was already a matron of commanding figure—not very tall, and rather corpulent—with finely cut features, a Maria Theresa head, and presenting, on the whole, a most imposing appearance. Her dark hair was sprinkled with gray, and always very plainly arranged under a lace cap, which fringed her smooth, marble-like brow. Her large eyes revealed in their depth a world of intellect and enthusiastic fire; but in their tender melancholy could be read the traces of long and patient suffering. Her majestic form was always dressed in black satin or velvet, closely fitting the outlines of her handsome figure, and tightly banding her white neck. No other colors, no other stuffs, and no more freedom in style, had she admitted for many years. She might be said to have been always in mourning.

There were two curious things about this remarkable lady—two rings: one, with a large and brilliant diamond setting, worn upon the thumb of her left hand; the other, a small, thin, plain circlet of gold, which seemed to have almost grown into the flesh of the tip of the little finger of the same hand. The woman we have thus minutely described had a son, who was the early rival of Franz Liszt—who, next to him, was the greatest pianist and most celebrated virtuoso of his time: she was the mother of Sigismund Thalberg. The Baroness Wetzlar made no secret of her illegitimate happiness; she was proud of her celebrated son. In the church register in which the birth of Thalberg is recorded her name appears as that of his mother, that of Count Dietrichstein as his father. Some have said that Thalberg was of ignoble blood; that he sprang from a washer-woman; that even in her mind there were doubts of his paternity. Not so; he was of patrician origin. Family relations—matters of little interest at this time to the public, and which should not be exposed—had prevented the legitimate union of the two persons whose high talents and devoted love seemed to specially adapt them to each other—the mother and father of Thalberg.

On the 7th of January, 1812, the Baroness Wetzlar gave birth to a son, who, at the baptismal font, received the name of Sigismund. He was not allowed to bear the name and coat of arms of his father, but his parents gave to him the name of Thalberg. The etymology of this name is indicative of truly maternal tenderness.

"Let this child be a peaceful valley (thal), where I may henceforth conceal my holy, still, and home-like happiness; but let it also be a mountain (berg), upon which my pride and my greatest love shall be high enthroned, which in its greatness may surpass all the vain spirit of caste prejudice which now intervenes between him and me."

Such were the words which the Baroness spoke to the father of her child when she gave to the latter the name of Thalberg.

The faithful mother kept her word, and Providence sustained her in her noble maternal mission. Her son's talents became evident at an early day; and how great was the triumph of the fond mother when she discovered his wonderful musical genius! Now, at length, peace, happiness, and pride returned to her heart. The poor child, scion of two old and glorious aristocratic families, was doomed to walk through the world without a name; but fortune held in store for him ample compensation in the proud title he was destined to obtain in that struggle which was to cover his head with glory. Instead of the coronet of his ancestors, which was not to crown his head, Apollo wreathed his brow with ever-blooming laurels—a happy exchange.

As the Baroness at first had only lived for the education and development of her child, so she lived afterward only in her pride in his glory. She was a finished musician—an especially accomplished pianiste. She played from memory all the compositions of her son. A high étagère beside her piano contained all his works, arranged in the order of their publication, and above them appeared a splendid wreath of green enamel surrounding a marble bust of him.

This salon, the treasure-house of the evidences of her love, was her favorite abode. Here she received the whole aristocratic world of Venice, which, from the Viceroy down, was always only too glad to pay its homage to her. All eminent foreigners who came to Venice sought to obtain an introduction at the Palazzo Wetzlar; and a constant flood of artistic celebrities was sent to the Baroness by her eminent son, with cordial letters from him. In this manner the salon Wetzlar acquired an almost European celebrity; and there was but one other—that of Emile de Girardin, in Paris—which, so far as cosmopolitan interests were concerned, was superior to the receptions of the Baroness Wetzlar.

The romance of the whole life of this loyal mother was embodied in those two rings before referred to. The manner in which she wore them was striking, for it is certainly unusual to see upon a delicate female hand a ring on the tip of the little finger and another on the thumb. The smaller of those two rings was symbolical of the first chapter of her secret love-romance. The Count, in the first happiness of their love, had placed it upon the slender finger of her whom he loved so well. It may be unpoetical to say that the fair Baroness increased in the amplitude of her physical proportions, as well as in amiability and mind, with the advance of years; but it is true, nevertheless. The little ring soon became too small for the finger upon which it was first worn; but the lady was averse to parting with this souvenir of her youthful joy, and so it advanced gradually to the tip of the little finger, the last point of the hand upon which it could be placed, and there she carried it with her to the grave.

The large ring with the diamond setting, upon her thumb, bore witness to the satisfied pride of her tireless and solicitous maternal love. It was to her the token that her highest happiness had been accomplished, the dearest wish of her heart realized—that her beloved son had achieved a great and celebrated name. When Thalberg played for the first time in public the talented youth received this precious token as an especial encouragement from the Empress of Austria. The grateful son, his face radiant with joy, brought to his happy and proud mother this proof of his first triumph; but the large ring fitted only the thumb of the delicate lady's hand. "There it shall remain all my life long," exclaimed the Baroness, smiling through her tears; and her reverence for this first imperial present made to her "poor nameless son" prompted her to resist all persuasion to have the ring made smaller, that it might fit another finger.

And thus the Baroness Wetzlar to the last day of her life wore on her hand those two rings, her sweetest remembrancers of her first love and her first maternal pride. How rich a harvest still remained for the latter to reap is well known.

Thalberg, in his time, next to Liszt, was the most popular virtuoso, and his compositions were the favorite pieces of all pianists, and upon all concert programmes. He was the first composer who made fashionable the fantasies which, for so long a time, predominated in the realm of salon and concert music. There was scarce any modern opera from which Thalberg did not compile a pleasant pot-pourri of the most favorite airs, combining them with effective variations, and a brilliant ensemble. The same elegance and brilliancy which were peculiar to Thalberg's compositions were also peculiar to his style of performing, his manners, and his whole appearance. He had a genuine Dietrichstein face, with a proud aquiline nose, a finely moulded chin, and gentle but, withal, haughty eyes. His form was elegant and symmetrical in the highest degree; his small feet and small, well-kept hands completed a thoroughly aristocratic ensemble. He wore small blonde whiskers, which charmingly framed his fine oval face, and were in perfect keeping with his always careful toilette and gentlemanly manners.

Thalberg's mode of performance upon the piano was a specialty with himself, an exception to all rules, exactly as his whole life and position were. He was an exceedingly amiable man, not only in conversation, but in mode of thought and in his action toward others. This gentleness exemplified itself even in his style of play. One of the most remarkable traits of his character was his equanimity and truly aristocratic nonchalance. The following episode in his life illustrates admirably some of his peculiar characteristics.

The Countess Esterhazy, a great lover of music, and in whose salon the aristocratic world of Vienna always enjoyed the most charming performances of the best virtuosi, had requested Thalberg to get up for her an especially interesting programme for a soirée. On the morning of the appointed day I happened to pay a visit to Thalberg, who was stretching himself lazily in his bed. All at once he exclaimed:

"Sac à papier! To-night the soirée at Esterhazy's will take place; and I am afraid the others, like myself, have forgotten their promises."

"What promises? and what others?" I asked.

"Oh, I promised the Countess Esterhazy something particularly attractive for to-night's soirée—a programme of compositions that had never been heard before, and which were to be written expressly for her concert. Now I had told her I would write for this occasion a fantaisie on the 'Prophet,' and forgot all about it. I apprehend Donizetti and Servais have been equally forgetful of their promises. I am exceedingly sorry, for it—"

"Oh," I said, "you can easily remedy the evil. Order your carriage and drive to both of them."

"I have no time, you see; I must compose my 'Prophet' fantaisie. But you—you have nothing to do, and you can help me. Allons, my friend, drive quickly to those two fellows, whom I know to be late risers, and whom, I am sure, you will find in bed yet. Urge Servais to write at once something for to-night; then gallop to Donizetti, and do not leave him until he gives you the manuscript of the song he has promised to compose. Take that song to Mlle. Lutzer, who promised me to sing it to-night; in short, arrange every thing as well as you can, and then come back. By that time I shall have finished my 'Prophet' fantaisie, and then we will take a ride through the Prater."

A few minutes afterward I was at Servais's hotel. Thalberg's prediction proved only too true. Servais, who was then at the zenith of his glory, and who charmed the whole world with the magic notes he drew from his violoncello, was still in bed. After hearing the message I had been instructed to convey to him the celebrated virtuoso burst into loud laughter and exclaimed:

"Scélérat de Thalberg! he thinks that every body is as lazy as he is himself. See here, my friend."

So saying, he took from his knees several sheets of music-paper, upon which he had scrawled with his lead-pencil. "I have been at work for the past two hours—it is true in my warm little nest, where I like best to write—and I have just finished my composition. Allons! let us try it right away."

At the next moment the tall, muscular form of the great artist stood before me in the most primitive négligé. He seized his instrument and drove me to the piano. The scene was ludicrous in the extreme. What would the ladies, who especially adored the great Servais, have said if they had beheld him whose careful way of dressing was truly remarkable in his present condition—with hardly any thing on his body, his long brown hair hanging disheveled round his head, his mustache and goatee in any thing but good order, a cigar in his mouth, and the violoncello between his bare legs! And in this situation he played with the fervor of a true maestro his new composition, which was one of the best he had ever written, and which afterward became so celebrated under the name "La Romanesca." How often his bow touched my back in order to make me keep better time, so that I might not disturb the flow of his enthusiasm, I do not know. But, under the circumstances, it was no wonder that I did not accompany him very well; for, with all my admiration for his beautiful composition, I could not help laughing at his singular appearance.

At last the strange concert was over, and I hastened to Donizetti. He was also yet in his bed, which he hardly ever left before noon if he had not to go to a rehearsal. His bed was surrounded by half a dozen gentlemen, mostly members of the Italian opera, who smoked cigars and filled the room with so much smoke that I could hardly see any thing in it.

I had been acquainted with him before, and he introduced me to the gentlemen with a playful remark; but his good-humor disappeared as soon as I informed him of the mission on which I had come to him.

"Corpo di Bacco!" he exclaimed. "I have forgotten all about to-night's concert. Thalberg might have reminded me of it before; but then—it makes no difference."

With these words Donizetti jumped out of his bed, wrapped himself in his dressing-gown, and went to a table which was covered with manuscripts of poems which the authors had sent to him with the request to set them to music. Finally he seemed to have found what he had been looking for. He glanced over the sheet of paper and exclaimed: "This will do; it is 'L'Addio.' Wait a few moments, my friend. It will not last long."

And now Donizetti went to his desk, and while six men, loquacious Italians at that, were singing, talking, and laughing in the same room, and making a truly dreadful noise, the great maestro quietly composed his song, adding now and then a remark to the conversation and answering questions. Fifteen minutes afterward he handed me the composition, and said:

"Take that to Mlle. Lutzer. I shall call on her this afternoon and rehearse it with her, and to-night I shall accompany her myself on the piano."

Such was the origin of one of the most delightful and celebrated airs which Donizetti ever wrote. The poor composer was in the habit of working under such trying circumstances, and there is but little doubt that this habit, in conjunction with his somewhat dissolute life, brought on that mental disease which cut short his brilliant and promising career.

When I returned to Thalberg, the third composition, whose glory dates from that day, was nearly completed; and his "Prophet" fantaisie, which he had written in less than two hours, was for a long time a favorite piece on all concert programmes.

In 1857 Thalberg made a tour through the United States, where he was received with warm applause, and, as a critic says, made us wonder whether he had not touched the utmost possibility of the piano.

After his mother's death he retired from public life. He married a daughter of Lablache, the celebrated singer, and purchased a farm in the neighborhood of Naples, where he died a few weeks ago.

CHAPTER XII.

MR. GRANGER IS INTERESTED.

When Clarissa went to the great drawing-room dressed for dinner, she found Lizzie Fermor talking to a young lady whom she at once guessed to be Miss Granger. Nor was she allowed to remain in any doubt of the fact; for the lively Lizzie beckoned her to the window by which they were seated, and introduced the two young ladies to each other.

"Miss Granger and I are quite old friends," she said, "and I mean you to like each other very much."

Miss Granger bowed stiffly, but pledged herself to nothing. She was a tall young woman of about two-and-twenty, with very little of the tender grace of girlhood about her; a young woman who, by right of a stately carriage and a pair of handsome shoulders, might have been called fine-looking. Her features were not unlike her father's; and those eyes and eyebrows of Daniel Granger's, which would have looked so well under a judicial wig, were reproduced in a modified degree in the countenance of his daughter. She had what would be generally called a fine complexion, fair and florid; and her hair, of which she had an abundant quantity, was of an insipid light brown, and the straightest Clarissa had ever seen. Altogether, she was a young lady who, invested with all the extraneous charms of her father's wealth, would no doubt be described as attractive, and even handsome. She was dressed well, with a costly simplicity, in a dark blue corded silk, relieved by a bertha of old point lace, and the whiteness of her full firm throat was agreeably set off by a broad band of black velvet, from which there hung a Maltese cross of large rubies.

The two young ladies went on with their talk, which was chiefly of gayeties they had each assisted at since their last meeting, and people they had met.

Clarissa, being quite unable to assist in this conversation, looked on meekly, a little interested in Miss Granger, who was, like herself, an only daughter, and about whose relations with her father she had begun to wonder. Was he very fond of this only child, and in this, as in all else, unlike her own father? He had spoken of her that afternoon several times, and had even praised her, but somewhat coldly, and with a practical, matter-of-course air, almost as Mr. Lovel might have spoken of his daughter if constrained to talk of her in society.

Miss Granger said a good deal about the great people she had met that year. They seemed all to be more or less the elect of the earth; but she pulled herself up once or twice to protest that she cared very little for society; she was happier when employed with her schools and poor people—that was her real element.

"One feels all the other thing to be so purposeless and hollow," she said, sententiously. "After a round of dinners and dances and operas and concerts in London I always have a kind of guilty feeling. So much time wasted, and nothing to show for it. And really my poor are improving so wonderfully. If you could see my cottages, Miss Fermor!" (She did not say, "their cottages.") "I give a prize for the cleanest floors and windows, an illuminated ticket for the neatest garden beds. I don't suppose you could get a sprig of groundsel for love or money in Arden village. I have actually to cultivate it in a corner of the kitchen-garden for my canaries. I give another prize at Christmas for the most economical household management, accorded to the family which has dined oftenest without meat in the course of the year; and I give a premium of one per cent. upon all investments in the Holborough savings-bank—one and a half in the case of widows; a complete suit of clothes to every woman who has attended morning and evening service without missing one Sunday in the year—the consequence of which has been to put a total stop to cooking on the day of rest. I don't believe you could come across so much as a hot potato on a Sunday in one of my cottages."

"And do the husbands like the cold dinners?" Miss Fermor asked, rather flippantly.

"I should hope that spiritual advantage would prevail over temporal luxury even in their half-awakened minds," replied Miss Granger. "I have never inquired about their feelings on the subject. I did, indeed, hear that the village baker, who had driven a profitable trade every Sunday morning before my improvements, made some most insolent comments upon what I had done. But I trust I can rise superior to the impertinence of a village baker. However, you must come to Arden and see my cottages, and judge for yourself; and if you could only know the benighted state in which I found these poor creatures—"

Lizzie Fermor glanced toward Clarissa, and then gave a little warning look, which had the effect of stopping Miss Granger's disquisition.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Lovel," she said; "I forgot that I was talking of your own old parish. But you were a mere child, I believe, when you left the Court, and, of course, could not be capable of effecting much improvement."

"We were too poor to do much or to give prizes," Clarissa answered; "but we gave what we could, and—and I think the people were fond of us."

Miss Granger looked as if this last fact were very wide from the question.

"I have never studied how to make the people fond of me," she said. "My constant effort has been to make them improve themselves and their own condition. All my plans are based upon that principle. 'If you want a new gown, cloak, and bonnet at Christmas,' I tell the women, 'you must earn them by unfailing attendance at church. If you wish to obtain the money gift I wish to give you, you must first show me something saved by your own economy and self-sacrifice.' To my children I hold out similar inducements—a prize for the largest amount of plain needle-work, every stitch of which I make it my duty to examine through a magnifying-glass, a prize for scrupulous neatness in dress, and for Scripture knowledge. I have children in my Sunday-schools who can answer any question upon the Old Testament history from Genesis to Chronicles."

Clarissa gave a faint sigh, almost appalled by these wonders. She remembered the girls' Sunday-school in her early girlhood, and her own poor little efforts at instruction, in the course of which she had seldom carried her pupils out of the Garden of Eden, or been able to get over the rivers that watered that Paradise, as described by the juvenile inhabitants of Arden, without little stifled bursts of laughter on her own part; while in the very midst of her most earnest endeavors she was apt to find her brother Austin standing behind her, tempting the juvenile mind by the surreptitious offer of apples or walnuts. The attempts at teaching generally ended in merry laughter and the distribution of nuts and apples, with humble apologies to the professional schoolmistresses for so useless an intrusion.

Miss Granger had no time to enlarge farther upon her manifold improvements before dinner, to which she was escorted by one of the officers from Steepleton, the nearest garrison town, who happened to be dining there that day, and was very glad to get an innings with the great heiress. The master of Arden Court had the honor of escorting Lady Laura; but from his post at the head of the long table he looked more than once to that remote spot where Clarissa sat, not far from his daughter. My lady saw those curious glances, and was delighted to see them. They might mean nothing, of course; but to that sanguine spirit they seemed an augury of success for the scheme which had been for a long time hatching in the matron's busy brain.

"What do you think of my pet, Mr. Granger?" she asked, presently.

Mr. Granger glanced at the ground near my lady's chair with rather a puzzled look, half expecting to see a Maltese spaniel or a flossy-haired Skye terrier standing on his hind-legs.

"What do you think of my pet and protégée, Miss Lovel?"

"Miss Lovel? Well, upon my word, Lady Laura, I am so poor a judge of the merits of young ladies in a general way; but she really appears a very amiable young person."

"And is she not lovely?" asked Lady Laura, contemplating the distant Clarissa in a dreamy way through her double eyeglass. "I think it is the sweetest face I ever saw."

"She is certainly very pretty," admitted Mr. Granger. "I was struck by her appearance this afternoon in the library. I suppose there is something really out of the common in her face, for I am generally the most unobservant of men in such matters."

"Out of the common!" exclaimed Lady Laura. "My dear Sir, it is such a face as you do not see twice in a lifetime. Madame Récamier must have been something like that, I should fancy—a woman who could attract the eyes of all the people in the Champ de Mars, and divide public attention with Napoleon!"

Mr. Granger did not seem interested in the rather abstract question of Clarissa's possible likeness to Madame Récamier.

"She is certainly very pretty," he repeated, in a meditative manner; and stared so long and vacantly at a fricandeau which a footman was just offering him that any less well-trained attendant must have left him in embarrassment.

The next few days were enlivened by a good deal of talk about the ball, in which event Miss Granger did not seem to take a very keen interest.

"I go to balls, of course," she said; "one is obliged to do so, for it would seem so ungracious to refuse one's friends' invitations; but I really do not care for them. They are all alike, and the rooms are always hot."

"I don't think you will be able to say that here," replied Miss Fermor. "Lady Laura's arrangements are always admirable; and there is to be an impromptu conservatory under canvas the whole length of the terrace, in front of the grand saloon where we are to dance, so that the six windows can be open all the evening."

"Then I dare say it will be a cold night," said Miss Granger, who was not prone to admire other people's cleverness. "I generally find that it is so when people take special precautions against heat."

Clarissa naturally found herself thrown a good deal into Sophia Granger's society; but though they worked and drove and walked together, and played croquet, and acted in the same charades, it is doubtful whether there was really much more sympathy between these two than between Clarissa and Lady Geraldine. There was perhaps less; for Clarissa Lovel had been interested in Geraldine Challoner, and she was not in the faintest degree interested in Miss Granger. The cold and shining surface of that young lady's character emitted no galvanic spark. It was impossible to deny that she was wise and accomplished; that she did every thing well that she attempted; that, although obviously conscious of her own supreme advantages as the heiress to a great fortune, she was benignly indulgent to the less blessed among her sex: it was impossible to deny all this; and yet it was not any more easy to get on with Sophia Granger than with Lady Geraldine.

One day, after luncheon, when a bevy of girls were grouped round the piano in the billiard-room, Lizzie Fermor—who indulged in the wildest latitude of discourse—was audacious enough to ask Miss Granger how she would like her father to marry again.

The faultless Sophia elevated her well-marked eyebrows with a look of astonishment that ought to have frozen Miss Fermor. The eyebrows were as hard and as neatly penciled as the shading in Miss Granger's landscapes.

"Marry again!" she repeated—"papa! If you knew him better, Miss Fermor, you would never speculate upon such a thing. Papa will never marry again."

"Has he promised you that?" asked the irrepressible Lizzie.

"I do not require any promise from him. I know him too well to have the slightest doubt upon the subject. Papa might have married brilliantly, again and again, since I was a little thing." (It was rather difficult to fancy Miss Granger a "little thing" in any stage of her existence.) "But nothing has ever been more remote from his ideas than a second marriage. I have heard people regret it."

"You have not regretted it, of course."

"I hope I know my duty too well to wish to stand between papa and his happiness. If it had been for his happiness to marry—a person of a suitable age and position, of course—I should not have considered my own feelings in the matter."

"Well, I suppose not," replied Lizzie, rather doubtfully; "still it is nice to have one's father all to one's self—to say nothing of being an heiress. And the worst of the business is, that when a widower of your papa's age does take it into his head to marry, he is apt to fall in love with some chit of a girl."

Miss Granger stared at the speaker with a gaze as stony as Antigone herself could have turned upon any impious jester who had hinted that Œdipus, in his blindness and banishment, was groping for some frivolous successor to Jocasta.

"My father in love with a girl!" she exclaimed. "What a very false idea you must have formed of his character, Miss Fermor, when you can suggest such an utter absurdity!"

"But, you see, I wasn't speaking of Mr. Granger, only of widowers in general. I have seen several marriages of that kind—men of forty or fifty throwing themselves away, I suppose one ought to say, upon girls scarcely out of their teens. In some cases the marriage seems to turn out well enough; but, of course, one does sometimes hear of things not going on quite happily."

Miss Granger was grave and meditative after this—perhaps half disposed to suspect Elizabeth Fermor of some lurking design on her father. She had been seated at the piano during this conversation, and now resumed her playing—executing a sonata of Beethoven's with faultless precision and the highest form of taught expression; so much emphasis upon each note—a careful rallentando here, a gradual crescendo there; nothing careless or slapdash from the first bar to the last. She would play the same piece a hundred times without varying the performance by a hair's-breadth. Nor did she affect any thing but classical music. She was one of those young ladies who, when asked for a waltz or a polka, freeze the impudent demander by replying that they play no dance music—nothing more frivolous than Mozart.

The day for the ball came, but there was no George Fairfax. Lady Geraldine had arrived at the Castle on the evening before the festival, bringing an excellent account of her father's health. He had been cheered by her visit, and was altogether so much improved that his doctors would have given him permission to come down to Yorkshire for his daughter's wedding. It was only his own valetudinarian habits and extreme dread of fatigue which had prevented Lady Geraldine bringing him down in triumph.

Lady Laura was loudly indignant at Mr. Fairfax's non-appearance; and for the first time Clarissa heard Lady Geraldine defend her lover with some natural and womanly air of proprietorship.

"After pledging his word to me as he did!" exclaimed my lady, when it had come to luncheon-time, and there were still no signs of the delinquent's return.

"But really, Laura, there is no reason he should not keep his word," Geraldine answered, with her serene air. "You know men like to do these things in a desperate kind of way—as if they were winning a race. I dare say he has made his plans so as not to leave himself more than half an hour's margin, and will reach the Castle just in time to dress."

"That is all very well; but I don't call that keeping his promise to me—to come rushing into the place just as we are beginning to dance, after traveling all night, perhaps, and knocking himself up in all sorts of ways, and with no more animation or vivacity left in him than a man who is walking in his sleep. Besides, he ought to consider our anxiety."

"Your anxiety, if you please, Laura. I am not anxious. I can not see that George's appearance at the ball is a matter of such vital importance."

"But, my dear Geraldine, it would seem so strange for him to be away. People would wonder so."

"Let them wonder," Lady Geraldine replied, with a little haughty backward movement of her head, which was natural to her.

Among the cases and packages which had been perpetually arriving from London during the last week or so there was one light deal box, which Lady Laura's second maid brought to Clarissa's room one morning with her mistress's love. The box contained the airiest and most girlish of ball-dresses, all cloud-like white tulle, and the most entrancing wreath of wild roses and hawthorn—such a wreath as never before had crowned Miss Lovel's bright brown hair. Of course there was the usual amount of thanks and kissing and raptures.

"I am responsible to your father for your looking your best, you see, Clary," Lady Laura said, laughing; "and I mean you to make quite a sensation to-night. The muslin you meant to wear is very pretty, and will do for some smaller occasion; but to-night is a field-night. Be sure you come to me when you are dressed. I shall be in my own rooms till the people begin to arrive; and I want to see you when Fosset has put her finishing touches to your dress."

Clarissa promised to present herself before her kind patroness. She was really pleased with her dress, and sincerely grateful to the giver. Lady Laura was a person from whom it was easy to accept benefits. There was something bounteous and expansive in her nature, and her own pleasure in the transaction made it impossible for any but the most churlish recipient to feel otherwise than pleased.

CHAPTER XIII.

OPEN TREASON.

THE ball began, and without the assistance of Mr. Fairfax—much to my lady's indignation. She was scarcely consoled by the praises and compliments she received on the subject of her arrangements and decorations: but these laudations were so unanimous and so gratifying that she did at last forget Mr. Fairfax's defection in the delight of such perfect success.

The Duke—the one sovereign magnate of that district—a tall, grand-looking old man with white hair, even deigned to be pleased and surprised by what she had done.

"But then you have such a splendid platform to work upon," he said. "I don't think we have a place in Yorkshire that can compare with Hale. You had your decorators from London, of course?"

"No, indeed, your Grace," replied my lady, sparkling with delighted pride; "and if there is any thing I can boast of, it is that. Fred wanted me to send for London people, and have the thing done in their wholesale manner—put myself entirely into their hands, give them carte blanche, and so on; so that, till the whole business was finished, I shouldn't have known what the place was to be like; but that is just the kind of arrangement I detest. So I sent for one of my Holborough men, told him my ideas, gave him a few preliminary sketches, and after a good many consultations and discussions we arrived at our present notion. 'Abolish every glimmer of gas,' I said, 'and give me plenty of flowers and wax-candles. The rest is mere matter of detail.'"

Every thing was successful; Miss Granger's prophecy of cold weather was happily unfulfilled. The night was unusually still and sultry, a broad harvest-moon steeping terraces and gardens in tender, mellow light; not a breath to stir the wealth of blossoms, or to flutter the draperies of the many windows, all wide open to the warm night—a night of summer at the beginning of autumn.

Clarissa found herself in great request for the dances, and danced more than she had done since the days of her school-girl waltzes and polkas in the play-room at Belforet. It was about an hour after the dancing had begun, when Lady Laura brought her no less a partner than Mr. Granger, who had walked a solemn quadrille or two with a stately dowager, and whose request was very surprising to Clarissa. She had one set of quadrilles, however, unappropriated on her card, and expressed herself at Mr. Granger's disposal for that particular dance, and then tripped away, to be whirled round the great room by one of her military partners.

Daniel Granger stood among the loungers at one end of the room, watching that aerial revolving figure. Yes, Lady Laura was right; she was very lovely. In all his life he had never before paid much heed to female loveliness, any more than to the grandeurs and splendors of nature, or any thing beyond the narrow boundary of his own successful commonplace existence. But in this girl's face there was something that attracted his attention, and dwelt in his memory when he was away from her; perhaps, after all, it was the result of her position rather than her beauty. It was natural that he should be interested in her, poor child; and he had robbed her of her home, or it would seem so to her, no doubt; and she had let him see that she set an exaggerated value on that lost home, that she clung to it with a morbid sentimentality.

"I should not wonder if she hates me," he said to himself.

He had never thought as much about her father, but then, certainly, he had never been brought into such close contact with her father.

He waited quietly for that appointed quadrille, declining a dance in which Lady Laura would have enlisted him, and keeping a close watch upon Clarissa during the interval. What a gay butterfly creature she seemed to-night! He could scarcely fancy this was the same girl who had spoken so mournfully of her lost home in the library that afternoon. He looked from her to his daughter for a moment, comparing the two: Sophia resplendent in pink areophane and pearls, and showing herself not above the pleasures of a polka; eminently a fine young woman, but oh, of what a different clay from that other one!

Once Miss Fermor, passing the rich man on the arm of her partner, surprised the watchful gray eyes with a new look in them—a look that was neither cold nor stern.

"So, my gentleman," thought the lively Lizzie, "is it that way your fancies are drifting? It was I you suspected of dangerous designs the other day, Miss Granger. Take care your papa doesn't fall into a deeper pitfall. I should like to see him marry again, if it were only to take down that great pink creature's insolence." Whereby it will be seen that Miss Granger was not quite so popular among her contemporaries as, in the serenity of her self-possessed soul, she was wont to imagine herself.

The quadrille began presently, and Clarissa walked through its serious mazes with the man whom she was apt to consider the enemy of her race. She could not help wondering a little to find herself in this position, and her replies to Mr. Granger's commonplace remarks were somewhat mechanical.

Once he contrived to bring the conversation round to Arden Court.

"It would give me so much pleasure to see you there as my daughter's guest," he said, in a warmer tone than was usual to him; "and I really think you would be interested in her parish work. She has done wonders in a small way."

"I have no doubt. You are very kind," faltered Clarissa; "but I do not the least understand how to manage people as Miss Granger does, and I could not bear to come to the Court. I was so happy there with my brother; and now that he is gone, and that I am forbidden even to mention his name, the associations of the place would be too painful."

Mr. Granger grew suddenly grave and silent.

"Yes, there was that business about the brother," he thought to himself; "a bad business, no doubt, or the father would never have turned him out of doors—something very queer, perhaps. A strange set these Lovels, evidently. The father a spendthrift, the son perhaps something worse."

And then he looked down at Clarissa, and thought again how lovely she was, and pitied her for her beauty and her helplessness—the daughter of such a father, the sister of such a brother.

"But she will marry well, of course," he said to himself, just as George Fairfax had done; "all these young fellows seem tremendously struck by her. I suppose she is the prettiest girl in the room. She will make a good match, I dare say, and get out of her father's hands. It must be a dreary life for her in that cottage, with a selfish, disappointed man."

The night waned, and there was no George Fairfax. Lady Geraldine bore herself bravely, and danced a good deal more than she would have done had there not been appearances to be kept up. She had to answer a great many questions about her lover, and she answered all with supreme frankness. He was away in Scotland with some bachelor friends, enjoying himself, no doubt. He had promised to be with them to-night, and had broken his promise; that was all—she was not afraid of any accident.

"I dare say he found the first of the grouse-shooting too attractive," she said, coolly.

After supper, while the most determined of the waltzers were still spinning round to a brisk deux temps of Charles d'Albert's, Clarissa was fain to tell the last of her partners she could dance no more.

"I am not tired of the ball," she said; "I like looking on, but I really can't dance another step. Do go and get some one else for this waltz; I know you are dying to dance it."

This was to the devoted Captain Westleigh, a person with whom Miss Lovel always felt very much at home.

"With you," he answered, tenderly. "But if you mean to sit down, I am at your service. I would not desert you for worlds. And you really are looking a little pale. Shall we find some pleasanter place? That inner room looks deliciously cool."

He offered his arm to Clarissa, and they walked slowly away toward a small room at the end of the saloon; a room which Lady Laura had arranged with an artful eye to effect, leaving it almost in shadow. There were only a few wax-candles glimmering here and there among the cool, dark foliage of the ferns and pitcher-plants that filled every niche and corner, and the moonlight shone full into the room through a wide window that opened upon a stone balcony a few feet above the terrace.

"If I am left alone with her for five minutes, I am sure I shall propose," Captain Westleigh thought, on beholding the soft, secluded aspect of this apartment, which was untenanted when he and Clarissa entered it.

She sank down upon a sofa near the window, more thoroughly tired than she had confessed. This long night's dancing and excitement was quite a new thing to her. It was nearly over now, and the reaction was coming, bringing with it that vague sense of hopelessness and disappointment which had so grown upon her of late. She had abandoned herself fully to the enchantment of the ball, almost losing the sense of her own identity in that brilliant scene. But self-consciousness came back to her now, and she remembered that she was Clarissa Lovel, for whom life was at best a dreary business.

"Can I get you any thing?" asked the Captain, alarmed by her pallor.

"Thanks; you are very kind. If it would not be too much trouble—I know the refreshment-room is a long way off—but I should be glad of a little water."

"I'll get some directly. But I really am afraid you are ill," said the Captain, looking at her anxiously, scarcely liking to leave her for fear she should faint before he came back.

"No, indeed, I am not ill—only very tired.

If you'll let me rest here a little without talking."

She half closed her eyes. There was a dizziness in her head very much like the preliminary stage of fainting.

"My dear Miss Lovel, I should be a wretch to bore you. I'll go for the water this moment."

He hurried away. Clarissa gave a long, weary sigh, and that painful dizziness passed off in some degree. All she wanted was air, she thought, if there had been any air to be got that sultry night. She rose from the sofa presently, and went out upon the balcony. Below her was the river; not a ripple upon the water, not a breath stirring the rushes on the banks. Between the balcony and the river there was a broad battlemented walk, and in the embrasures where cannon had once been there were great stone vases of geraniums and dwarf roses, which seemed only masses of dark foliage in the moonlight.

The Captain was some little time gone for that glass of water. Clarissa had forgotten him and his errand as she sat upon a bench in the balcony with her elbow leaning on the broad stone ledge, looking down at the water and thinking of her own life—thinking what it might have been if every thing in the world had been different.

A sudden step on the walk below startled her, and a low voice said,

"I would I were a glove upon that hand, that I might kiss that cheek."

She knew the voice directly, but was not less startled at hearing it just then. The step came near her, and in the next moment a dark figure had swung itself lightly upward from the path below, and George Fairfax was seated on the angle of the massive balustrade.

"Juliet!" he said, in the same low voice; "what put it into your head to play Juliet to-night? As if you were not dangerous enough without that."

"Mr. Fairfax, how could you startle me so? Lady Laura has been expecting you all the evening."

"I suppose so. But you don't imagine I've been hiding in the garden all the evening, like the man in Tennyson's 'Maud?' I strained heaven and earth to be here in time; but there was a breakdown between Edinburgh and Carlisle. Nothing very serious: an engine-driver knocked about a little, and a few passengers shaken and bruised more or less: but I escaped unscathed, and had to cool my impatience for half a dozen hours at a dingy little station where there was no refreshment for body or mind but a brown jug of tepid water and a big Bible. There I staid till I was picked up by the night mail and here I am. I think I shall stand absolved by my lady when she reads the account of my perils in to-morrow's papers. People are just going away, I suppose. It would be useless for me to dress and put in an appearance now."

"I think Lady Laura would be glad to see you. She has been very anxious, I know."

"Her sisterly cares shall cease before she goes to sleep to-night. She shall be informed that I am in the house; and I will make my peace to-morrow morning."

He did not go away, however, and Clarissa began to feel that there was something embarrassing in her position. He had stepped lightly across the balustrade, and had seated himself very near her, looking down at her face.

"Clarissa, do you know what has happened to me since I have been away from this place?"

She looked up at him with an alarmed expression. It was the first time he had ever uttered her Christian name, but his tone was so serious as to make that a minor question.

"You can not guess, I suppose," he went on. "I have made a discovery—a most perplexing, most calamitous discovery."

"What is that?"

"I have found out that I love you."

Her hand was lying on the broad stone ledge. He took it in his firm grasp, and held it as he went on:

"Yes, Clarissa; I had my doubts before I went away, but thought I was master of myself in this, as I have been in other things, and fancied myself strong enough to strangle the serpent. But it would not be strangled, Clarissa; it has wound itself about my heart, and here I sit by your side dishonored in my own sight, come what may—bound to one woman and loving another with all my soul—yes, with all my soul. What am I to do?"

"Your duty," Clarissa answered, in a low, steady voice.

Her heart was beating so violently that she wondered at her power to utter those two words. What was it that she felt—anger, indignation? Alas! no. Pride, delight, rapture, stirred that undisciplined heart. She knew now what was wanted to make her life bright and happy; she knew now that she had loved George Fairfax almost from the first. And her own duty—the duty she was bound in honor to perform—what was that? Upon that question she had not a moment's doubt. Her duty was to resign him without a murmur; never to let him know that he had touched her heart. Even after having done this there would be much left to her—the knowledge that he had loved her.

"My duty! what is that?" he asked, in a hoarse, hard voice. "To carry out my word to Geraldine, whatsoever misery it may bring upon both of us? I am not one of those saints who think of every body's happiness before their own, Clarissa. I am very human, with all humanity's selfishness. I want to be happy. I want a wife for whom I can feel something more than a cold, well-bred liking. I did not think that it was in me to feel more than that. I thought I had outlived my capacity for loving, wasted the strength of my heart's youth on worthless fancies, spent all my patrimony of affection; but the light shines on me again, and I thank God that it is so. Yes, Clarissa, come what may, I thank my God that I am not so old a man in heart and feeling as I thought myself."

Clarissa tried to stem the current of his talk, with her heart still beating stormily, but with an outward semblance of exceeding calmness.

"I must not hear you talk in this wild way, Mr. Fairfax," she said. "I feel as if I had been guilty of a sin against Lady Geraldine in having listened so long. But I can not for a moment think you are in earnest."

"Do not play the Jesuit, Clarissa. You know that I am in earnest."

"Then the railway accident must have turned your brain, and I can only hope that to-morrow morning will restore your reason."

"Well, I am mad, if you like—madly in love with you. What am I to do? If, with some show of decency, I can recover my liberty—by an appeal to Lady Geraldine's generosity, for instance—believe me, I shall not break her heart; our mutual regard is the calmest, coolest sentiment possible—if I can get myself free from this engagement, will you be my wife, Clarissa?"

"No; a thousand times no!"

"You don't care for me, then? The madness is all on my side?"

"The madness—if you are really in earnest, and not carrying on some absurd jest—is all on your side."

"Well, that seems hard. I was vain enough to think otherwise. I thought so strong a feeling on one side could not coexist with perfect indifference on the other. I fancied there was something like predestination in this, and that my wandering, unwedded soul had met its other half—it's an old Greek notion, you know, that men and women were made in pairs—but I was miserably mistaken, I suppose. How many lovers have you rejected since you left school, Miss Lovel?" he asked, with a short, bitter laugh.

"Geraldine herself could not have given me my quietus more coldly." He was evidently wounded to the quick, being a creature spoiled by easy conquests, and would have gone on, perhaps, in the same angry strain, but there was a light step on the floor within, and Lady Laura Armstrong came quickly toward the balcony.

"My dearest Clary, Captain Westleigh tells me that you are quite knocked up—" she began; and then, recognizing the belated traveler, cried out, "George Fairfax! Is it possible?"

"George Fairfax, my dear Lady Laura, and not quite so base a delinquent as he seems. I must plead guilty to pushing matters to the last limit; but I made my plans to be here at seven o'clock this evening, and should inevitably have arrived at that hour but for a smash between Edinburgh and Carlisle."

"An accident! Were you hurt?"

"Not so much as shaken; but the breakdown lost me half a dozen hours. We were stuck for no end of time at a dingy little station whose name I forget, and when I did reach Carlisle it was too late for any train to bring me on except the night mail, which does not stop at Holborough. I had to post from York, and arrived about ten minutes ago—too late for any thing except to prove to you that I did make heroic efforts to keep my word."

"And how, in goodness name, did you get here, to this room, without my seeing you?"

"From the garden. Finding myself too late to make an appearance in the ball-room, I prowled round the premises, listening to the sounds of revelry within; and then seeing Miss Lovel alone here—playing Juliet without a Romeo—I made so bold as to accost her, and charge her with a message for you."

"You are amazingly considerate; but I really can not forgive you for having deferred your return to the last moment. You have quite spoiled Geraldine's evening, to say nothing of the odd look your absence must have to our friends. I shall tell her you have arrived, and I suppose that is all I can do. You must want some supper, by-the-bye. You'll find plenty of people in the dining-room."

"No, thanks; I had some cold chicken and coffee at Carlisle. I'll ring for a soda-and-brandy when I get to my own room, and that's all I shall do to-night. Good-night, Lady Laura—good-night, Miss Lovel."

He dropped lightly across the balcony and vanished. Lady Laura stood in the window for a few moments in a meditative mood, and then, looking up suddenly, said:

"Oh, by-the-bye, Clarissa, I came to fetch you for another dance, the last quadrille, if you feel well enough to dance it. Mr. Granger wants you for a partner."

"I don't think I can dance any more, Lady Laura. I refused Captain Westleigh the last waltz."

"Yes, but a quadrille is different. However, if you are really tired, I must tell Mr. Granger so. What was George Fairfax saying to you just now? You both looked prodigiously serious."

"I really don't know—I forget—it was nothing very particular," Clarissa answered, conscious that she was blushing, and confused by that consciousness.

Lady Laura looked at her with a sharp, scrutinizing glance.

"I think it would have been better taste on George's part if he had taken care to relieve my sister's anxiety directly he arrived, instead of acting the balcony scene in 'Romeo and Juliet.' I must go back to Mr. Granger with your refusal, Clarissa. Oh, here comes Captain Westleigh with some water."

The Captain did appear at this very moment carrying a glass of that beverage, much to Clarissa's relief, for a tête-à-tête with Lady Laura was very embarrassing to her just now.

"My dear Miss Lovel, you must think me an utter barbarian," exclaimed the Captain; "but you really can't conceive the difficulties I've had to overcome. It seemed as if there wasn't a drop of iced water to be had in the Castle. If you wanted Strasburg pies or barley-sugar temples, I could have brought you them by cartloads. Moselle and marsachino are the merest drugs in the market; but not a creature could I persuade to get me this glass of water. Of course the fellows all said, 'Yes, Sir;' and then went off and forgot all about me. And even when I had got my prize I was waylaid by thirsty dowagers, who wanted to rob me of it. It was like searching for the Northwest Passage."

Lady Laura had departed by this time. Clarissa drank some of the water, and took the Captain's arm to return to the ball-room, which was beginning to look a little empty. On the threshold of the great saloon they met Mr. Granger.

"I am so sorry to hear you are not well, Miss Lovel," he said.

"Thank you, Mr. Granger, but I am really not ill—only too tired to dance any more."

"So Lady Laura tells me—very much to my regret. I had hoped for the honor of dancing this quadrille with you."

"If you knew how rarely Mr. Granger dances, you'd consider yourself rather distinguished, I think, Miss Lovel," said the Captain, laughing.

"Well, no, I don't often dance," replied Mr. Granger, with a shade of confusion in his manner; "but really such a ball as this quite inspires a man—and Lady Laura was good enough to wish me to dance."

He remained by Clarissa's side as they walked back through the rooms. They were near the door when Miss Granger met them, looking as cold and prim in her pink crepe and pearls as if she had that moment emerged from her dressing-room.

"Do you know how late it is, papa?" she asked, contemplating her parent with severe eyes.

"Well, no, one does not think of time upon such an occasion as this. I suppose it is late; but it would not do for us if the household to desert before the rest of the company."

"I was thinking of saying good-night," answered Miss Granger. "I don't suppose any one would miss me, or you either, papa, if we slipped away quietly; and I am sure you will have one of your headaches to-morrow morning."

There is no weapon so useful in the hands of a dutiful child as some chronic complaint of its parent. A certain nervous headache from which Mr. Granger suffered now and then served the fair Sophia as a kind of rod for his correction on occasions.

"I am not tired, my dear."

"Oh, papa, I know your constitution better than you do yourself. Poor Lady Laura, how worn out she must be!"

"Lady Laura has been doing wonders all the evening," said Captain Westleigh. "She has been as ubiquitous as Richmond at Bosworth, and she has the talent of never seeming tired."

Clarissa took the first opportunity of saying good-night. If so important a person as the heiress of Arden Court could depart and not leave a void in the assembly, there could be assuredly no fear that she would be missed. Mr. Granger shook hands with her for the first time in his life as he wished her good-night, and then stood in the door-way watching her receding figure till it was beyond his ken.

"I like your friend Miss Lovel, Sophia," he said to his daughter, presently.

"Miss Lovel is hardly a friend of mine, papa," replied that young lady, somewhat sharply. "I am not in the habit of making sudden friendships, and I have not known Miss Lovel a week. Besides which, she is not the kind of girl I care for."

"Why not?" asked her father, bluntly.

"One can scarcely explain that kind of thing. She is too frivolous for me to get on very well with her. She takes no real interest in my poor, in spite of her connection with Arden, or in church music. I think she hardly knows one Te Deum from another."

"She is rather a nice girl, though," said the Captain, who would fain be loyal to Clarissa, yet for whom the good opinion of such an heiress as Miss Granger could not be a matter of indifference—there was always the chance that she might take a fancy to him, as he put it to his brother officers, and what a lucky hit that would be! "She's a nice girl," he repeated, "and uncommonly pretty."

"I was not discussing her looks, Captain Westleigh," replied Miss Granger, with some asperity; "I was talking of her ideas and tastes, which are quite different from mine. I am sorry you let Lady Laura persuade you to dance with a girl like that, papa. You may have offended old friends, who would fancy they had a prior claim on your attention."

Mr. Granger laughed at this reproof.

"I didn't think a quadrille was such a serious matter, Sophy," he said. "And then, you see, when a man of my age does make a fool of himself, he likes to have the prettiest girl in the room for his partner."

Miss Granger made an involuntary wry face, as if she had been eating something nasty. Mr. Granger gave a great yawn, and, as the rooms by this time were almost empty, made his way to Lady Laura in order to offer his congratulations upon her triumph before retiring to rest.

For once in a way, the vivacious chatelaine of Hale Castle was almost cross.

"Do you really think the ball has gone off well?" she asked, incredulously. "It seems to me to have been an elaborate failure." She was thinking of those two whom she had surprised tête-à-tête in the balcony, and wondering what George Fairfax could have been saying to produce Clarissa's confusion. Clarissa was her protégée, and she was responsible to her sister Geraldine for any mischief brought about by her favorite.

"I WOULD I WERE A GLOVE UPON THAT HAND."

A WANT SUPPLIED.

"A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, aged 28, desiring to marry, and debarred by circumstances from mingling in ladies' society, is anxious to form the acquaintance (with a view to matrimony) of a young lady of suitable age and position. All communications strictly confidential. Address A. B., Herald office."

Who is not familiar with this sort of thing? Slightly varying in form, and with different initials appended, it appears every day in the columns of our papers.

Sometimes we see at a glance that the intention is fraudulent; at other times we doubt; again, the application is obviously genuine and truthful. We are forced to conceive that there may be, nay, that there actually are, persons who, finding it impossible to furnish themselves with suitable wives and husbands from among their acquaintance, appeal in good faith to the public for aid in the search. Comical and preposterous as the fact seems, there it is, and there is no escaping it.

That the difficulty is not confined to our own land is witnessed by the recent appearance in London of The Matrimonial News, a "weekly journal devoted to the promotion of marriage and conjugal felicity." "Civilization," says the editor, in a preliminary address to the public —"civilization, combined with the cold formalities of society and the rules of etiquette, imposes such restrictions on the sexes that there are thousands of marriageable men and women of all ages, capable of making each other happy, who never have a chance of meeting, either in town or country; therefore the desirability of having some organ through which ladies and gentlemen aspiring to marriage can be honorably brought into communication is too obvious to need demonstration. As we are resolved to devote our best energies to advance the interests and happiness of our readers and correspondents, we feel sure that The Matrimonial News will meet with a generous support."

Which assurance seems amply justified, as within the first year of its establishment the advertisements in the News amount to some thousands. But the advertising is but a small part of the advantage accruing to this thrice-lucky editor. He receives the real names and addresses (in confidence) of parties "wishing to correspond," and puts them in communication—for a fee. Another fee (five shillings) is paid for "personal consultation." (Who could grudge this moderate sum for an interview with the man of Destiny?) Twelve stamps must be inclosed in return for a sibylline leaf sent by post. And all introductions are given on the understanding that, should marriage be the result of acquaintance, each of the high contracting parties pays a fee within (oh, sagacious editor!) "one month after the wedding." No marrying in haste, and refusing to pay at leisure. No returning the goods to the firm of "Matrimonial News & Company." Its enterprising conductor knows better than that, and secures what the estimable Mr. Trapbois calls "a con-sid-e-ra-tion" ere the honey-moon has waned to a starved crescent, to be presently eclipsed in utter darkness.

But turn we to the advertisements. Here is a "Mohammedan general of high rank and large fortune, aged 44," desirous of an English wife of birth, beauty, education, and a turn for living in a fine palace. "No fortune required," which is unusually liberal, most of the gentlemen applying to the News being frankly explicit on the necessity of money. Perhaps 1268, who is a "widow under 30, with a soul for music, and a deeply sympathetic nature," may turn out the not impossible she; or 1404, "an orphan, considered handsome." 1418, "an artist, aged 27, dark, handsome, highly connected, and of very gentle, manly manners, who feels the winter evenings dull without a partner," is more exacting in his demands. He not only requires a "dot" of £200 a year, but the lady of his choice must be young, beautiful, and possessed of the figure of Venus. As the figure of Venus is rare nowadays, especially in England, the land of eighteen-inch waists, we fear poor 1418 may sigh in vain. "Katie, widow of a clergyman, aged 29 (but looks younger)," announces herself as possessed of a warm, loving, and faithful heart, a nice house with good furniture, and £500. She is extremely musical, and none but real gentlemen need apply. "Katie" is not alone in looking younger than her age. All the ladies over twenty-five look so, and most of them are "considered pretty," two or three sincere souls only writing themselves down as "plain." The gentlemen to a man are good-looking. Even one "Bachelor of family and fortune, aged 85," who advertises under the numerals 1332, claims to be the proprietor of a "fine figure, black eyes, florid complexion, thick, silvery-white hair, and excellent teeth." This venerable man wishes a wife under thirty, amiable, intellectual, a thorough musician and vocalist, very pretty, fair, and possessed of beautiful hands and feet;" but he moderately adds that fortune is no object, as happiness alone is what he seeks.

"Ernest," who possesses true humility of soul, declines to state any facts respecting his personal appearance. His "photo," he remarks, "will speak for itself." Poor "Alice Stanley," on the other hand, who is "a servant living in a nobleman's house," lays no claim to good looks. Her aspirations are for a "steady working-man—a carpenter preferred." (Query, why?) The carpenter must, however, be tall—middle-sized carpenters need not apply.

Widowers abound. Some of them confess to two, some to three, some to five children. The fuller the quiver, the louder grows their appeal for some lady with an independent income of her own, to whom the devotion of a grateful heart would be all.

1265 seems to be popular. In the Matrimonial News bearing date February 4 there are no less than five applicants for the honor of her correspondence. One of them is a youthful baronet with £8000 a year from landed estate. Why society should have snubbed so estimable a young man, until he was driven to this fatal step, we know not. Our American mind can hardly compass the notion of a young baronet with £8000 a year going begging in this way. It is truly distressing. May 1265 prove balm for his woes!

But time would fail us to write of "Maud" and "Agnes;" of "Incognita," who is sure of proving "a congenial companion;" of 1376, who "does not object to a widow," even, provided she brings £150 or £200 to set him up in business as a pork-butcher; of the "widow of a military officer, aged 34," who confesses to a "dreadful cavity in her heart," which she wishes to fill; and the "Bachelor with small salary, who seeks the kind indulgence of ladies with independent incomes, single, or widows under 40" (how many not stated). We may not even linger with the "independent gentleman, florid, full beard and mustache," who is "desirous of replacing ties severed by long residence abroad," and so wishes a wife of "means, ability, refinement, and excellent constitution." We will not even pause to penetrate the meaning of the elegant euphuism couched in the sentence, nor to drop a tear over the juvenile sorrows of 1442, an officer who thinks that "with the exception" (at present) "of the beard," he may suit the requirements of the much-admired 1265. We will but call the attention of our readers to this valuable sheet, and leave them, trusting that in the march of events some emulous soul may be found to endow America with a similar paper, where ladies over 33 (but considerably younger in appearance), and gentlemen anxious to secure by fair means a timely capital for the pork-packing business, may find their field and their opportunity, and a well-fed Cupid flap hilariously his sempiternal wings.

SHOWING THE NAUGHTY BABY HER FACE IN THE LOOKING-GLASS.

ZINC GREEN.

AN excellent quality of zinc green, it is said, can be prepared by stirring into a sufficient quantity of water five parts of oxide of zinc and one part of dry sulphate of cobalt. The solution is then to be dried and exposed to a red heat, which results in the production of a dark green powder. If we use ten parts of the oxide of zinc and one part of the salt of cobalt, the product is a dark grass green color; with twice the percentage of the oxide of zinc it becomes a light grass green. Of the different tints the light grass green is the most esteemed, since it is well adapted to replace the dangerous Schweinfurt, or arsenic green, and because it takes a good hold upon whitewash, which is not the case with the green cinnabar prepared by mixing together Berlin blue and chrome yellow.

SPECKLED FABRICS.

THE manufacture of fabrics in which minute specks of one color are seen on a dark ground is becoming very common, this result being generally produced by the introduction of a silken thread. The same effect, however, is now accomplished, and in some cases much more readily, without weaving in the dots, by a different arrangement. The speckles themselves are applied by the help of a sprinkling apparatus which divides the oil color very finely and sprinkles it over the cloth. The apparatus consists of a tin box, closed everywhere excepting on the front side. The oil color is placed upon the bottom of the box, and into this is immersed a small, rotating, cylindrical brush, which lies parallel to the open side of the box, and can be turned by means of a crank. The bristles of the brush in rotating, after being saturated with the oil color, strike against a small bar, and throw out the oil-color dust in very fine drops. On the back side of the box is a handle by which it is held in the left hand, while the right turns the crank. In this way the dust-rain of any desirable color can be directed over the cloth spread out on a table. If two colors are desired it is only necessary to sprinkle the cloth first with one, and then with the other.

Digitized by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. Q. J.—Any responsible jeweler will attend to having hair jewelry made. It is proper to travel in a crape hat and shawl. Get a sacque with basque back made of black silk and entirely covered with English crape as an out-door garment with any dress.

MILTON.—We do not club with other magazines, but several do with us.—Henri Lefebvre is a pseudonym of Edouard Laboulaye, and is used as such on the title-page of "Paris en Amérique," a translation of which was published a few years ago by Scribner & Co.

FANCHON.—Halloween, or the vigil of All-Saints, is the night of the 31st of October. The 1st of November is All-Saints, and the 2d All-Souls day.

TOM.—Unless you have stipulated otherwise, your MS. becomes the property of the journal that has purchased it, and you have no right to sell it again to a book-publisher. MS. left open at the ends and marked Author's MS. can be sent through the mails under newspaper postage.

MRS. E. C. F., OF CHESTER.—We can not send the pattern of Traveling Suit, as you neglected to say to what State it should be sent. This pattern is appropriate for a dress to be worn at church and in the afternoon as well as when traveling. Your sample is leno, and should be trimmed with bias bands of black silk and fringe.

A. T. W.—Trim with passementerie and fringe, or lace.

GERMANIA.—We think that you will find the writings of Fritz Reuter at the German book-stores, but can not tell you the price.—Ivanhoe is pronounced I'van-ho.—Thanks for your kind appreciation.

MILLIE D.—At the School of Design for Women, in the Cooper Institute, you can receive gratuitous instruction in drawing and painting. You had better address the principal for details.

MINNIE.—Get French kid buttoned boots for walking and driving; Marie Antoinette slippers and Oxford ties for the house. Brass heels are not much worn. Metallic heels painted black are worn by those who wear down their heels. Your parasol will answer for ordinary occasions. The most stylish parasol for church and calling is of white or light-colored silk with lace cover and white ivory handle.

E. T. C.—We think it prettier to make the polonaise of light brown trimmed with darker brown, and the skirt dark trimmed with itself.

HELEN M. B.—Your sample is Japanese poplin, and will not wear well enough to justify expensive trimming. Folds or pleatings of the same will answer. Use it for a house dress with basque and demi-train. Get a light quality of blue silk and make ruffles on the white and blue grenadine.

MARION.—We merely gave as the experience of a correspondent that camphor would turn mink lighter. The best furriers, however, commend the use of camphor for preserving all furs. Make white Marseilles suit by Short-Sacque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV. The same will answer for your gray dress. Black silk over-skirts will not be so much worn as black under-skirts with light over dresses.

JOHNA.—We have recently answered your questions about gold-fish.

LUCY LONG.—Don't marry a man simply because he has money and you have none. Money gained in this way will only be a curse to you. If, as you say, he loves you devotedly, while you only respect and esteem him, tell him so frankly, and wait for the esteem to ripen into affection before taking an irrevocable step.

MRS. F. R. A.—If your guest receives a call from a person who is a stranger to you, but to whom it is desirable to extend the hospitalities of the house, you should present yourself, but not if you have reason to suppose that the caller has private business to transact. The guest in such cases will usually give her hostess the cue. It is difficult to prescribe an invariable rule; you must be guided by circumstances.

MRS. A. M. B.—You did not give us your name, therefore we can not send the pattern ordered until we hear from you.—The vest-casaque is fashionable this spring. Neck-ties are worn with collars, and are worn on all occasions but when in full evening dress. Get gray cashmere for your sacque if you can match your dress—if not, get black. Your silk sample will not wear well. It would look well under grenadine. Your idea about the muslin dress is good. Barége is very little worn here; but all thin colored goods are worn over colored skirts, and the basque and sleeves are lined with the same.

JENNIE K.—Buff, brown, or gray linen suits with postilion-basque and upper skirt may be ordered from the furnishing houses you mention for prices ranging from $15 to $25. A polonaise of linen instead of the basque and upper skirt would be pretty, and you could wear it with your brown poplin for traveling.

M.—A small watch-pocket is made in a seam below the waist on basques, and a long opera chain passing around the neck holds the watch. The right-hand side is most convenient for button-holes.

MRS. N. F. R.—Kilting is pleats all turned one way, made in the manner described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 20, Vol. IV.

MRS. I. S. R. T.—White duchesse lace, peeping from beneath black grenadine ruffles, is seen on stylish suits.

C. A. M.—Buff linen or buff pongee, with darker brown trimming, would be stylish for you.

N. Y.—The postilion-basque suit pattern, the short-sacque suit, and the apron-polonaise are all used for Victoria lawn suits. Trim with side pleatings.

INQUISITIVE.—It will take about twenty yards of narrow summer silk for a suit not trimmed with itself. A regular roundabout of linen is pretty for a boy of nine years.

LIDA.—Very young ladies do carry parasols with lace covers. Marie Antoinette slippers are only fit for the house. The loose linen waists will be worn. See New York Fashions of Bazar No. 20, Vol. IV.

EDITH DINSMORE.—Get Valenciennes lace for your over-skirt; but we can not guess at the quantity, as we know nothing of the shape of the skirt.

CONSTANT READER.—For traveling dresses read Bazar No. 20, Vol. IV. The pattern sent you will answer for Victoria lawn basques.

MAUDE.—Simply line the waist and face the skirt of your dress.

C. E. H.—Beatrice Cenci is pronounced Be-a-tre'chy Chen'chy.

A. H.—We have an index for each volume of the Bazar, and will send them on receipt of postage.

DIAMOND D MOHAIR.

It is an old maxim that a good article is always the cheapest in the end, and to nothing does this more fully apply than alpaca. Unfortunately, it is almost impossible for the consumer to know a good make from a bad one till worn, and the only safe course to pursue is to purchase a make that is known and guaranteed to wear well. The Diamond Mohair is one of the honest old original makes that first rendered the fabric popular for their brilliancy, color, and lasting qualities, and are as well made now as they were twenty years ago.

Retailers say they are difficult to introduce at first, ladies preferring heavier and more leathery goods. But these goods are warranted double warp, and are as heavy as an alpaca can honestly be made. The leathery goods are produced by elastic dressing and an undue quantity of cotton, and, of course, they soon get fuzzy, crease and wrinkle easily, and lose their color, and the dress is done.

The Diamond Mohairs, made only from the best alpaca yarn, are naturally brilliant, and will not lose their brilliancy; springy, and will not crease; and, having no dressing in them, are not injured by water.

Observe the brand, and do not be persuaded to take any other till you have tried these goods once, and you will find you have a handsome dress that will remain handsome.

Now to be had from nearly all first-class retailers.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

APRIL, MAY, and JUNE purify the blood and beautify the complexion by using HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

In the Spring and Summer months the system undergoes a change. This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

Prescriptions accurately compounded. French, German, and Spanish spoken. Stores open all night.
P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

UNDER A BURNING SUN,

Where Bilious affections and Fevers of various descriptions so generally prevail,

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT

Has been successful beyond all parallel. Hence the physicians of the tropics give it their emphatic sanction, prescribing it in preference to every other aperient in use. The patients, of course, gladly acquiesce; for this preparation is one of the most delightful, as well as mild and cooling cathartics chemistry has yet devised, and possesses every medicinal virtue of the far-famed German Seltzer Spa. It is a powder that only requires the addition of water to produce in an instant a delicious, effervescent beverage, as well as an invaluable medicine.

Ask for and accept none but the genuine.

FACETIÆ.

On a certain occasion the counsel took some exception to the ruling of the Court on some point, and a dispute arose.

"If the Court please," said the counsel, "I wish to refer to this book for a moment," and at the same time picked up a volume.

"There is no referring to any book," exclaimed the Court, angrily. "I have decided the p'int."

"But, your Honor—" persisted the attorney.

"Now, I don't want to hear any thing on the subject," yelled the Court. "I tell you again that I have decided the p'int."

"I know that," was the rejoinder, "I am satisfied of that; but this is a volume of Blackstone. I am certain he differs with your Honor, and I only wanted to show you what a fool Blackstone was."

"Ah, indeed," exclaimed the Court, "now you begin to talk."

DEADLY WEAPONS—Gin slings.

ON THE TRAIL—Luxuriant whiskers.

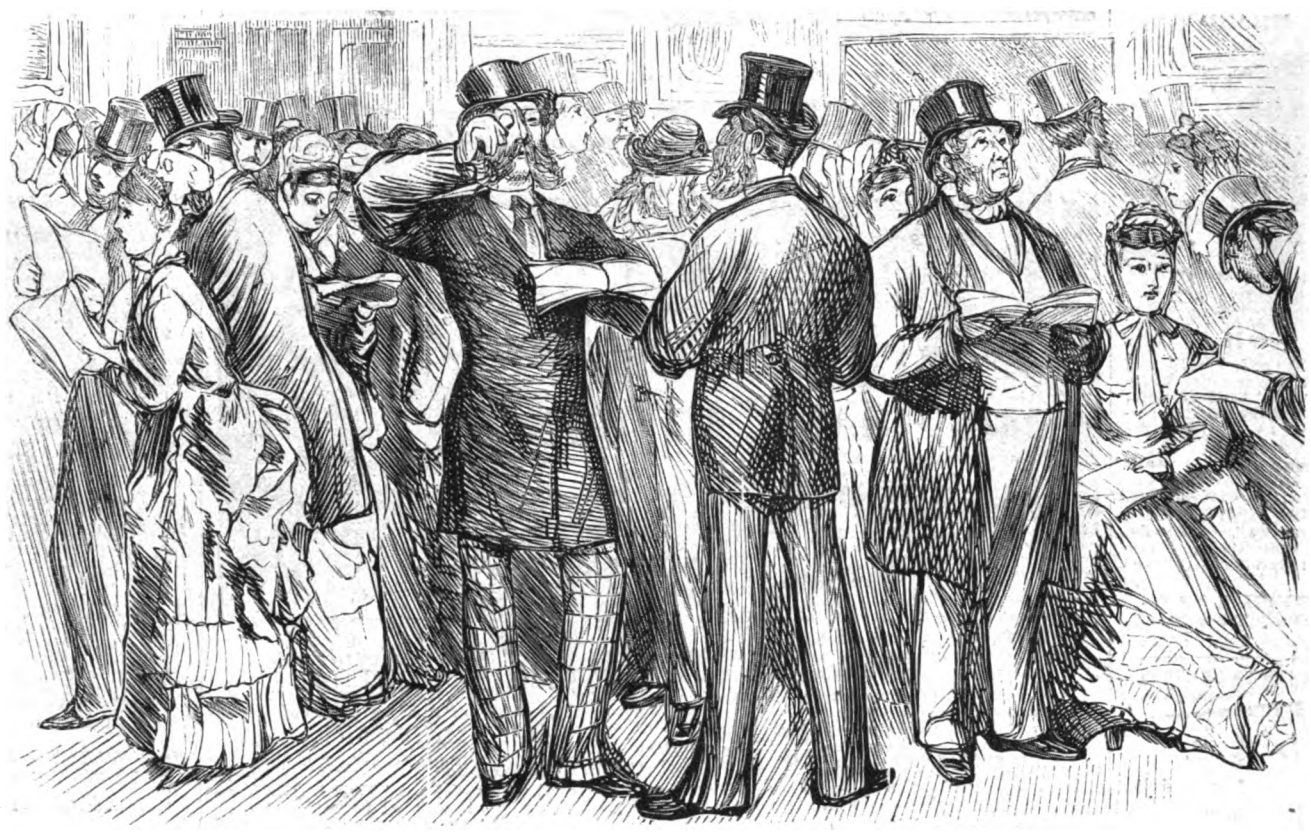
WOMAN'S KINGDOM—A milliner's shop.

A MELANCHOLY WALK—Going down hill.

PROMPT AND PRACTICAL.

STRANGER. "My good man, can you tell me the nearest way to the Central Park?"

CABBY. "Jist inside the cab here, Sir."



UNPREJUDICED!

SWELL (at the N. A. Exhibition). "Haw! 've you any ide-aw what Fellaw's Pictu-ars we're to Admi-are this ye-ar?"

At a recent session of one of the courts of South Carolina an entire negro jury was impaneled. A case was brought before them, the witnesses examined, and the attorneys made their respective arguments. The judge, after laying down the law, and recapitulating the testimony, gave the papers into the hands of the foreman, a rather intelligent-looking darkey, with instructions, as soon as they found a verdict, to bring it in without fail. Thirty minutes or more elapsed, when the jury returned, headed by the foreman, and stood before the judge. As the foreman appeared to hesitate, the judge inquired,

"Mr. Foreman, have you found a verdict?"

"No, massa judge, we habn't found 'em, no how," replied the ebony juryman.

"It's a very plain case," said the judge.

"Can't help it, massa; couldn't see it," replied ebony again.

"On what grounds?" inquired the judge.

"We don't look in de groun's, massa judge," replied the foreman; "de ossifer did not take us out into de groun's; bu' he took us into a room and locked us in, and told us when we found de verdic' he would leabe us out; so we begun to find de verdic', and search ebery nook, corner, and crevis, and ebery ting dat was in dat room, but we found no verdic'—no, nuffin ob de kind dar."

EARLY TRAINING—Leaving town by the morning express.

KNOWLEDGE IS POWER.

GRANDMA TO GRANDPA. "Have you heard that strange story about Miss Simpkins's Elopement?"

LITTLE PRECOCIOUS. "Oh, I know all about that."

GRANDMA. "Indeed! I should like to know what it is that you don't know."

LITTLE P. "Well, then I'll tell you—I don't know my Lessons for to-morrow!"

QUERIES—À LA CARTE.

When is a card-player a shabby individual?—When he's a shuffler.

What game should ladies refuse to play?—Old Maid.

What game are tailors addicted to?—Cribbage.

What game should Irishmen play?—Whis(h)t.

What game do rogues study?—Beggar-my-neighbor.

When is a card-player like a lawyer?—When he follows suit.

When is a card-player like a wealthy fox-hunter?—When he keeps his pack.

Where are card-players most at home?—At Deal.

When is a card-player not a mercenary man?—When he prefers a spade to a diamond.

Why should a card-player reside in Fifth Avenue?—Because he is partial to clubs.

In what game should you have a lady as partner?—Quadrille.

What game is most suitable for soldiers?—Piquet.

What game should a sleepy tailor play?—Snip-snap-snorum.

What game is bad for the eyes?—Blind all-fours.

What game is most like marriage?—Lottery.

What game did our remote ancestors (if we may believe Mr. Darwin) play?—All-fours.

What game is most suitable for fruiterers?—Quinse.

What game should merchants play cautiously?—Speculation.

What game should be played in a singing saloon?—Casino.

What game includes mothers-in-law and other incumbrances?—Connections.

What game would be useful in Pittsburg?—Sift-smoke.

What game tends most to the unity of nations?—Commerce.

What game are all the ladies advocates of?—Matrimony.

A NEW STYLE.

NURSE. "Why, what can you have been doing to your dolly, Miss Alice?"

MISS ALICE. "Oh, it's only because I'm tired of long hair, and I've done it like pa with a hole at the top."

THE REASON WHY.

To what bird may a bride be most appropriately compared?—A ring dove.

Of what great French general does a bag-merchant's stock remind you?—Saxe.

When is a disconsolate red deer like a baker?—When he needs his doe.

Why is a new hat like a blow?—Because it is felt.

Why is a troublesome tooth like a portion of land?—Because it's an acher.

THE CHEAPEST AND LONGEST CONVEYANCE—A train of thought.

ALL THE DIFFERENCE.

MEEK LITTLE COUNTRY LADY. "How long can I wear that sort of Hat, do you think?"

MILLINER. "Well, Ma'am, in Town it will be quite old-fashioned by the end of the season. Of course, in the Country, a New York Hat will look well for a long time!"

FLOWERY LANGUAGE

MR. SPARSNIP. "Bless me, you look quite Floral, I declare!"

MR. PODGE. "I don't know about Floor-all, Mr. S., but I think I could Floor a good many Slim 'Uns."

MARRIAGE NOT AT ALL À LA MODE.

This touching scene represents the Devotion of the Good Husband waiting up for the Wife of his Bosom, whom, with the greatest possible difficulty he has persuaded to seek in Society a Little Relaxation from her arduous Household Duties. A good deal of this sort of thing goes on, does it not?

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pretty and useful suit can be worn by girls from two to eight years old, and is well adapted to any kind of material. It consists of a bias skirt, a blouse-waist, and a princesse over dress buttoned behind. The pattern is cut from a model kindly furnished us by the well-known child's dress-maker, Madame H. Walter Frese. One illustration shows the suit made of bishop's lawn, trimmed with a side-pleated flounce, and belted in with a sash, and worn by a girl eight years old. A second illustration represents it made of ribbed piqué, and worn without a sash by a child two years old. The bust measure is taken by passing a tape straight around the body, under the arms. The pattern is graded, in seven sizes, from 19 to 25 inches, bust measure, to fit children from two to eight years old.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises three articles, viz.: princesse over dress, blouse-waist, and four-gored skirt.

CHILD'S PRINCESSE OVER DRESS.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, front gore, back, side gore for the back, and sleeve. The sleeves in the back and front side gores extend to the shoulder seam. The front is whole, and is cut with a point at the bottom of the skirt. The back is left open from the neck to the waist, and is closed with buttons and button-holes. The extra fullness at the waist is laid in a box-pleat at the back turned under, and two side pleats turned outward. The perforations show where to baste the shoulder seams and seams under the arm, and where to put the trimming across the front, over the shoulder, and across the back. An outlet of an inch is given for the shoulder seams and seams under the arms, and a quarter of an inch for all other seams. Half an inch is allowed for the hem. The parts are notched to prevent mistakes.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child two years old, 2 yards.

Extra for ruffle, ½ yard.

Number of buttons, 8.

Add one-eighth of a yard for each additional year of age.

CHILD'S BLOUSE-WAIST.—This pattern is in two pieces—front and back. It is whole in the front, and is closed in the back with buttons and button-holes. The perforations show where to sew on the tape to run in the shirr at the waist, and where to baste the shoulder seams and the seams under the arms. The sleeve given for the princesse over dress serves also for the blouse-waist. The skirt is fastened on the waist with four buttons—one at the middle of the front, one under each arm, and one at the middle of the back. As the child grows, the skirt may be let down by lowering the shirr.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child two years old, 1 yard.

Number of buttons, 8.

Add one-sixteenth of a yard for each additional year of age.

CHILD'S FOUR-GORED SKIRT.—This pattern is in three pieces—half of front gore, side gore, and half of back breadth. The skirt is pleated at the top. The pattern is notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. Pay no attention to the grain of the paper. Lengthen or shorten the skirt at the bottom, taking care to preserve the shape. Lay a pleat about an inch deep at the top on each side of the seams except at the middle of the back, where there are two pleats, and set the skirt into a double belt, which is furnished with button-holes for fastening it to the blouse-waist.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for girl two years old, 1½ yards.

Extra for ruffles, 1⅛ yards.

Add a quarter of a yard for each additional year of age.

JUNE.

BY MARY N. PRESCOTT.

JUNE comes tripping over the meadow,
Light of foot as the wind itself;
And wherever she passes, flowers and grasses
Blossom, evoked by this gracious elf.

Roses that fain would dream on longer,
Folded deep in a perfumed sleep,
Can not gainsay her, but needs must obey her,
And into the summer sunlight creep.

Lilies, a throng so still and stately,
Like saints who in peace their souls possess,
Come following after, nor fail to ingraft her
With the incense of their saintliness.

Harebells yearly blazon her praises,
Columbines gather her honey up,
Sweet-ferns thicken, and grasses quicken,
While sunbeams are brimming the laurel-cup.

She laughs in the brooks and breathes in the flowers,
Speaks the language of finch and jay;
Freshens the earth with sun-pierced showers,
And drifts like a dream away.

TOO NICE.

WE have all heard of the story of the foolish Midas, whose wish, that every thing he touched might be turned into gold, was gratified. He soon repented, as we learn, of the fatal generosity of the gods when the very bread and meat changed at his lips to the precious metal. That Midas's ears finally grew into those of an ass was the fit termination, and not the most incredible part, of his history.

We can discover among us some of the descendants of Midas without even a look at their ears. Their asinine propensities are enough to point them out, without any other indication of their race. We may pass by, for the present, the more characteristic of their kind, and examine some of the less marked specimens.

It is wonderful how people systematically deprive themselves of many of the enjoyments and comforts of life by turning things which are intended for use into mere articles of finery. There surely can be nothing more Midas-like han this practice, which often prevails to such an extent as to convert the utmost abundance into total destitution. Labor is performed and money spent without stint, and yet with no other result than restricted ease and diminished comfort.

You can trace the practice every where, throughout all the course of daily life. It is visible in the dwelling, the furniture, the books, the equipage, the clothes. Most people, in our large cities at least, have bigger and finer houses than they can well use, take care of, or pay for; and daily living in a house without ever feeling at home is of all wretchedness the most wretched. The furniture, moreover, is often too nice for use, the carpet too delicate to be trod by the common boot, and chairs and sofas of too choice a stuff for close proximity with the every-day coat and gown. The best room in the house is thus not seldom made the worst for the family, for every member regards it as he might a chamber of horrors, into which he does not put his foot without fear and trembling.

There is many a man who keeps a carriage too fine for use, and dreads every time he rides in it the approach of a shower or a dirt-cart. At night he is forced to submit to the democratic street car or omnibus, for darkness conceals and endangers the finery of his own equipage.

There are some who boast of their libraries, and yet live themselves, and keep others, in ignorance, because their books are too nice for use. Their gilt edges and choice bindings are only safe under glass, lock and key; so they remain sealed to the curious, and might as well be so many dummies of wood, such as, in fact, are occasionally found filling up the vacant places of the shelves in the book-cases of grand libraries.

There are a thousand ways in which the clothes originally, without doubt, intended for comfort and protection, are turned into sources of annoyance and danger. Obedience to fashion and a desire for show have metamorphosed the essential coverings of the body into so many corporeal tortures. The hard-bound beaver hat and chignon, the spider-waist and tight-bodied coat, the pinching boot and high-heeled shoe, are but a few of the various instruments of suffering which men and women have contrived to make out of the simplest articles of clothing. Human and civilized though such people pretend to be, it is not difficult to discern through all their artifices of dress the asses' ears of the Midas breed. Whatever might be useful they turn by their touch into the showy and inconvenient.

Children even, in spite of the earnest supplications of nature, are not spared this absurd and cruel process of transforming the useful into the showy. The desire for display is apparent in their education, their manners, their dress, and daily walks. Is the purpose of most of the so-called accomplishments of the girls' school to produce useful or showy women? Are the mincing ways and tricks of behavior so carefully inculcated intended to make children genteel, as it is called, or amiable? Is the dress of a kind or a make suitable for freedom of movement, so essential to the healthy development of the young, or adapted only to the stiffness of formal presentation to company? Are the promenades of the starched and bedizened child for the promotion of its health, or the gratification of a mother's vanity and love of display? While we commend to all propriety of conduct and delicacy of taste, we would warn them against being too nice.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Flowers upon Graves.

MY DEAR HARRY,—I saw you marching in the procession on Decoration-day, and I had just been reading in an Alabama newspaper the story of the decoration there. Surely it is a happy coincidence that the occasion and the season are harmonious; for it is a festival of memory and of hope, and the tender and gentle thoughts with which we recall the dead are best symbolized by flowers and the renewing year. There is no holiday more beautiful than this. It is our All-saints Day; and I remember, in other countries, how pleasant the annual visit to the cemeteries upon that day always was. The faithful go then and pray among the graves. They come nearer to the dead by that special service. And, since in the Christian faith the doctrine of the Resurrection is so cardinal and supreme, it is peculiarly fit that the ties which connect those whom death only separates, not severs, should be kept perpetually fresh by constant association. The old grave-yard, bare and sad, was in a sense unchristian when compared with the careful and blooming garden which the cemetery has now become. And whatever draws us often to the ground in which they lie who have "gone into a world of light" draws our thoughts more tenderly into the same realm, and binds us all more affectionately together.

Indeed, whatever associates death with beauty robs it of so much of its terror. Of course, dear Harry, nothing can rob it of its sorrow. In hours of high thought, in moments of exaltation, the soul exclaims, "O Death! where is thy sting?" But in the daily course of life, while we may endure its blow falling upon those most dear to us, we can never escape its shadow, until at last, to many who have loved and lost, the other life becomes just what old Vaughan calls it, "a world of light," in contrast with this. It pleases the heart, therefore, to symbolize it so. And if on some of these brilliant early summer mornings you had gone over to Greenwood, and had stood on its southern slopes under the blooming dogwood, looking over the bright green lawns to the horizon of sparkling sea, hearing the robins and the thrushes, and seeing the roses trailing and blooming among the graves, you would have felt that Nature herself, gracious and benign, had given the hint for Decoration-day.

As you walk about in the sunny silence of the cemetery it is touching to observe how the hint has been followed. You find upon one side the most costly monument, upon which time and money and labor have been equally lavished and lost. The result is a huge deformity to the eye, and to the mind the painful sense of utter waste and extravagance. But a little longer thought sometimes reveals the real feeling which takes so cumbrous and absurd an expression. There may be the sincerest grief without the least taste, and with the utmost extravagance of expense in its expression. Great emotion refuses a Procrustean standard. You think, perhaps, when you see a tasteless monumental pile, that the builder feigns a grief, and you murmur that true sorrow is modest and retiring. So sometimes it is, and so sometimes it is not. Greens, the rich speculator, who began as a match-boy, and who lives now in splendor on Murray Hill, loses his wife, the dearly beloved of his toiling youth and prosperous manhood. Childless, forlorn, what is his money good for but to help him tell the sorrow that wrings his heart? Toward that expression he can supply only the feeling and the money. But he is still himself. His standards are vulgar and external. It seems to him mean that his wife should have a small monument or a mere head-stone, and the rest follows. That tasteless pile of carved marble shows, therefore, a grief as sincere as any which stone commemorates. It is Greens's way of throwing flowers upon the grave. If they seem to you artificial and tawdry, the feeling is not so: that is as fresh and sweet as May flowers.

And close by is a little mound on which is the smallest of head-stones and always a rose-bud lying. No parent whose home is loud with children's voices passes it without a throb of sympathy. What little child lies here? What noble boy "born for the future, to the future lost?" What darling girl, in whom all life became lovelier? Often they are a weariness—they are always a care—the children who are the glory and delight of life and love. But when one goes from us in all the first rosy bloom of hope and promise; when the soul is all sweetness and generosity, and as yet no sour suspicion intrudes; when the child is still ductile, dependent, yet conscious of his powers, and wooed by the illimitable possibilities of life—the sense of loss is plainly so intense that the observer can only wonder whether it can ever be assuaged. Yet even then, dear Harry, I have remarked how vividly every fond word and look, every little way and sign of promise, are recalled. The desolate heart is refreshed by the remembrance, as the hot earth in the darkness of night by the dew; and all the sweet and comfortable memories are like flowers strewn upon a grave. Nature again with soft suggestion is tenderly healing the sudden wound; and this little rose-bud upon the grave is but the token of that rose of remembrance which blooms perennial in the stricken heart.

And how universal the instinct is! The old saying, "Nothing but good of the dead," is the result of the feeling that decorates the graves with flowers. If it be weakness or sin that marred a man, the tongue and the pen are stayed when they begin to speak above his tomb. I observed in the newspapers recently a notice of the death of a man who has done much fatal wrong, perverting the thoughtless, and coercing the weak. Untold suffering and sorrow may fairly be ascribed to him—a man whose name was for some time mentioned only with loathing. All the wrong he tried to do he could not accomplish; but all that he did, also, will never be known. His public career inspired no admiration, his private character no confidence or respect. Foiled and soured, he died like a surly beast at bay. But no harsh word was spoken when his death was announced. Even his most resolute opponents spared him. And that very silence was tenderness. It was a flower thrown upon his grave.

I do not defend it, my dear Harry, but I observe the instinct. It is not fair, always, to be silent at such graves; but I think that nature provides. If a man has been successful in his offenses, and dies crowned with his own crime, the truth is very likely to be spoken. But if he fails or falls before his death, there is a feeling that the crime has been condoned by fate, and that human censure is needless. Then there is the excess in the other direction—the formal eulogy of the mean, the selfish, the false, which is often enough heard. "Where be all the bad people buried?" How full the graveyards are of affectionate husbands—who abused their wives; of devoted wives—who deceived their husbands; of obedient children—who broke their parents' hearts! What misers figure upon tombstones as public benefactors! What scoundrels were full of Christian virtues! What selfish rascals walked humbly with their God! Why should tombstones lie? And why should eulogists lie like tombstones? A poor fellow drinks himself to death. God pity him; it was hereditary weakness; it was disease. But he died a drunkard. Say nothing upon his tombstone, or in your eulogy, then, or tell the fact. Let silence be the flowers you scatter, or decorate his grave with truth.

Yet Mr. Rural lately asked me if it was not monstrous that somebody should say that a great man was in the habit of drinking to drunkenness, or had other lamentable habits. Would he, then, paint Cromwell without his warts, and Washington as the Apollo? What we wish to know of a great man is the truth. It is no service to give me a reflex of my own idolatry. Is my idolatry justifiable? is what I wish to know. If Shakespeare gambled, if he had two wives, if he were mean to a proverb, if he were a notorious coward, shall we not be told of it lest our admiration of Shakespeare be disturbed? Dr. Franklin is a famous man—the most striking in our early Revolutionary history. But the Doctor loved a majority, if he did wear a Republican costume at the court of Louis; and he was something of a Lothario, if he did snatch the lightning from heaven and the sceptre from tyrants. Yet the same nature which hastens to cover the murderer's tomb with the emerald green of grass, and to tune the voices of meadow-larks above it, struggles to clothe the good Doctor's memory with a kind of spotless sanctity, so intent is she to decorate graves with flowers.

It is the same kind instinct which gives Mr. Froude's picture of Henry the Eighth its popularity. He has partially reversed the verdict of history, which is probably the truth in regard to that king. He sustains with plausible rhetoric a theory of state justification of Henry's matrimonial career. He was not a debauchee resolved to gratify his wishes; he was a king politically and philosophically intent upon the succession. Poor Anne Boleyn's name must be smirched that a man who had her head chopped off and instantly married another woman may figure as a great ruler! Suppose she were guilty, was he innocent? Yet it is so grateful to the human heart that so conspicuous a criminal should seem to be less guilty, that Froude's Henry has the benefit of an enormous doubt, which would certainly never be given to the historical Defender of the Faith.

My dear Harry, I do not quarrel with this tendency to decorate graves with flowers. Only, if we feel no wrath with the dead, we need not confound them in one commendation. Pericles says that the whole earth is the mausoleum of the illustrious dead, and surely every summer is Nature's Decoration-day. We must remember, indeed, dear boy, but for warning, not for wrath. Knowing our own weakness and the frequent folly of human nature, we may be grateful even to those whose lives show us what to avoid. Rosemary for fond remembrance we drop upon one grave; rue for our own repentance upon another. And upon the graves in our own hearts and memories, over the dead hopes and passions and delights in our own lives, how tenderly we scatter flowers! And, my dear Harry, if our own crudities and follies, when they are gone, are covered with so soft a shroud of kind forgetfulness, shall not the same instinct teach us to be charitable toward those that yet flourish in our companions? For charity is the Everlasting, the Immortelle, and whether it fall upon the dead or upon the living, it makes every day in the year a Decoration-day.

Your faithful friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CHILD'S PRINCESSE SUIT.

THE child's princesse suit illustrated on our first page, and of which a cut paper pattern is given, is said by mothers to be the most available dress ever designed for growing children; and it is certainly among the prettiest. The objection is made to plain Gabrielles that a child soon outgrows, and there is no way of lengthening them. The princesse suit has all the beauty and easy fit of the Gabrielle in its over dress, together with the advantage of being worn over a gored skirt that may be lengthened at the top. Gabrielles are also rather narrow in the skirt for the present fashion; our model has a stylish gored skirt, with front gored width, two side gores, and a full back breadth. This skirt is sewed to a belt, that should have a lining provided with button-holes, to be fastened to the child's under-waist, or else to a linen blouse, with which it forms, without the over dress, a cool and simple dress for the house. The front width is sewed to the belt without fullness; the remaining widths are very fully gathered, as this gives a more bouffant effect than pleats. Gored skirts of piqué, linen, or other washing goods should not be hemmed, but faced with a two-inch bias strip of the material, or of soft white muslin. This facing is usually concealed by ruffles or other trimmings, but does not disfigure the skirt if visible, as it should be made to fit smoothly

Digitized by Google

If the edge of the skirt is scalloped and braided in the elaborate fashion now in vogue, this facing would be too wide, and a soft twilled tape should be used instead to face the intricate points and scallops. It is well to turn in at the top of the dress two or three inches of the skirt, to provide for lengthening.

The princesse over dress, with waist and upper skirt in one piece, may be worn with or without a sash. It is shaped similar to the upper part of a Gabrielle, with the addition of postillion pleats behind, to give the fullness that is now required. These pleats necessitate a seam between the waist and skirt of the back form. A single pleat is laid each side of the back seam, and a placket-hole is left about a finger deep. This seam at the waist should not be left "raw," but should be covered and strengthened by a facing. The front of this over dress is much shorter than the back, and is pointed in the pattern given; but by way of variety it may be straight or rounded. The buttons fasten the waist only, extending to the sash. The sleeves are coat-shaped usually. A little turned-over collar, slit up in the back and front, finishes the garment. This pretty little over dress may be used in many ways. Aside from being a stylish over dress for girls from two to eight years old, and even older, it is worn by boys of two or three years; and mothers say it is the best model for that useful article, a high-necked apron, that can be found in these days of elaborately dressed children.

The dress on the smallest child in our illustration is of corded piqué, trimmed with two needle-worked ruffles, each three inches deep, set upon the skirt, and the gathers concealed by a row of piqué braid a third of an inch wide. The price of such a dress for a child of six or seven years is $10. The dress with kilt-pleated skirt is of white bishop's lawn or soft nansook, made by the same pattern; but for variety's sake the under-skirt is cut off two-eighths of a yard below the belt in the front width, sloping a little longer behind, and is finished out to the proper length by a kilt-pleated flounce, which in this instance is three-eighths deep. There are three and a half widths of wide nansook in the flounce, sewed to the top piece in inch-wide pleats, and ironed flatly the full depth of the flounce. The lower edge has a hem about an inch wide. The over dress is trimmed with a pleating a finger deep, held down by an inch-wide band of Hamburg insertion stitched on an inch below the top, leaving a standing pleated ruffle above. The over dress should be long enough to conceal the top of the kilt flounce on the skirt. Such a dress costs $12.

The suit, as represented in our engraving, is appropriate either for the house or street. We give also a blouse-waist pattern, to which the skirt may be buttoned to form a house dress. It is a bad plan to gather children's blouses to a belt, as they are apt to tear them when raising the arms suddenly; hence our pattern is cut long enough to pass over the hips and be held at the waist by a drawing-string. As the child grows taller the shirred case for the drawing-string may be placed lower to lengthen the waist. A button should be placed in the shirrs in the front, behind, and on each side, and corresponding button-holes in the belt of the dress skirt. When these blouses are tucked or box-pleated the tucking or box-pleating should be done in plain widths, and the blouse blocked out afterward by the pattern.

The most useful dresses in a little girl's summer outfit are, of course, the washing dresses of piqué, nansook, and buff, white, or brown linen. After these one or two dressy costumes of silk or grenadine are often provided; but the fabrics that may be renewed every week by the laundress are far more serviceable, and may be made sufficiently dressy by lace and embroidery for any child. Soft nansook is prettier for children than the stiff bishop's lawn that is so easily rumpled. It is best to put very little starch in children's outside dresses, but their muslin petticoats may be starched very stiffly.

Among the piqués imported at a child's outfitting house the favorite repped pattern is beautified by having small embroidered figures—a star, leaf, or compass pattern—scattered about at intervals over the body of the garment; others have the four breadths of the skirt embroidered in a robe design, or a pretty border. As this adds greatly to the expense, mothers imitate it by making similar figures with star braid at intervals all over the dress. Designers stamp these when arranging the trimming on the dress after the little garment is made.

Embroidery on the material, insertions of needle-work, ruffles, and, above all, braiding, are the trimmings for children's piqué dresses. Braiding around insertions of needle-work is much used. Very rich trimming is made in this way without much labor. A strip of cambric insertion six inches long, and pointed at each end, is let into each width of the skirt; the edges are concealed by piqué braid, and a fanciful pattern is wrought about it in star braid. Two or three different widths of braid, some feather-edged, others with raised scroll pattern and the star braid, are all used to complete one design; plain soutache is not effective. The design outlines fern leaves, tulips, or other large flowers, and, though looking very rich, does not require to be heavy, because it is soon filled up by the wide braids used. Among the details a few tendrils added by long stitches of embroidery cotton enhance the beauty of the pattern; the edge is cut in deep scallops, faced on the wrong side with tape, and finished with a lace-like edge sold for this purpose. The over dress we illustrate is sometimes braided over the shoulder seams and down nearly to the border. Ruffles are the prettiest trimming for girls' dresses, but braiding is so rich, so substantial, and so easily done, that mothers use it for boys and girls alike. Open-worked guipure embroidery is also very effective both as ruffles and insertion.

Another pretty novelty among the importations is buff linen dresses, embroidered with dotted borders in white and scarlet. These make up beautifully. Plainer buff and brown linens, for school or traveling, are made in the princesse fashion, and trimmed with brown worsted braid. Three or four rows border the skirts, while a single row follows the seam of the side form of the over dress, passing over the shoulders. Other substantial linens are plain Gabrielles, or else the body is a box-pleated blouse, with skirt and over-skirt trimmed with a row of side pleats edged by the merest scallop of Hamburg work.

Very wide sash ribbons, tied behind with long, loose loops, will continue to be worn by children. The newest are in solid colors, with a narrow fringe all around. The sailor hat is universally worn. It answers for school and for dress, is worn by girls of every size, by ladies and boys alike. The newest shape has a wider brim, slightly turned up, as if before a stiff breeze. The brim is bound with black, blue, or brown ribbon, and a band surrounds the crown. $3 buys a pretty one.

SUITS FOR SMALL BOYS.

The prettiest kilt suit for boys of four years not yet in trowsers has a skirt made of three straight widths of piqué buttoned by six large pearl buttons on the left side. From two to three eighths of the front is sewed to the belt without fullness, while all the rest of the skirt is in pleats all turned one way, or else in six or eight large box-pleats. The plain front is richly braided, and a braided vine goes up each box-pleat. The jacket is loose, fastened only at the throat, hanging open to show the shirt front, and cut to form a square tab in each front, with three tabs behind. Square pocket flaps, richly braided, are placed in front. A little fanciful vest is usually added, but is too warm for summer. $14 is the price of such a suit of piqué. When made of thick brown linen it is trimmed with brown braid.

Pretty little jackets of brown corduroy, slashed and faced with silk an inch wide, are worn on cool mornings by little boys. Pretty jackets of blue flannel and of twilled cloth richly braided are also shown.

PERSONAL.

DR. JOHN B. GILMAN, some time of Chicago, having been a good surgeon to German soldiers during the war, has received from Kaiser WILLIAM the decoration of the Iron Cross.

—Mr. WILLIAM J. M'ALPINE, formerly State Engineer of New York, sailed last week for Austria, whither he was called by the government to examine and report on the removal of obstructions in the Danube. Mr. M'ALPINE is one of the most distinguished of American engineers, and has constructed or been consulted with on most of the great engineering achievements of the country—the great dock of the navy-yard at Brooklyn, the water-works of our cities, and most of our great suspension-bridges.

—When Mr. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL sets himself regularly down to turn the faucet and draw off from the tank of his imagination a few measures of poetry, he carefully gets out of the ordinary tailor-shop toggery, inserts himself in the dressing-gown of genius, pulls gently on a sweet smoking-cap, and,

"With fragrant and serene cigar, Pressed satisfactorily betwixt his lips," goes at it—for so much per page.

Things are to be adjudicated.

—The marriage contract of the Bride of Lammermoor has quite lately been discovered at St. Mary's Isle, the seat of the Earl of Selkirk, in Scotland. It bears four signatures: the bridegroom's (DAVID DUNBAR), the bride's (JANE DALRYMPLE), the bridegroom's father (BALDOON), and the bride's father (JAMES DALRYMPLE). A fac-simile has been taken of the document, which is to be included in the centenary editions of the Waverley Novels. There is a little tremor, it is said, in the bride's signature.

—There are now three Baptist missionaries in Italy—Mr. WATT and Dr. COATS in Rome, and Mr. CLARKE in La Spezzia. The expenses are defrayed by individual contributions, not by the Society.

—WILLIAM A. PARKER, of Boston, a soldier of the war of 1812, made application for a pension under the new law recently passed by Congress, and the two witnesses necessary to legalize the application were found in Messrs. CROCKER & BREWSTER, the well-known publishers, who visited Mr. PARKER at Fort Independence, Boston Harbor, while on duty in the United States service nearly fifty-seven years ago. A remarkable circumstance that, after so many years, they were enabled to testify to the identity of the applicant.

—The ex-Empress of France has with genuine kind-heartedness adopted the little son of Madame BONNE, the well-known French milliner, who was so brutally murdered recently in Paris by the National Guards. He is now at Chiselhurst.

—Miss REBECCA WRIGHT, of Winchester, Virginia, employed in the Treasury at Washington, was married a few days since to WILLIAM BONSAL, of Cecil, Maryland. REBECCA is the little Quaker lady who told SHERIDAN about JUBAL EARLY'S movements in September, 1864, by which he sent Mr. EARLY whirling down the valley; for which SHERIDAN gave her a watch, and the government a place.

—Colonel ROSSEL, who recently held an important command in Paris, shows us that the proverbial politeness of the French is yet maintained under circumstances where politeness is not the order of the day. On being deprived of his command he wrote an explanatory note, which concluded with the following, "And I have the honor to demand of you a cell in Mazas." This noble Frenchman embraced an early opportunity of running away.

—The minutest of those whom war has exiled from France is the "Princess" FELICIE, who is now on view in London for a small cash consideration. She is a pure dwarf, the smallest ever exhibited in that capital—one beside whom MINNIE WARREN is a giantess. She is now in her ninth year, measures less than nineteen inches in height, and weighs just six pounds; is of perfect symmetry in limb and feature, and altogether a pleasing and gentle child.

—The Rev. ASA BULLARD has been gathering facts and figures to refute the saying that ministers' sons and deacons' daughters are more irreligious than others. Massachusetts and Connecticut furnished the field. In 448 ministers' and deacons' families there were 2101 children over fifteen years of age, of whom 1414 were hopefully pious, 93 were in the ministry or fitting for it, and only 34 dissipated; and all the remaining children, with very few exceptions, were respectable and useful citizens. Mr. BULLARD challenges a comparison with these figures on the part of any other class or profession among parents.

—It is among the disgustful incidents to the ROTHSCHILD family that they have lost some sixty or seventy millions of dollars by the Franco-German war. They all believed at first that France would win; but two weeks after the Germans crossed the Rhine they saw their mistake, and made other investments, but not in time to get whole.

—Mr. JOHN HARDY, of Springfield, Massachusetts, had the hardihood to set a hen of the Brahma species on twenty-five eggs. After a long pull she came off with two-and-thirty chicks. So much for henergy in an eggcellent cause.

—And in this wise, on the 16th ult., were married, in church, at Columbus, Prince VON LYNAR and Miss MAY PARSONS: In front of Bishop M'ILVAINE, who did the service, the two stood, Miss PARSONS apparently much at her ease, while the Prince was visibly embarrassed. His hat he continued to hold even after the solemn words of the service had begun to be read, and occasional glances over his shoulder toward the audience showed that the position was quite new to him. His responses were distinctly given, though the words were marked by a strong German accent. In the latter part of the ceremony a change was made from the usual forms, both parties exchanging rings, in accordance with an old German custom. The benediction pronounced, the Prince and Princess VON LYNAR turned at once, and while from the organ there rolled the rich measures of MENDELSSOHN'S Wedding March, from "Athalie," they walked quickly down the aisle, and the simple, unostentatious wedding was over.

—The last surviving Revolutionary pensioner is D. F. BATEMAN, who resides in Cattaraugus County, New York, and, although a tottering warrior, has still strength enough left to draw his $500 pension with perfect regularity.

—Dr. HALL, who makes so capital and useful a Journal of Health, has encountered a vigorous Alabama editor, who opposes the doctor's advice that husband and wife should sleep in separate rooms; for, saith the vigorous Alabama editor, "Dr. HALL can sleep when and where he chooses, but as for me, I intend to sleep where I can defend my wife against rats and all other nocturnal foes as long as I have got one to defend." Sound!

—The oldest actress on record was a Mrs. FRYER, an Irishwoman, who died in 1747, at the age of 117 years. In 1720, when she was 90 years old, she appeared at Drury Lane Theatre, in London, and acted the part of the old grandmother, in a farce called the "Half-Pay Officer." In the bills it was mentioned, "The part of Lady Richleve to be performed by Peg Fryer, who has not appeared on the stage these fifty years."

—ROGERS'S bronze statue of ABRAHAM LINCOLN, intended for Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, is now on its way to this country. It is to be placed on a granite pedestal, and the entire structure will be thirty-three feet high, conspicuously placed, and visible both on entering and leaving the Park. It is valued at $30,000.

—Could any thing be more out of the ordinary way than that ACHILLES PUGH, a Quaker of Waynesville, Ohio, should fit up and furnish at his own expense a neat little chapel in that village for the use of the Episcopalians? All that hath he done.

—Mr. ANSEL GAMMON, of New Vineyard, Maine, has twelve sons and four daughters, weighing 3140 pounds. The boys average 195 and the girls 200 pounds. (All gammon!)

—Miss BURDETT COUTTS, recently made a peeress, has given more money to charitable objects than any person who has ever lived—the amount being over $25,000,000. Her present fortune is estimated at $50,000,000, most of which, it is intimated, will be bequeathed to institutions of a benevolent character.

—The Rev. CHARLES CLEVELAND attains this present month to the one hundredth year of his age. He is a city missionary in Boston, and attributes his good health and extreme longevity to the regularity of his habits and the simplicity of his food. Always goes to bed before ten, and rises before the sun throughout the year; drinks water, tastes no spirituous liquors, and as for tobacco—faugh! His constitution and by-laws, therefore, need no amendment, and rules of order and resolutions are superfluous.

—One of the most painstaking, as well as cleverest, men of France, ALEXANDRE DUMAS, was a model penman. LEVY, his publisher, has preserved all the manuscripts of that writer, and had them superbly bound. They look as if written by a teacher of penmanship. He hardly ever changed a word in his manuscript, and used to say laughingly to his friends that as soon as people should get tired of reading his books he would open a school for penmanship.

—The Duke of Edinburgh is compelled to rough it on $60,000 a year, not counting his naval pay and allowances.

—Lord Amberley, who has anxieties as to the too rapid growth of families in England, and who "cal'lates," as the Yankee saith, that three children are as many as it is desirable to have in a house, is brought to account by the London Court Journal, which says the practice of the nobility, including Lord A. himself, is quite the other way; that the Duke of Abercorn is the father of fourteen children; the Earl of Abergavenny, eleven, the last two being twins; the Earl of Abingdon, nine; the Earl of Albemarle, five, while his father had fifteen; Earl of Amherst, twelve; Marquis of Anglesey, nine, and his father eighteen; Duke of Argyll, twelve; Earl of Ashburnham, eleven, and his father seventeen, by two marriages; Earl of Bessborough, fourteen; Viscount Bridgeport, thirteen; Marquis of Bristol, ten; Earl of Buckingham, by two marriages, fifteen; Earl of Carlisle, twelve; Earl of Chichester, seven, and his father ten; Earl of Clarendon, eight, and his father ten; Baron Clifford, twelve, the last two being twins; Baron Clonbrock, seventeen; Earl of Dartmouth, seven, and his father seventeen, by two marriages; Earl of Durham, eleven, numbers nine and ten being twins; Baron Ebury, eleven, the last two being twins; Marquis of Exeter, ten, and his father ten; Earl Fortescue, fourteen; Earl Grey, nene, but his father fifteen; Earl Howe, thirteen; and so on throughout the list. It is to be remarked that the present generation of the nobility is by no means so prolific as was the preceding one. Twins abounded in GEORGE the Fourth's time.

—Col. WILLIAM SCHOULER, of Boston, who for thirty years past has mixed as much and as familiarly with the leading men of the country as any man of the time, and who is one of the most agreeable men and pleasantest raconteurs in the republic, relates the following reminiscence of JOHN C. CALHOUN: "Some time before 1840 Mr. CALHOUN wrote to Mr. LAWRENCE that he had been adding to his landed estates, and would like to obtain a loan of $10,000 or $15,000 in Boston, where money was more plenty than in South Carolina, and the rate of interest not so high, for the payment of which he would give his notes and a mortgage upon his estate, which would be ample security. Mr. LAWRENCE said he consulted Mr. NATHAN APPLETON and one or two other wealthy citizens of Boston upon the subject, and it was agreed to raise the money for him, and take no security for the repayment but his own note. Mr. LAWRENCE informed Mr. CALHOUN of the arrangement which he had made, and expressed his gratification that it was in the power of himself and a few of his friends to do a kindness to one so distinguished, whose life had been devoted to the service of his country. Mr. CALHOUN immediately wrote back, declining the offer, and withdrawing his original request. He said it did not agree with his sense of propriety to accept a loan upon such terms; that in the discharge of his public duties he did not wish to be embarrassed by a sense of obligation to any one."

—Of all the BONAPARTES, Prince NAPOLEON appears to be the only one who had the good sense to anticipate the "rainy day," and make due fiscal preparation for it. His estate in Switzerland he has sold for $350,000, which, with other income-producing assets, will enable him to live quite like a gentleman in a fine new house he has just purchased in London. Prince N. was enterprising enough to save the choicest furniture, pictures, and objects of art that once glittered at Meudon and the Palais Royal.

—The eccentricities of kings, from HEROD to him of the Cannibal Islands—are they not written in the books? A fresher and odder peculiarity is that of ex-King GEORGE of Hanover, who surpasses even CHARLES V. in his eccentricities. He not only regards himself as fitted for death, but believes he is actually dead. One of his favorite amusements is to walk about the house in a shroud, and to sleep at night in a coffin, which he declares softer than a bed of eider-down.

—Rev. WILLIAM B. W. HOWE, rector of St. Philip's Church, Charleston, has been elected Assistant Bishop of P. E. Church in South Carolina.

Netted and Crochet Tidy, Figs. 1–4.

THE centre, squares, and edging of this tidy are worked in netted guipure, and the close part in ribbed crochet. Begin the tidy with the middle star, and, with cotton No. 40, make a foundation of 8 st. (stitches). Work the 1st round over a mesh three-fifths of an inch in circumference, always going forward.—On each foundation st. 2 st. 2d round.—Always alternately on the next st. of the preceding round 1 st., on the following (widened) st. 2 st. 3d–9th rounds.—1 st. on each st. of the preceding round, on each widened st., however, 2 st. By doing this eight triangular sections are formed; work these sections each separately to a point in rounds going backward and forward, working 2 st. off together with 1 st. at the end of each round. In working off the 2 st. in the last round, no new st. should be formed. After all the points are completed in this manner, draw the foundation st. closely together, fasten the thread, and cut it off. Then work the star in point de toile and point de reprise as shown by the illustration. The squares of the tidy are worked in straight netting with the same material. Each of these squares counts 15 holes in a square, and is worked in point de toile, point de reprise, and point d'esprit, as shown by Fig. 2. The star and the squares are joined by means of a crochet strip, as shown by the illustration. To do this, crochet with twisted crochet cotton No. 40 on the outer edge of the star the 1st round.—On each netted st. 4 sc. (single crochet), on the st. at the point of each point, however, 4 sc., 3 ch. (chain stitch), 4 sc. Begin the round at the hollow between two points; at the end of the round fasten to the first st. with 1 sl. (slip stitch). 2d round.—1 ch., turn the work, pass over the last st. of the preceding round, 1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round, on the 3 ch. at the point of the point, however, 2 sc., 3 ch., 2 sc.; in each hollow pass over 2 st. with 1 ch. At the end of the round fasten to the ch. with 1 sl. Work 28 rounds more like the round just described, going backward and forward, but in these rounds always pass over 3 st. (1 sc., 1 ch., 1 sc.) between every two points. In working the 28th round, fasten the netted squares on as shown by the illustration, passing the needle at the same time through the edge stitches of the squares. Finish the tidy round the edge with netted guipure edging. Figs. 4 and 5 give two suitable designs for this. The edging must, of course, be worked with the same material that is used for the squares. Figs. 2–4 show the square, as well as the edging, worked with finer material.

Sewing-Case with Pincushion, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS sewing-case is made of black enameled cloth and red flannel, and furnished on the inside with bands to hold scissors, needle-case, papers of needles, etc., and also with a needle-book of flannel and a covered box for thread, silk, etc. A pincushion is set on the cover of the box. At the middle of the cushion is a hollow for the thimble. The outer and inner sides of the sewing-case are ornamented, as shown by the illustrations, in point Russe embroidery. To make the sewing-case cut, first, a strip of black enameled cloth seventeen inches and a half long and five inches and a half wide, and a piece of red flannel of the same size. Baste the flannel on the under side of the enameled cloth, and backstitch the double material on the outside half an inch from the edge with two rows of stitching one-eighth of an inch apart, worked in blue and corn-colored saddler's silk, in such a manner that the colors alternate, as is shown by the illustration. Cut out the enameled cloth and lining at the outer edge in small pinked scallops. Paste a square card-board box, four inches large, in the middle of the inner lined side of the sewing-case. For this box take a piece of card-board five inches and a quarter square, cut this through one-half its thickness all around at a distance of half an inch from the outer edges, cut out the square parts half an inch large at each corner of the card-board, which is divided off by these incisions, bend the edges upward half an inch, and sew the ends together at the corners with a few stitches. Then cover the edge of the box on the outside with a strip of red flannel four-fifths of an inch wide and pinked at one (the under) side, and sew this to the edge of the box in herring-bone stitch with corn-colored and blue silk, as shown by Fig. 1. Cover the inner side of the box with white glazed paper, paste the box on the sewing-case, and fasten the points of the edge of the cover with a knot of white silk on the lining of the sewing-case without passing the needle through the enameled cloth. The cover of the box is made in a manner similar to the box itself, only somewhat larger. Furnish the upper side of the cover with a cushion of cotton batting with a hollow in the middle, and cover this cushion, in connection with the edge of the cover, with red flannel; the latter must previously have been ornamented in herring-bone stitch with black and white saddler's silk, as shown by Fig. 1, and in point Russe stars with white, green, yellow, and blue saddler's silk, and cut the outer edge in small points. Gather the corners of this part slightly, and ornament them with knots of white silk. Furnish the side edges of the cover with a pinked strip of red flannel, as shown by Fig. 1, which is four-fifths of an inch wide in the middle, and sloped toward the ends to two-fifths of an inch. On each point of this strip work a knot with white silk, fastening the strips at the same time. These knots are worked all around in the hollow of the cushion. Fasten one side of the cover to one side of the box by means of silk ribbons. Sew a square piece of red flannel four inches and three-quarters large, and cut in points round the edge, on one end of the sewing-case in herring-bone stitch with white silk, as shown by Fig. 1. At the edge which comes on the end of the sewing-case this part is cut out in pinked scallops and ornamented in herring-bone stitch; this edge is not fastened on the lining of the sewing-case. Sew through the lining and flannel part at the same time with knots of white silk, so as to form separate divisions for papers of needles, etc., as shown by Fig. 1; and furnish the flannel part, as shown by the illustration, with separate bands of red flannel, which are cut out in points, and are intended to hold scissors, needle-case, etc. At a distance of four inches and three-quarters from the other end of the sewing-case, sew a piece of white silk ribbon three-quarters of an inch wide on the lining in herring-bone stitch; the ends of this ribbon project over the sides of the sewing-case six inches, and serve to fasten the needle-book. For the latter cut two pieces of red flannel each four inches and a half wide and eight inches and three-quarters long, cut each part in small points around the edge, and ornament it in herring-bone stitch with white silk. Lay these pieces together, and join them along the middle with chain stitches of white silk; then at the ends of this seam, at a distance of four-fifths of an inch from each side of the flannel pieces, cut a crosswise slit half an inch long. Work these slits in button-hole stitch with white silk. Finally, pass the ends of the ribbon through the slits of the needle-book, as shown by the illustration, and tie them in a bow.

Tapestry Border for Chairs, Rugs, etc.

See Illustration on page 388.

THIS border is suitable for ornamenting easy-chairs, rugs, carpets set together of strips of tapestry and plush, etc. It is worked on canvas in cross stitch, with zephyr worsted and filling silk, in the colors given in the description of symbols, or any other that may be desired.

Traveling Pillow.

THIS three-cornered cushion is designed especially for traveling, and is arranged so that it may either be hung over the back of the seat by the cords fastened to the upper corner, or pinned to the cushion of the carriage or car. It is made of purple muslin, filled with feathers. The ends are furnished with a puffing of red silk, and the cushion is covered with fine white linen. The ends of the linen cover are cut in points two inches and a quarter deep, and worked in button-hole stitch; buttons and loops are set on the ends of these points to fasten the cover securely on the cushion. The centre of the linen cover is ornamented with an embroidered vignette, suitable designs for which may be found in the last number of the Bazar. Red silk cords with tassels complete the cushion. The original is eighteen inches long at the under straight edge, and measures twelve inches and four-fifths from the middle of this edge to the upper point. It may, of course, be made of any size; and curled hair, sea-moss, or elastic sponge may be substituted for feathers.

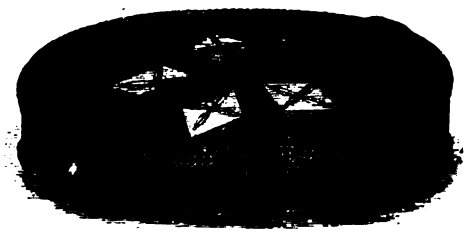

Fig. 1.—TRAVELING MIRROR.—CLOSED.

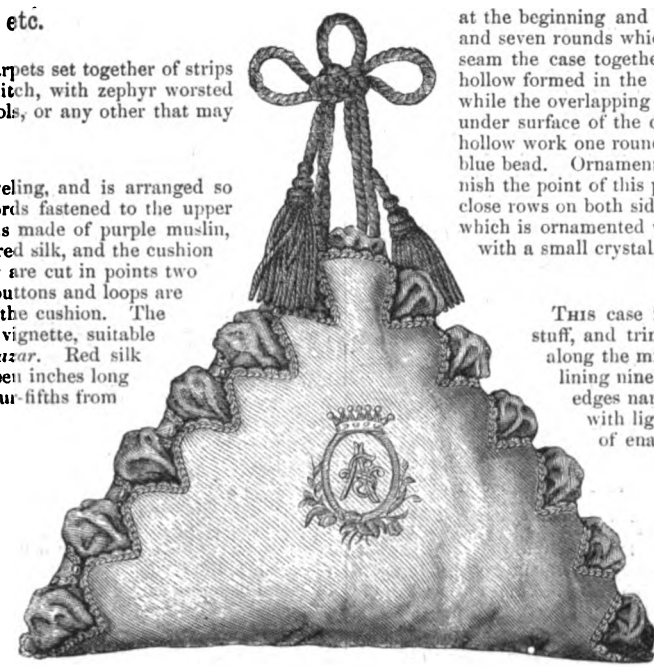

TRAVELING PILLOW.

Traveling Mirror, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS round mirror is five inches and three-fifths in diameter, and is set in a case of corresponding shape, so that it may be opened out as shown by Fig. 2, and inclosed in the case as shown by Fig. 1. The case is made of pasteboard covered with green cloth and black enameled cloth, and is ornamented with embroidery in green saddler's silk. Cut four round pieces of pasteboard five inches and three-fifths in diameter, and cover each of these pieces on both sides with shirting. Cover two of these parts on one side first with green cloth, and then with black enameled cloth, and cut out the latter in the middle in the design shown by Fig. 1. Along the edges of the design figures thus formed button-hole stitch the edges of the enameled cloth in green saddler's silk with the underlayer of cloth, and work point Russe stars between the design figures with the same silk. Furnish one side of the third piece of pasteboard with thin wadding and green cloth; then lay this piece on one of the pieces previously covered in such a manner that the sides covered with shirting come on each other, and button-hole stitch the pieces together around the edge with green silk. Finally, to the outer edge of these pieces, which form the bottom of the case, sew a narrow pasteboard rim to the side covered only with cloth; this rim is covered on one (the outer) side with enameled cloth, and on the other side with cloth. The edges of both covers are button-hole stitched together with green silk. On one side of the fourth piece of pasteboard covered only with shirting lay the mirror, and fasten the latter by means of a flat edge of green cloth four-fifths of an inch wide, which is laid double over a thin interlining of wadding. This edge must be made to fit the shape of the mirror. Button-hole stitch the double material together at the outer and inner edge, and ornament the upper layer with point Russe embroidery in green silk, as shown by Fig. 2, and the inner edge with green silk cord. Button-hole stitch the outer edge of the edge thus completed to the outer edge of the piece of pasteboard furnished with a mirror, join this part with the still remaining piece of pasteboard so that both sides covered with shirting come on the inside, and cover the seam with silk cord. Sew silk cord also to the under edge of the case. Cover a flat wooden mesh (netting mesh) four inches and four-fifths long and two-fifths of an inch wide with black enameled cloth on both sides, button-hole stitch the edges of this cover (which must project two-fifths of an inch at both ends of the mesh) together on both sides, and sew that part of the cover which projects at one end of the mesh down to the under side of the mirror, as shown by Fig. 1, and the other projecting end to the upper edge of the case. By means of this mesh the mirror is opened out as shown by Fig. 2. Finally, set a button and elastic loop on the mirror and case for fastening it together, as shown by the illustration, Fig. 1.

Crochet Case for Pocket Comb.

THIS case is worked in single crochet with white twisted crochet cotton, small crystal beads, and blue beads. First string the beads on the working thread, alternating two blue and two crystal beads. When the requisite number is strung on (take up only one crystal bead at the end) make a foundation of 38 stitches with the working thread, without paying any attention to the beads, close the foundation in a ring with one slip stitch, and on this foundation work 46 rounds of single crochet; before working each single crochet take up one bead; the beads must come on the outer side of the work (the under side of the stitches). Now follow 17 rounds worked in the foregoing design, but not in the round; the thread must, therefore, be cut off at the end of each of the rounds. In the first of these rounds (47th) pay no attention to the last five stitches of the preceding round, and also in the 48th round take no notice of the two stitches before and after the five stitches of the preceding round referred to; the 49th, 50th, and 51st rounds are likewise narrowed two stitches each at the beginning and end. Next follow five rounds of the same number of stitches, and seven rounds which are narrowed one stitch each at the beginning and end. Overseam the case together at the under edge; in doing this it is to be observed that the hollow formed in the 47th–51st rounds forms the top of the upper surface of the case, while the overlapping piece worked in the last 12 rounds must be a continuation of the under surface of the case. On the edge stitches along the overlapping piece and the hollow work one round of single crochet; in working each of these stitches take up one blue bead. Ornament the overlapping piece with small scallops of blue beads, and furnish the point of this part with a small loop and tassel for closing. Sew blue beads in close rows on both sides of the case, and trim it in a similar manner at the under end, which is ornamented with small bead scallops. Furnish the upper surface of the case with a small crystal button.

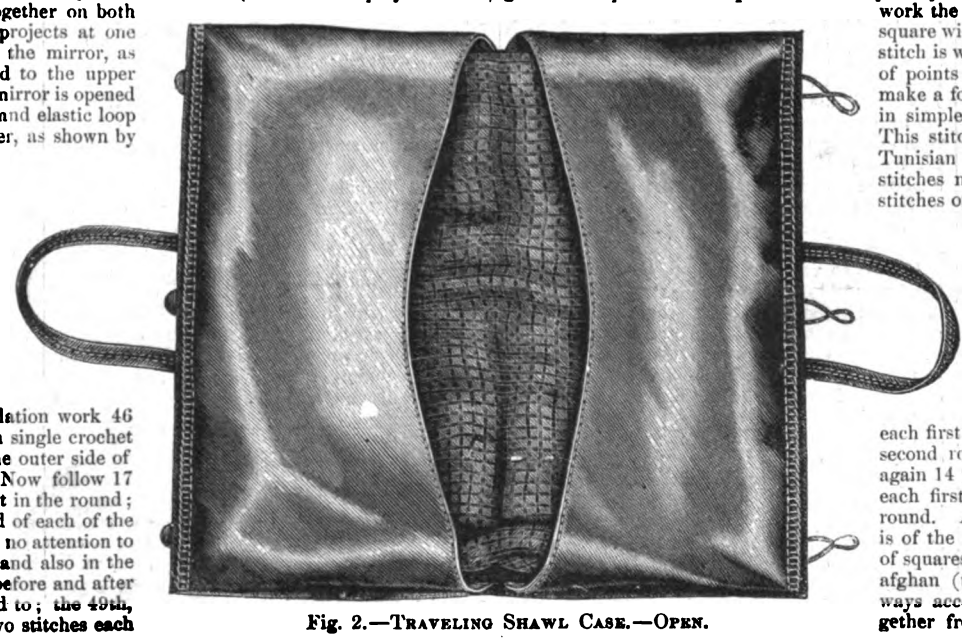

Fig. 2.—TRAVELING SHAWL CASE.—OPEN.

Traveling Shawl Case, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS case is made of dark brown enameled cloth, lined with black twilled stuff, and trimmed with bias strips of enameled cloth, which are stitched on along the middle with lighter brown silk. Cut a piece of enameled cloth and lining nineteen inches square. Lay the outside on the lining, turn down the edges narrow on the inside, quilt them on the outside along the outer edge with light brown silk, and trim the piece around the edge with bias strips of enameled cloth a quarter of an inch wide each, which are stitched through the middle. To form the corners, lay the bias strips in pleats, as shown by the illustration. Cut a bias strip of enameled cloth an inch and a half wide and sixty-two inches and a quarter long, join this at the ends, and baste the sides over on one side each a quarter of an inch wide, so that the edges come on each other at the middle. Then sew the strip on the case with two rows of stitching as shown by the illustration. These rows of stitching serve at the same time to fasten the folded edges of the bias strip. The ends of the strip, which project equally at both sides, form the handles of the case. Small bands of enameled cloth are fastened under the handles, as shown by the illustration. Furnish the inner side of the case thus far completed with two bags of enameled cloth and black twilled stuff, as shown by Fig. 2. For each of these bags cut of the materials referred to each one piece nine inches wide and twenty-one inches and a half long, and cut these pieces out toward the middle on one side. Stitch the material and lining together, and sew the bags on the case as shown by the illustration; in doing this lay the ends of the bags in a pleat. Finally, furnish the case with buttons and loops of elastic cord for closing.

CROCHET CASE FOR POCKET COMB.

Crochet Traveling, Carriage, or Cradle Afghans, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—This afghan, of which the illustration shows a section reduced in size, is worked with two shades of green tapestry worsted in Tunisian (Victoria) and wave crochet stitch. It consists of separate strips of points, which are joined with strips of connected squares. The strips of squares are ornamented in cross stitch embroidery. The afghan is edged with a fringe of green tapestry worsted in two shades. Work the strips of squares with the lighter worsted as follows: On a foundation of 3 ch. (chain stitch) work 12 pr. (pattern rows) in the simple Tunisian stitch; at the end of the first round of these 12 pr., however, widen one stitch, taking up one stitch of the last vein of the horizontal row of slip stitches of the preceding pattern row before working the last stitch. At the end of the second round of each pr. widen one stitch also, working 1 ch. there, so that the first stitch at the beginning of the following pr. may be taken up from the first vertical vein of stitches of the preceding pr. Now work 1 pr. without changing the number of stitches, then 12 pr., in which narrow one stitch each at both sides of the square. To do this, work off together as one stitch the first two and the last two vertical veins of stitches at the beginning and at the end of the second round of each pr.; in the first round of the following pr. take up one stitch only of each two stitches worked off together. Repeat these 25 pr. until the strip of squares is of the length desired for the afghan. Then work the design figure shown by the illustration on each square with dark green worsted in cross stitch; each cross stitch is worked on one crochet stitch. Crochet the strips of points in wave stitch with the darker worsted. First make a foundation of 12 stitches, and on this work 1 pr. in simple Tunisian stitch, then 13 pr. in wave stitch. This stitch is worked in a manner similar to the simple Tunisian stitch, only in the first round of each pr. the stitches must not be taken up from the vertical veins of stitches on the right side of the work, but from the vertical veins of stitches on the under side of the work, so that the horizontal row of slip stitches of the pr. previously worked projects to the right side of the work. Narrow one stitch at the end of the first round of each of these 14 pr., and widen one stitch at the end of each second round. This narrowing and widening are done in the same way as in the strips of squares. * Now follow 14 pr. in wave stitch, in which widen one stitch each at the end of each first round, and narrow one stitch at the end of each second round, again as in the strips of squares; then again 14 pr., in which narrow one stitch at the end of each first round, and widen at the end of each second round. Always repeat from * until the strip of points is of the requisite length. After making as many strips of squares and points as are required for the width of the afghan (these strips must be commenced in different ways according to the illustration), work the strips together from the right side with dark green worsted in single crochet, at the same time passing the needle through the edge alternately at greater or less depth. Finally, fasten single strands of light and dark green worsted to the afghan for fringe (see illustration).

Fig. 2.—This afghan is worked with coarse carpet yarn of three shades of brown in Tunisian crochet stitch, and is ornamented in cross stitch embroidery with the lightest and darkest brown worsted. The afghan is edged with fringe of dark brown worsted. First work the foundation of the afghan, and then the border which surrounds the foundation. The foundation consists of separate strips, which are crocheted with the lighter and the medium brown worsted so that squares are formed. Begin the first strip with the darker worsted with a foundation of 18 stitches, and on this work 16 pr. without changing the number of stitches. This forms the first square. After working the last pr. cut off the working thread, lay on the lighter worsted, and with this also work 16 pr. Work alternately one dark and one light square in this manner until the strip is of the length desired for the foundation of the afghan. A dark square must form the end of the strip. The remaining strips are worked in a similar manner, alternately one strip beginning and ending with a dark square, the other strip beginning and ending with a light square, so that afterward, on joining the strips, the squares are alternate. This joining is done with the crochet needle, but without working thread, in the following manner: Lay the two strips to be joined side by side, pass the crochet needle through the first edge stitch of one strip, draw the first edge stitch of the second strip through the edge stitch on the needle; then draw the following edge stitch of the first strip through the stitch on the needle, then the next edge stitch of the other strip, and so on. When both strips are joined in this manner, drop the last stitch from the needle, and sew it on with a few stitches. For the border at the outer edge of the afghan work four strips with the darkest brown worsted, first the two strips for the upper and under ends of the afghan. For each of these two strips make a foundation as long as the foundation of the afghan is wide, and on this work 18 pr. without changing the number of stitches, then join the two strips with the ends of the foundation in the manner described. Now work the two strips for the sides of the afghan; for each of these make a foundation of 20 stitches, and on this work as many pr. as are required for the length of the strip. These strips are joined with the foundation in the manner above referred to. Where the strips of the border meet they are sewed together on the under side, so that the joining shows as little as possible. Finally, finish the afghan with embroidery, as shown by the illustration, and edge it with fringe.

Designs for braiding Dresses, Covers, Cushions, etc., Figs. 1–17.

See Illustrations on page 396.

THESE designs consist of borders and corner figures, which are especially suited for ornamenting children's dresses, sacques, paletots, talmas, etc. They are worked with braid or fine cord, or else in chain stitch embroidery with black silk, split zephyr worsted, or red yarn. For cloth, cashmere, satin, or gros grain, silk soutache, silk cord, and chain stitch embroidery with saddler's silk are used. These designs may also be employed for ornamenting sofa cushions, afghans, etc. It may be observed that the corner figure marked 13 matches best with the border 1, the corner figure 14 with the border 10, the corner figure 15 with the border 12, the corner figure 16 with the borders 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and the corner figure 17 with the borders 5 and 9.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE MORNING AFTER.

THE day after the ball was a broken, straggling kind of day, after the usual manner of the to-morrow that succeeds a festival. Hale Castle was full to overflowing with guests who, having been invited to spend one night, were pressed to stay longer. The men spent their afternoon for the most part in the billiard-room, after a late, lingering luncheon, at which there was a good deal of pleasant gossip. The women sat together in groups in the drawing-room, pretending to work, but all desperately idle. It was a fine afternoon, but no one cared for walking or driving. A few youthful enthusiasts did, indeed, get up a game at croquet, but even this soul-enthralling sport was pursued with a certain listlessness.

Mr. Fairfax and Lady Geraldine walked in the garden, the lady looking superbly handsome in a dark blue velvet hat and jacket, trimmed with some pale silvery fur. To all appearance a perfect harmony prevailed between them. Clarissa, sitting alone in an oriel at the end of the drawing-room, watched them with weary eyes and a dull load at her heart, wondering about them perpetually, with a new pain mixed with her wonder.

If she could only have gone home, she thought to herself, what a refuge the dull quiet of her lonely life would have been! She had not slept five minutes since the festival of last night, but had lain, tossing wearily from side to side, thinking of what George Fairfax had said to her—thinking of what might have been and could never be, and then praying that she might do her duty—that she might have strength to keep firmly to the right if he should try to tempt her again.

He would scarcely do that, she thought. That wild, desperate talk of last night was perhaps the merest folly—a caprice of the moment, the shallowest rodomontade, which he would be angry with himself for having spoken. She told herself that this was so; but she knew now, as she had not known before last night, that she had given this man her heart.

It would be a hard thing to remain at Hale to perform her part in the grand ceremonial of the marriage, and yet keep her guilty secret hidden from every eye; above all, from his whom it most concerned. But there seemed no possibility of escape from this ordeal, unless she were to be really ill, and excused on that ground. She sat in the oriel that afternoon, wondering whether a painful headache, the natural result of her sleeplessness and hyperactivity of brain, might not be the beginning of some serious illness—a fever, perhaps, which would strike her down for a time, and make an end of all her difficulties.

She had been sitting in the window for a long time quite alone, looking out at the sunny garden and those two figures passing and repassing upon an elevated terrace, with such an appearance of being absorbed in each other's talk, and all-sufficient for each other's happiness. It seemed to Clarissa that she had never seen them so united before. Had he been laughing at her last night? she asked herself, indignantly; was that balcony scene a practical joke? He had been describing it to Lady Geraldine perhaps this afternoon, and the two had been laughing together at her credulity. She was in so bitter a mood just now that she was almost ready to believe this.

She had been sitting thus a long time, tormented by her own thoughts, and hearing the commonplace chatter of those cheerful groups, now loud, now low, without the faintest feeling of interest, when a heavy step sounded on the floor near her, and looking suddenly up, she saw Mr. Granger approaching her solitary retreat. The cushioned seat in the oriel, the ample curtains falling on either side of her, had made a refuge in which she felt herself alone, and she was not a little vexed to find her retreat discovered.

The master of Arden Court drew a chair toward the oriel, and seated himself deliberately, with an evident intention of remaining. Clarissa was obliged to answer his courteous inquiries about her health, to admit her headache as an excuse for the heaviness of her eyes, and then to go on talking about any thing he chose to speak of. He did not talk stupidly by any means, but rather stiffly, and with the air of a man to whom friendly converse with a young lady was quite a new thing. He spoke to her a good deal about the Court and its surroundings—which seemed to her a cruel kindness and an error in taste—and appeared anxious to interest her in all his improvements.

"You really must come and see the place, Miss Lovel," he said. "I shall be deeply wounded if you refuse."

"I will come if you wish it," Clarissa answered, meekly; "but you can not imagine how painful the sight of the dear old house will be to me."

"A little painful just for the first time, perhaps. But that sort of feeling will soon wear off. You will come, then? That is settled. I want to win your father's friendship if I can, and I look to you to put me in the right way of doing so."

"You are very good; but papa is so reserved—eccentric, I suppose most people would call him—and he lives shut up in himself, as it were. I have never known him make a new friend. Even my uncle Oliver and he seem scarcely more than acquaintances; and yet I know my uncle would do any thing to serve us, and I believe papa knows it too."

"We must trust to time to break down that reserve, Miss Lovel," Mr. Granger returned, cheerily; "and you will come to see us at the Court—that is understood. I want you to inspect Sophia's schools, and sewing classes, and cooking classes, and goodness knows what. There are plenty of the people who remember you, and will be delighted to welcome you among them. I have heard them say how kind you were to them before you went abroad."

"I had so little money," said Clarissa, "I could do hardly any thing."

"But, after all, money is not every thing with that class of people. No doubt they like it better than any thing in the present moment; but as soon as it is gone they forget it, and are not apt to be grateful for substantial benefits in the past. But past kindness they do remember. Even in my own experience I have known men who have been ungrateful for large pecuniary benefits, and yet have cherished the memory of some small kindness; a mere friendly word, perhaps, spoken at some peculiar moment in their lives. No, Miss Lovel, you will not find yourself forgotten at Arden."

He was so very earnest in this assurance that Clarissa could not help feeling that he meant to do her a kindness. She was ashamed of her unworthy prejudice against him, and roused herself with a great effort from her abstraction, in order to talk and listen to Mr. Granger with all due courtesy. Nor had she any farther opportunity of watching those two figures pacing backward and forward upon the terrace; for Mr. Granger contrived to occupy her attention till the bell rang, and afforded her the usual excuse of hurrying away to dress.

She was one of the last to return to the drawing-room, and to her surprise found Mr. Granger by her side, offering his arm in his stately way when the procession began to file off to the dining-room, oblivious of the claims which my lady's matronly guests might have upon him.

Throughout that evening Mr. Granger was more or less by Clarissa's side. His daughter, perceiving this with a scarcely concealed astonishment, turned a deaf ear to the designing compliments of Captain Westleigh (who told himself that a fellow might just as well go in for a good thing as not when he got a chance), and came across the room to take part in her parent's conversation. She even tried to lure him away on some pretense or other; but this was vain. He seemed rooted to his chair by Clarissa's side—she listlessly turning over a folio volume of steel plates, he pointing out landscapes and scenes which had been familiar to him in his continental rambles, and remarking upon them in a somewhat disjointed fashion—"Marathon, yes—rather flat, isn't it? But the mountains make a fine background. We went there with guides one day, when I was a young man. The Acropolis—hum! ha!—very fine ruins, but a most inconvenient place to get at. Would you like to see Greece, Miss Lovel?"

Clarissa gave a little sigh—half pain, half rapture. What chance had she of ever treading that illustrious soil, of ever emerging from the narrow bondage of her dull life? She glanced across the room to the distant spot where Lady Geraldine and George Fairfax sat playing chess. He had been there. She remembered his pleasant talk of his wanderings on the night of their railroad journey.

"Who would not like to see Greece?" she said.

"Yes, of course," Mr. Granger answered, in his most prosaic way. "It's a country that ought to be remarkably interesting; but unless one is very well up in its history, one is apt to look at every thing in a vague, uncertain sort of manner. A mountain here, and a temple there—and then the guides and that kind of people contrive to vulgarize every thing somehow; and then there is always an alarm about brigands, to say nothing of the badness of the inns. I really think you would be disappointed in Greece, Miss Lovel."

"Let me keep my dream," Clarissa answered, rather sadly; "I am never likely to see the reality."

"You can not be sure of that; at your age all the world is before you."

"You have read Grote, of course, Miss Lovel?" said Miss Granger, who had read every book which a young lady ought to have read, and who rather prided herself upon the solid nature of her studies.

"Yes, I have read a good deal of Grote," Clarissa replied, meekly.

Miss Granger looked at her as if she rather doubted this assertion, and would like to have come down upon her with some puzzling question about the Archons or the Areopagus, but thought better of it, and asked her father if he had been talking to Mr. Purdew.

Mr. Purdew was a landed gentleman of some standing, whose estate lay near Arden Court, and who had come with his wife and daughters to Lady Laura's ball.

"He is sitting over there, near the piano," added Sophia; "I expected to find you enjoying a chat with him."

"I had my chat with Purdew after luncheon," answered Mr. Granger; and then he went on turning the leaves for Clarissa with a solemn air, and occasionally pointing out to her some noted feature in a landscape or city. His daughter stared at him in supreme astonishment. She had seen him conventionally polite to young ladies before to-night, but this was something more than conventional politeness. He kept his place all the evening, and all that Sophia could do was to keep her place also.

When Clarissa was lighting her candle at a table in the corridor, Mr. Fairfax came up to her for the first time since the previous night.

"I congratulate you on your conquest, Miss Lovel," he said, in a low voice.

She looked up at him with a pale, startled face, for she had not known that he was near her till his voice sounded close in her ear. "I don't understand you," she stammered.

"Oh, of course not; young ladies never can understand that sort of thing. But I understand it very well, and it throws a pretty clear light upon our interview last night. I wasn't quite prepared for such wise counsel as you gave me then. I can see now whence came the strength of your wisdom. It is a victory worth achieving, Miss Lovel. It means Arden Court.—Yes, that's a very good portrait, isn't it?" he went on in a louder key, as a little cluster of ladies came toward the table; "a genuine Sir Joshua, I believe."

And then came the usual good-nights, and Clarissa went away to her room with those words in her ears, "It means Arden Court."

Could he be cruel enough to think so despicably of her as this? Could he suppose that she wanted to attract the attention of a man old enough to be her father, only because he was rich and the master of the home she loved? The fact is that Mr. Fairfax—not too good or high-principled a man at the best of times, and yet accounting himself an honorable gentleman—was angry with himself and the whole world, most especially angry with Clarissa, because she had shown herself strong where he had thought to find her weak. Never before had his vanity been so deeply wounded. He had half resolved to sacrifice himself for this girl—and behold, she cared nothing for him!

CHAPTER XV.

CHIEFLY PATERNAL.

THE preparations for the wedding went on. Clarissa's headache did not develop into a fever, and she had no excuse for flying from Hale Castle. Her father, who had written Lady Laura Armstrong several courteous little notes expressing his gratitude for her goodness to his child, surprised Miss Lovel very much by appearing at the Castle one fine afternoon to make a personal acknowledgment of his gratitude. He consented to remain to dinner, though protesting that he had not dined away from home—except at his brother-in-law's—for a space of years.

"I am a confirmed recluse, my dear Lady Laura, a worn-out old bookworm, with no better idea of enjoyment than a good fire and a favorite author," he said; "and I really feel myself quite unfitted for civilized society. But you have a knack at commanding, and to hear is to obey; so if you insist upon it, and will pardon my morning dress, I remain."

Mr. Lovel's morning dress was a suit of rather clerical-looking black from a fashionable West End tailor—a costume that would scarcely outrage the proprieties of a patrician dinner-table.

"Clarissa shall show you the gardens between this and dinner-time," exclaimed Lady Laura. "It's an age since you've seen them, and I want to know your opinion of my improvements. Besides, you must have so much to say to her."

Clarissa blushed, remembering how very little her father ever had to say to her of a confidential nature, but declared that she would be very pleased to show him the gardens; so, after a little more talk with my lady, they set out together.

"Well, Clary," Mr. Lovel began, with his kindest air, "you are making a long stay of it."

"Too long, papa. I should be so glad to come home. Pray don't think me ungrateful to Lady Laura; she is all goodness; but I am so tired of this kind of life, and I do so long for the quiet of home."

"Tired of this kind of life! Did ever any one hear of such a girl! I really think there are some people who would be tired of Paradise. Why, child, it is the making of you to be here! If I were as rich as—as that fellow Granger, for instance; hang Crœsus! I couldn't give you a better chance. You must stay here as long as that good-natured Lady Laura likes to have you; and I hope you'll have booked a rich husband before you come home. I shall be very much disappointed if you haven't."

"I wish you would not talk in that way, papa; nothing would ever induce me to marry for money."

"For money; no, I suppose not," replied Mr. Lovel, testily; "but you might marry a man with money. There's no reason that a rich man should be inferior to the rest of his species. I don't find any thing so remarkably agreeable in poor men."

"I am not likely to marry foolishly, papa, or to offend you in that way," Clarissa answered, with a kind of quiet firmness, which her father inwardly execrated as "infernal obstinacy;" "but no money in the world would be the faintest temptation to me."

"Humph! Wait till some Yorkshire squire offers you a thousand a year pin-money; you'll change your tone then, I should hope. Have you seen any thing of that fellow Granger, by-the-way?"

"I have seen a good deal of Mr. and Miss Granger, papa. They have been staying here for a fortnight, and are here now."

"You don't say so? Then I shall be linked into an intimacy with the fellow. Well, it is best to be neighborly, perhaps. And how do you like Mr. Granger?"

"He is not a particularly unpleasant person, papa; rather stiff and matter-of-fact, but not ungentlemanly; and he has been especially polite to me, as if he pitied me for having lost Arden."

In a general way Mr. Lovel would have been inclined to protest against being pitied, either in his own person or that of his belongings, by such a man as Daniel Granger. But in his present humor it was not displeasing to him to find that the owner of Arden Court had been especially polite to Clarissa.

"Then he is really a nice fellow, this Granger, eh, Clary?" he said, airily.

"I did not say nice, papa."

"No, but civil and good-natured, and that kind of thing. Do you know, I hear nothing but praises of him about Arden; and he is really doing wonders for the place. Looking at his work with an unjaundiced mind, it is impossible to deny that. And then his wealth!—something enormous, they tell me. How do you like the daughter, by-the-way?"

This question Mr. Lovel asked with something of a wry face, as if the existence of Daniel Granger's daughter was not a pleasing circumstance in his mind.

"Not very particularly, papa. She is very good, I dare say, and seems anxious to do good among the poor; and she is clever and accomplished, but she is not a winning person. I don't think I could ever get on with her very well."

"That's a pity, since you are such near neighbors."

"But you have always avoided any acquaintance with the Grangers, papa," Clarissa said, wonderingly.

"Yes, yes, naturally. I have shrunk from knowing people who have turned me out of house and home, as it were. But that sort of thing must come to an end sooner or later. I don't want to appear prejudiced or churlish; and, in short, though I may never care to cross that threshold, there is no reason Miss Granger and you should not be friendly. You have no one at Arden of your own age to associate with, and a companion of that kind might be useful. Has the girl much influence with her father, do you think?"

"She is not a girl, papa; she is a young woman. I don't suppose she is more than three or four and twenty, but no one would ever think of calling Miss Granger a girl."

"You haven't answered my question."

"I scarcely know how to answer it. Mr. Granger seems kind to his daughter, and she talks as if she had a great deal of influence over him; but one does not see much of people's real feelings in a great house like this. It is 'company' all day long. I dare say Mr. and Miss Granger are very fond of one another, but—but—they are not as much to each other as I should like you and me to be, papa," Clarissa added with a sudden boldness.

Mr. Lovel coughed, as if something had stuck in his throat.

"My dear child, I have every wish to treat you fairly—affectionately, that is to say," he replied, after that little nervous cough; "but I am not a man given to sentiment, you see, and there are circumstances in my life which go far to excuse a certain coldness. So long as you do not ask too much of me—in the way of sentiment, I mean—we shall get on very well, as we have done since your return from school. I have had every reason to be satisfied."

This was not much, but Clarissa was grateful even for so little.

"Thank you, papa," she said, in a low voice; "I have been very anxious to please you."

"Yes, my dear, and I hope—nay, am sure—that your future conduct will give me the same cause for satisfaction; that you will act wisely, and settle the more difficult questions of life like a woman of sense and resolution. There are difficult questions to be solved in every woman's life, you know, Clary; and woe betide the one who lets her heart get the better of her head!"

Clarissa did not quite understand the drift of this remark, but her father dismissed the subject in his lightest manner before she could express her bewilderment.

"That's quite enough serious talk, my dear," he said; "and now give me the carte du pays. Who is here besides these Grangers? and what little social comedies are being enacted? Your letters, though very nice and dutiful, are not quite up to the Horace Walpole standard, and have not enlightened me very much about the state of things."

Clarissa ran over the names of the Castle guests. There was one which she felt would be difficult to pronounce, but it must needs come at last. She wound up her list with it: "And—and there is Lady Geraldine Challoner, and the gentleman she is going to marry—Mr. Fairfax."

To her extreme surprise the name seemed to awaken some unwonted emotion in her father's breast.

"Fairfax!" he exclaimed; "what Fairfax is that? You didn't tell me whom Lady Geraldine was to marry when you told me you were to officiate as bride-maid. Who is this Mr. Fairfax?"

"He has been in the army, papa, and has sold out. He is the heir to some great estate called Lyvedon, which he is to inherit from an uncle."

"His son!" muttered Mr. Lovel.

"Do you know Mr. Fairfax, papa?"

"No, I do not know this young man. But I have known others—members of the same family—and have a good reason for hating his name. He comes of a false, unprincipled race. I am sorry for Lady Geraldine."

"He may not have inherited the faults of his family, papa."

"May not!" echoed Mr. Lovel, contemptuously; "or may. I fancy these vices run in the blood, child, and pass from father to son more surely than a landed estate. To lie and betray came natural to the man I knew. Great Heaven! I can see his false smile at this moment."

This was said in a low voice—not to Clarissa, but to himself—a half-involuntary exclamation. He turned impatiently presently, and walked hurriedly back toward the Castle.

"Let us go in," he said. "That name of Fairfax has set my teeth on edge."

"But you will not be uncivil to Mr. Fairfax, papa?" Clarissa asked, anxiously.

"Uncivil to him! No, of course not. The man is Lady Laura's guest, and a stranger to me; why should I be uncivil to him?"

Nor would it have been possible to imagine, by-and-by, when Mr. Lovel and George Fairfax were introduced to each other, that the name of the younger man was in any manner unpleasant to the elder. Clarissa's father had evidently made up his mind to be agreeable, and was eminently successful in the attempt. At the dinner-table he was really brilliant, and it was a wonder to every one that a man who led a life of seclusion could shine forth all at once with more than the success of a professed diner-out. But it was to Mr. Granger that Marmaduke Lovel was most particularly gracious. He seemed eager to atone, on this one occasion, for all former coldness toward the purchaser of his estate. Nor was Daniel Granger slow to take advantage of his urbane humor. For some reason or other that gentleman was keenly desirous of acquiring Mr. Lovel's friendship. It might be the commoner's slavish worship of ancient race, it might be some deeper reason, that influenced him, but about the fact itself there could be no doubt. The master of Arden was eager to place his coverts, his park, his library, his hot-houses, his picture-gallery—every thing that he possessed—at the feet of his ruined neighbor. Yet even in his eagerness to confer these benefits there was some show of delicacy, and he was careful not to outrage the fallen man's dignity.

Mr. Lovel listened and bowed and smiled; pledged himself to nothing; waved off every offer with an airy grace that was all his own. A prime minister, courted by some wealthy place-hunter, could not have had a loftier air; and yet he contrived to make Mr. Granger feel that this was the inauguration of a friendship between them; that he consented to the throwing down of those barriers which had kept them apart hitherto.

"For myself, I am a hermit by profession," he said; "but I am anxious that my daughter should have friends, and I do not think she could have a more accomplished or agreeable companion than Miss Granger."

He glanced toward that young lady with a smile—almost a triumphant smile—as he said this. She had been seated next him at dinner, and he had paid her considerable attention—attention which had not been received by her with quite that air of gratification which Mr. Lovel's graceful compliments were apt to cause. He was not angry with her, however. He contemplated her with a gentle indulgence, as an interesting study in human nature.

"Well, Mr. Lovel," said Lady Laura, in a confidential tone, when he was wishing her good-night, "what do you think of Mr. Granger now?"

"I think he is a very excellent fellow, my dear Lady Laura, and that I am to blame for having been so prejudiced against him."

"I am so glad to hear you say that!" cried my lady, eagerly. She had drawn him a little way apart from the rest of her visitors, out of ear-shot of the animated groups of talkers clustered here and there. "And now I want to know if you have made any great discovery?" she asked, looking at him triumphantly.

He responded to the look with a most innocent stare.

"A discovery, my dearest Lady Laura—you mystify me. What discovery is there for me to make, except that Hale Castle is the most delightful place to visit?—and that fact I knew beforehand, knowing its mistress."

"But is it possible that you have seen nothing—guessed nothing? And I should have supposed you such a keen observer—such a profound judge of human nature."

"One does not enlarge one's knowledge of human nature buried among books as I have been. But, seriously, Lady Laura, what is the answer to the enigma—what ought I to have guessed or seen?"

"Why, that Daniel Granger is desperately in love with your daughter."

"With Clarissa! Impossible! Why, the man is old enough to be her father."

"Now, my dear Mr. Lovel, you know that is no reason against it. I tell you the thing is certain—palpable to any one who has had some experience of such matters, as I have. I wanted to bring this about; I had set my heart upon it before Clarissa came here, but I did not think it would be accomplished so easily. There is no doubt about his feelings, Mr. Lovel; I know the man thoroughly, and I never saw him pay any woman attention before. Perhaps the poor fellow is scarcely conscious of his own infatuation yet, but the fact is no less certain. He has betrayed himself to me ever so many times by little speeches he has let fall about our dear Clary. I think even the daughter begins to see it."

"And what then, my kind friend?" asked Mr. Lovel, with an air of supreme indifference. "Suppose this fancy of yours to be correct, do you think Clarissa would marry the man?"

"I do not think she would be so foolish as to refuse him," Lady Laura answered, quickly, "unless there were some previous infatuation on her side."

"You need have no apprehension of that," returned Mr. Lovel, sharply. "Clarissa has never had the opportunity for so much as a flirtation."

Lady Laura remembered that scene in the balcony with a doubtful feeling.

"I hope she would have some regard for her own interest," she said, thoughtfully. "And if such an opportunity as this were to present itself—as I feel very sure it will—I hope your influence would be exerted on the right side."

"My dear Lady Laura, my influence should be exercised in any manner you desired," replied Mr. Lovel, eagerly. "You have been so good to that poor friendless girl that you have a kind of right to dispose of her fate. Heaven forbid that I should interfere with any plans you may have formed on her behalf, except to promote them!"

"It is so good of you to say that. I really am so fond of my dear Clary, and it would so please me to see her make a great marriage, such as this would be. If Mr. Granger were not a good man, if it were a mere question of money, I would not urge it for a moment; but he really is in every way unexceptionable; and if you will give me your permission to use my influence with Clary—"

"My dear Lady Laura, as a woman, as a mother, you are the fittest judge of what is best for the girl. I leave her in your hands with entire confidence; and if you bring this marriage about, I shall say Providence has been good to us. Yes, I confess I should like to see my daughter mistress of Arden Court."

Almost as he spoke there arose before him a vision of what his own position would be if this thing should come to pass. Was it really worth wishing for at best? Never again could he be master of the home of his forefathers. An honored visitor, perhaps, or a tolerated inmate—that was all. Still it would be something to have his daughter married to a rich man. He had a growing, almost desperate, need of some wealthy friend who should stretch out a saving hand between him and his fast-accumulating difficulties; and who so fitted for this office as a son-in-law? Yes, upon the whole, the thing was worth wishing for.

He bade Lady Laura good-night, declaring that this brief glimpse of the civilized world had been strangely agreeable to him. He even promised to dine at the Castle again before long, and so departed, after kissing his daughter almost affectionately, in a better humor with himself and mankind than had been common to him lately.

"So that is young Fairfax," he said to himself, as he jogged slowly homeward in the Arden fly—the single vehicle of that kind at the disposal of the village gentility—"so that is the son of Temple Fairfax. There is a look of his father in his eyes, but not that look of wicked power in his face that there was in the Colonel's—not that thorough stamp of a bold, bad man. It will come, I suppose, in good time."

USEFUL RECIPES.

CANNED TOMATOES that are purchased from the canning factories are generally so little cooked, and in such large pieces, that a delightful breakfast dish may be made from them. Drain off all the liquor, and, having a small piece of butter melted in a dripping-pan, put in the pieces, place into a hot oven or on top of the stove, and let them fry a few minutes; season, and, if liked, add cream to them when you take them from the fire. Do not have too much butter in the pan, or they will be greasy.

A VERY NICE WAY OF COOKING EGGS is to break them in a saucer, one at a time, being careful to keep the yolk from breaking and running. Have ready in a dripping-pan some boiling water or milk; into this slide the eggs, letting them cook until set; take them up with a skimmer and place them in a dish, putting a little butter, salt, and pepper over them, or place them on buttered toast.

VELVET CREAM.—One coffee-cupful of wine, two-thirds of a box of COX'S gelatine dissolved in one pint of water, one coffee-cupful of sugar; set the mixture over the fire and let it come to a boil, strain it through a flannel bag; when it is nearly cold, add a pint of good rich cream; beat all well together and put into a mould.

SPANISH CREAM.—Place over the fire in a perfectly clean saucepan three pints of milk; in it put one ounce of COX'S gelatine, and let it boil slowly until dissolved; add three-quarters of a pound of best white sugar; take it from the fire, and add six beaten eggs, stirring it all the time, and adding the eggs slowly. Put it on the stove again, and let it thicken, all the time stirring; add flavoring to suit; let it cool a little; give one good beat, and pour it into the moulds. In this and the preceding recipe a little milk should be put into the moulds, rinse it round, and then pour it out: it keeps the "cream" from adhering and losing its form.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

LESS than two years ago a thrill of horror went through the length and breadth of our country at the sickening details of the "Avondale calamity." Again from the Pennsylvania coal regions has come the cry of anguish from scarce-rescued miners, and from the frantic widows and orphans of the suffocated dead. This time, also, the massacre of at least twenty unfortunate men was caused by the shaft taking fire; and there being only one shaft, the sole avenue of escape was made impassable, and all ventilation stopped. Immured in this dreadful sepulchre, the smoke from the burning timber and the deadly gases from the coal constantly accumulating, the thirty-seven Pittston miners, helpless and horror-stricken, awaited their fate. That any of this number were rescued from that deep, dark pit was due to the eager efforts made in their behalf. But who can realize the horror of that under-ground waiting for death, or the sudden shock of anguish falling, as in an instant, upon wives and children? There seems to be no doubt in any candid mind that miners, who are by necessity exposed to many dangers, should at least have the protection which two shafts would give them. The experiment of one opening only for ventilation, and for escape in time of danger, has been tried long enough—lives enough have been sacrificed to cause the public to demand that the law enforce protective measures.

The obstacles to be overcome in destroying the Column Vendôme were so great that the workmen employed on it predicted the ruin of the contractor who engaged to overthrow it. The terms promised were $7000, with a deduction of $100 a day for every day it was left standing after May 5; consequently $1100 were deducted from the amount agreed upon. The column was shattered to pieces in its fall, but the pedestal, which has always been considered the most admirable portion of the monument, remained standing.

As an illustration of the accuracy of newspaper details, it may be mentioned that one correspondent from Paris writes that the Column Vendôme broke into three pieces in falling. Another asserts that by its fall the column was shattered into "ten thousand atoms." There is only the insignificant discrepancy of nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven pieces, which is of no account whatever, and readers can take their choice.

The corner-stone of the new Capitol at Albany will be laid on June 24, with appropriate ceremonies.

The scenery on the American side of Niagara Falls has been much injured, it is said, by the proprietors of the land, who have been during the winter cutting down grand old trees, and selling the timber for fire-wood.

One evening, a week or two ago, a couple of drunken loafers entered a Brooklyn car and behaved in an outrageous manner, insulting to every one. The passengers were terrified, especially the ladies; and the conductor, who was not formidable in size, could neither make them behave nor leave the car. He looked anxiously for a police officer, but, of course, none appeared on the street. A new actor, however, did appear in the scene. A black-eyed gentleman (who was afterward ascertained to be one of Brooklyn's best detectives) quietly ordered the most insulting of the pair to get out of the car. The rough refused, whereupon the gentleman seized him, and by main force dragged him out of the car and deposited him in the middle of the street, while his comrade immediately followed him, to the delight and relief of every body. One of the passengers remarked, "Had Foster been served in this way, Putnam would be living to-day."

By the destruction of the Palais du Quai D'Orsay France has lost official records of national importance, as well as productions of artistic skill, which can not be restored. This magnificent building was begun in the time of Napoleon I., but not fully completed until the reign of Louis Philippe. The edifice consisted of four magnificent buildings, surrounding a vast court, and two wings inclosing two smaller courts. Toward the river the front presented a long line of windows, formed by nineteen arches, separated by Tuscan columns, above which was a series of the Ionic order, and over this a mixed Corinthian attic, crowned with an elaborate battlement. The interior of this grand edifice was on a scale commensurate with the administrative offices of a great empire. The walls of the staircases were ornamented with allegorical paintings. On the first story was the Hall of Audience for the Court of Accounts, which was decorated with paintings by eminent artists. The ground-floor, facing the river, was appropriated to the sittings of the Council of State. The Hall of the Pas Perdus, on this floor, was an elegant square apartment, in which four Doric columns sustained a balustrade opening into a vestibule of the upper story. There were five other halls, magnificently adorned, and containing portraits and pictures of great excellence. On the ground-floor was, also, the Salle des Séances Administratives, a saloon of great splendor, decorated with twenty Corinthian columns of white marble, with gilt capitals, and portraits of eminent Frenchmen. The coned ceiling was richly gilt in compartments, and contained five emblematical paintings. The palace cost $2,400,000.

An exchange states that the Boston artists have established a club, but that women are excluded from it, the reason assigned being that if women are admitted to the privileges of the club the men can not smoke!

About fifteen years ago a curious contract was made between a Miss Evans and a Mr. Cooper, which has resulted in a novel lawsuit in Chenango County. It seems from the newspaper accounts that Mr. Cooper agreed to give Miss Evans one ewe lamb and its increase until she was twenty-one years of age, in consideration of a gold watch-key. The suit was brought to recover the sheep or its equivalent. The evidence showed that the increase was to be in ewe lambs, and that the natural increase of a flock of sheep would double every year. According to this estimate, Miss Susie would have at the end of fifteen years 16,064 ewe lambs, which, at $4 per head, would amount to $64,256. The justice heard the evidence, and, like a wise man, reserved his judgment. What the final result of the suit is has not yet been reported.

Honesty is so rare that a Binghamton merchant was amazed the other day by a woman who came into his store to pay a debt of fourteen dollars which had been contracted twelve years ago. The debt had been given up as bad long before, but the woman paid it quietly, remarking that she had not found it convenient to settle it before.

The 30th of May was a great strawberry day. In order to make it as obvious that this is truth as it is that it is not poetry, we have only to mention that on that day 208,000 quarts of strawberries were received off the Delaware Railroad for the New York and Philadelphia markets. Also 48,000 quarts were sent from Baltimore to New York. This is said to be the largest amount ever shipped northward in a single day.

A most violent rain and hail storm interrupted the heated term which oppressed us before May had departed. In some sections of the country it caused great destruction of property, the fierce wind and the vivid, blinding lightning combining to do injury to forest and field, as well as to houses and cattle. There were many miraculous escapes from death. A new school-house in Rondout, on the Hudson, was struck by lightning. Five hundred children were gathered in it, and nearly every child was affected more or less, being for a moment almost paralyzed. They soon recovered from this, but a panic ensued, which only the presence of mind of the teachers prevented from resulting in a calamity. A lady in the same town, while leaning from the window of her residence, was struck by lightning, but, fortunately, it expended its fury on her back hair, scattering chignon and hair-pins in every direction; but she herself was unhurt, though stunned by the shock.

"The court-martial has ordered the use of the mitrailleuse in case of wholesale executions." There is something fearful in such a telegram as this coming from blood-stained, mangled Paris, even though it may have deserved its fate. Through what deep seas of blood are the once gay Parisians passing!

"Shelling" a city is attended with horrible details, of which general descriptions fail to convey any adequate idea. The mention of a few of the many tragical instances which occurred some time ago in Paris may show the necessary condition of the people during such military operations. A cook crossed the Avenue de la Grande Armée to get meat at a butcher's, when a shell struck him, killing him instantly. The butcher and wife were so terrified that they ran shrieking from their stall. Presently the wife of the dead man, alarmed at his long absence, went to see what had become of him. When she saw him lying lifeless on the floor, she gave a heart-rending scream, but immediately went to the door for help. At the threshold a musket ball struck her ankle, and she fell helpless, and lay, uncared for, many hours. A certain house was destroyed by a bomb-shell, and every one in it killed except one young man, who saved his life by clinging to the walls above the narrow ledge whereon his feet rested. It was some time before assistance came. He was crazy when removed. He lingered a few weeks, cowering with abject terror at the abyss which to his mind's eye constantly yawned at his feet, and then death relieved his sufferings. Some of the escapes reported are almost miraculous. A shell fell in a nursery full of children, and lodged under the cradle in which were three children playing. It lay where it lodged, without bursting. Another shell fell into a chamber where a man and his wife were sleeping. The walls were rent asunder, the furniture shattered, and even the bed torn in pieces, but the terrified couple escaped without injury. The effect of such shocks, however, is often disastrous to the nervous system.

ON AN APPLE.

MYSTERIOUS fruit! thy ruddy round
Sets frolic fancy flying.
Half hid in orchard-grass I found
Thee fallen. Day was dying;
Laura had left me there alone,
My parting kiss refusing;
And, since all joy with her had flown,
I fell to mumpish musing.

An apple! Well, 'tis juicy-sweet,
By Phœbus rarely roasted;
A lovelier or more luscious treat
Pomona never boasted.
And yet, and yet, one can't forget—
The painful thought will slip in—
The mischief mortal kind have met
From such another pippin.

Oh, Eve! if you content had been
With pear, or plum, or cherry,
Our world had shown a different scene—
Less mad, and far more merry.
And many a sermon had been spared
In churches and in chapels,
If we, your children, had not shared
Your luckless taste for apples.

Fair fruit! What strange, malignant fate
Links with your mellow glory
The perils of our fallen state,
The sadness of our story,
From those of old in captured Troy,
Whom Paris brought to sorrow,
To him, the orchard-robbing boy,
Who dreads his birch to-morrow?

How many souls associate
With you their trips and trials,
Of all on whom despotic fate
Has voided all her phials!
Eve and Œnone, Jack and Jill,
Myself, and Menelaus,
Find you a Dead Sea mockery still,
That tempts but to betray us.

What dismal destiny bestowed
Your dower of disaster?
Swift-footed Atalanta owed
To you her lord and master.
And Tell, and Tantalus—good lack!
On earth or with the gods,
You have a most distinguished knack
Of setting things at odds.

Per contra, fairness must forbid
The muse to be quite mute on
The little service once you did
To good Sir Isaac Newton.
But that was quite exceptional,
And surely is, beside, a
Right poor set-off against the Fall,
And that sad scene on Ida.

Thrice luckless fruit! our world had been Far better off without you;
Ribstone or russet, red or green,
There's some ill spell about you.
Mankind perchance had sager grown,
More fit with fate to grapple,
Had earth or Eden never known
A woman or an apple.

So grumbled I, when lo! a pair
Of pouting lips were proffered;
And—taken somewhat unaware—
I welcomed what they offered.
And verily 'tis wondrous strange,
And passing explanation,
The mighty metamorphic change
Wrought by that osculation.

Said Laura: "You're a silly goose,
Because a girl's capricious,
To whelm with eloquent abuse
A pippin so delicious.
And that old sneer at Mother Eve
Is worse than stale—it's shabby;
My poor old Bertie, I believe
You're growing tart and crabby."

Quoth I: "Sun-stinted fruit will lose
The sweetness of its savor,
And I grow sour if you refuse
The sunshine of your favor.
I'm sweet as drops from Hybla's hive
If you but smile; so do, love.
You are my Venus, and I give
The apple unto you, love."

She smiled—a more seductive smile
Ne'er came from Cytherea—
But thought my pseudo-classic style
A most absurd idea.
She would not take the apple—she
Was no pert pagan Venus;
And so, to save more words, d'ye see,
We ate the fruit between us.

A VISIT TO THE TAXIDERMIST.

A TAXIDERMIST'S shop is a museum in miniature. Here may be seen stuffed birds, animals, and reptiles of all kinds, from the polar bears and seals, designed for zoological collections, down to the pet canaries and poodles embalmed for sentimental owners. This last branch of business forms a large part of the taxidermist's trade. They also preserve great numbers of birds for ladies' bonnets, many thousands of which are put up every year for the milliners. The taxidermist must be a bit of an artist withal; for he not only has to stuff the bird or animal in such a manner as to preserve its proportions, but he must mount and pose it naturally, and supply it with glass eyes of the color and expression of life. It is said that of all animals the dog is one of the most difficult to prepare satisfactorily. In the pretty picture on page 392 the little girl seems to belong to the class of mourners above referred to. She is gazing tearfully at the bird in her hand, evidently trying to trace in its rigid form some resemblance to her lost favorite; while her little brother kicks and screams in his mother's lap, frightened out of his wits at the sight of the grinning monkey with which his father has sought to amuse him. Around the room stuffed owls, seals, deer, eagles, dogs, etc., give evidence of the taxidermist's art, and excite the interest and curiosity of visitors.

TWO BALLS.

THERE were three Misses Grosgrain when Martin Miller was a clerk in the drug store of Pill & Powder. They were pretty girls enough, and Nature had made amends for what fortune denied them, by superadding all the beauty and freshness of youth, and something more, which, together with their airs and graces, greatly impressed Martin's young imaginations, and carried them captive. They had an invalid mother at that time, and used often to drop into the store to have prescriptions made up, for toilette articles, or perfumery. Once Martin ventured to present Miss Georgianna with a vial of attar of roses, which so far won her good-will that she invited him to the house to play cribbage with the girls, as Miss Georgianna had her own particular young man, with whom she played a far more interesting game.

Evelyn and Louise, though allowing themselves to be flattered by the admiration of young Miller, yet held their heads very high, and hoped to make matches among the professions and the old families. However, Martin, being an unsuspicious soul, found the first evening in their society so sweet that he was fain to repeat the dangerous experiment, bringing often a bunch of flowers or a bundle of sweetmeats, in order to make his welcome sure; and the girls themselves were too fond of having the neighbors see such a smart-looking young man frequenting the house, so long as they did not know he was only a druggist's clerk, to make it other than pleasant for him; not that they would think of marrying a druggist's clerk, though he was very well to while away the time, to intoxicate with their charms, till a more desirable parti should appear. One day when there was to be a grand May-day ball, Martin bought tickets and went up to the Grosgrains', and invited Miss Evelyn and Miss Louise to accompany him. Georgianna was already invited by her Mr. Pewter, and Martin had repeatedly heard them both say that they would thank their stars for a chance to go, though they had by no means intended it as a hint to him, having very different escorts in view. When he broached the subject, however, they exchanged glances and hesitated. What was to be done? Young Mr. Bondholder, just returned from the European tour, was to be there; it would be too bad to lose the chance of meeting and dancing with him; at the same time, what would he think if he should find that they were escorted by a druggist's clerk? But would he know? Yes; it was only yesterday that they had met Mr. Bondholder in at Pill & Powder's taking a glass of soda, and had been invited to share that pleasure. What was to prevent him from recognizing the youth who served them? Still, if they should decline, what might they not lose? How much one evening, nay, one dance, had been known to bring about! What delicious whispers, what hand-clasps, what glances might be exchanged in the whirl of galop or Lancers! What infinite and happy possibilities were involved in the mazes of that ball!

"Thanks, Martin," spoke Louise; "if we can find any thing to wear we shall be delighted to go."

"An unexpected pleasure," sighed Evelyn. "Ah, that my godmother were here to change my old tarlatan into a new muslin!"

"Then I will call for you at nine;" and he went away happy as a king, and dreamed all night of polkaing round the world with Evelyn in his arms.

When the evening arrived he attired himself in new broadcloth, procured for the occasion, and hired the best carriage at Hay & Straw's stables, and rung at the Grosgrain bell with keen anticipation of a happy evening. The bell was answered by a slipshod house-maid, who briefly informed him that the young ladies had decided not to attend the ball that night, but had not been able to send him word. Martin turned away from the door without speaking; indeed, the maid told Miss Evelyn afterward that he bore it quite mild like. She had evidently counted upon a scene. But the blow had stunned him; he was like one walking in a dream. He discharged the carriage, and, regardless of his best broadcloth and thin shoes, paced up and down the pavement before the house, with no definite purpose in mind, but as if chained to the spot, till late in the evening, when, pausing under a lamp-post, he saw a carriage drive up to the Grosgrain door, and a gentleman whom he knew to be wealthy and well-born assist Evelyn and Louise to alight therefrom. They had been to some famous concert of the season. "Oh, the music was simply divine," Louise was saying; "I never enjoyed any thing more in my life."

"And you, Miss Evelyn?" asked Max Dole.

"I thank you for it."

Then the door closed upon them, and Max Dole drove away, leaving Martin under the lamp-post, perfectly restored to his senses. He went home and slept soundly, and did not dream of polkaing round the world with Evelyn in his arms.

The next time that Evelyn and Louise dropped in at the drug store Martin made no allusion to the ball, but served them as graciously as ever, and accepted their blundering apologies with compassionate amiability. But he did not drop their acquaintance. He went to play cribbage with them of an evening, now and then, though not so frequently as once; he sent fruit and flowers to the invalid mother on rare occasions; and one day he emerged from the chrysalis of a druggist's clerk into a partnership with the firm of Pulsifer & Co., chemists, and later into professorship of chemistry at a neighboring college. But Rome was not built in a day; neither were Martin's fortunes. Some years had elapsed since the little affair of the ball, and Evelyn and Louise were still the Misses Grosgrain, when the Prince of Wales came to this country and set every body dancing and feasting. When they read the announcement of his arrival in the evening papers, little did they dream that he brought a charming retribution in his wake.

"I met Professor Miller down in town this morning," said Louise on that same evening in which she had read of the Prince's arrival; "it seemed so funny to call him any thing but Martin. Heyday! I think he had a weakness for you, Eve; if it hadn't been for that ball, eh? But how could we guess that a poor druggist's clerk would ever blossom into a great chemist, condescending to the aristocracy? Dear me, what fools girls are! One needs to live twice in order to know how to live once. What if one of us—I think it was you, Eve—bartered a lifetime among the aristocracies of the intellect for the sake of our miserable pride and an evening passed with Senator Dole's son and heir! for I'm sure I would never have given up a ball for a concert if it hadn't tickled my vanity to be seen in the society of one of the élite."

"Don't talk about it," said Evelyn; "I've been ashamed to look Martin Miller in the face ever since. It makes my blood run cold to remember it. To be sure, we were young and giddy, with nobody to advise us; I hope he makes that allowance, or what must he think of us?"

"We didn't very much care what he thought of us then."

"Didn't we? I cared so much that it spoiled all the music for me; it made a perfect discord of the Fifth Symphony. But of course the pride of all the Grosgrains must look higher than a druggist's clerk; and it was, as you say, a great temptation to sweep into Music Hall with Max Dole, particularly as Elinor Heed intimated that he would invite her, without doubt. It was very silly, but I wanted her to see whom he did invite!"

"They are going to give the Prince a ball here," said Louise. "I wonder if we shall go?"

"Who do you think will invite us?"

"Nobody; but can't one be permitted to build a castle or two?"

"If one fancies that style of architecture. I don't see how you can make bricks without straw, though. And then isn't it customary to sit down and count the cost? As for me, I should prefer love in a cottage."

So the time wore on; and the Prince of Wales came, and every body turned out to stare at him, and climbed house-tops and trees and garden-posts, and rented windows at fabulous prices, and received him with open arms—and mouths. Every body, too, was concerting as to what should be worn at the grand ball, and the modistes were worn to a shadow in consequence. Eve and Louise met their friends going in and coming out of Holbrook's, of Madame Walther's, of Goodness-knows-who's, and they appeared to be lost in a fog of tulle and illusion and blonde, while those who were not trying on furbelows at the dress-makers' were pinching their feet into Cinderella's slippers at the shoe-makers'. And every where they were confronted with the question, "Are you not going to the ball?" as if the courses of the stars and orbits of the comets depended upon whether one danced with the Prince or not.

But at last there came a triumphant moment when they could answer, "Yes, we are going to the ball. Mr. Max Dole has invited us. We shall appear in blue and gold, and in pale pink. Madame Gore is to make our dresses. They will cost us more than we can afford, to be sure. We shall have to pinch in the housekeeping after it; but nobody knows when we shall get another chance to dance with royalty, not to speak of Mr. Max Dole, and one must make hay while the sun shines."

So they worked over their toilettes, and matched difficult shades, and got dreadful headaches for their pains; and found that their arms were not so plump as they had used to be; that their collar-bones had acquired a disagreeable habit of obtruding themselves upon public notice; that blue and pale pink were not so becoming as they had once been; and that one's hair had a disobliging tendency to become scant just when an abundance was most fashionable.

They even went so far as to engage a hair-dresser to make the best of the remnant; and after spending a couple of hours before the mirror, they were ready and radiant at the appointed time, waiting for the carriage and Mr. Max Dole. But carriages rolled up and stopped "over the way," and carriages rolled down and away without a feint of delaying at the Grosgrain door. A dozen times Louise drew aside the curtains and peered into the darkness at shadows and cross-lights, and a dozen times she turned away in vexation of spirit, and paced the hall and parlor like a weary sentinel, lest sitting down should crush the delicate butterfly attire and set a fold or drapery awry, exchanging smiles with Evelyn at the absurdity of the scene as they passed each other in their promenade, or paused before the glass to adjust a curl or ribbon.

So the minutes dragged themselves away. The flowers in Evelyn's bouquet and in Louise's hair were beginning to droop and die. Louise wondered what blessed mortal was floating with the Prince through enchanted circles of the waltz, and regretting her lost partners; while Eve had thrown herself into a chair, forgetful of appearances, forgetful of every thing but that this was the measure she had meted out to Martin Miller.

Twelve o'clock! How the bells blazoned it! "I think we had better go to bed," said Eve.

"What's the good?" objected Louise. "I shall lie awake till sunrise. I am too angry to sleep. Hark! There he is. 'And so, dear Sir, you've come at last. I thought you'd come no more. I've waited with my bonnet on from one till half past four,'" she sang, gayly changing her tune, shaking out the waves of her blue tulle for the last time, settling the bracelets upon her arms, pulling out a curl, conjuring a smile to hover about the vexed lips. As for Eve, she never moved till her tired eyes took in the face and figure, not of Max Dole, but of Professor Martin Miller, standing in the door-way and bowing from one to the other, with a rose in his button-hole.

"I am afraid," he was saying, "that you have been put to great vexation and trouble by Mr. Dole's delay; but, believe me, it was unavoidable. Mr. Dole has had a slight difficulty with his creditors, which has obliged him to transfer to me the pleasure of attending you to the ball, if you will allow it. The fact is, he was just stepping into his carriage when the officer claimed his attention. He immediately dispatched a messenger to me, knowing that I am a friend of your family; but as I was dining out of town the boy had some difficulty in finding me; my carriage also met with an accident on the way, which detained me still longer. I hope you will overlook the delay; it must have been exceedingly tedious. Miss Louise, Miss Evelyn, shall I have the happiness of conducting you to the carriage?"

Evelyn half rose from her seat and fell back, the color flickering and fading in her face, the eyes heavy with trembling tears. "Mr. Miller," she said, "I am ashamed to go."

"Oh, it is not too late, I assure you; they come and go at all hours at such places."

"I am ashamed to go," she repeated. "I ought not accept your kindness. I do not deserve it! I do not deserve it!"

"Miss Evelyn!"

"There, do not pretend that you have forgotten about it; I never can. I forfeited the pleasure of going any where with you long ago. You can not have forgiven such wicked rudeness. I hate to think how, under all your kindness, you must despise me in spite of yourself."

"Despise you! I never thought of such a thing. Excuse me for saying, at that time, I merely believed that I had been mistaken in you; that I had admired a shadow, excellences that had no existence; lost myself in worship before the curve of the brow, the tint of the cheek, thinking that they were types of the spirit within"—his eyes seeking hers—"and was punished for my presumption. What right had a druggist's clerk to love you?"

"Oh, he had the best right in the world!" cried Evelyn; "the best right in the world!"

"And the professor?" asked Louise, folding up her shawl, reluctantly, in the background; "and the professor?"

"The professor has never been able to outgrow the druggist clerk's infatuation. Shall he begin now? It shall be as you say. Do you love him, Eve, ever so little?"

"'Now all men besides are to me like shadows. I love you!'"

And they did not dance with the Prince, but lived happily ever after.

THE ARGAND BURNER.

THE following interesting article on this useful and familiar household convenience is from "Light," the new volume of the series on popular science by Jacob Abbott, just published by Harper & Brothers:

The only light for the streets of cities in Europe two or three hundred years ago was furnished by great flaming and smoking torches carried in the hand. The darkness at night, of course, afforded great facilities for the commission of all kinds of crime; and robberies, murders, and assassinations increased to such a degree that the government of Paris at one time organized a guard of armed men to patrol the streets in search of the criminals, lighting their way, of course, by the only kind of illumination they then knew how to produce, viz., that of blazing and smoking torches, which the linkman carried before them in his hand.

The true remedy for this state of things was to dispel the darkness which occasioned it by devising some way to increase the brightness of the light which could be given by a flame, and then lighting the streets by placing a fixed burner of this increased brightness at every corner.

The first method of attempting to do this was by means of a reflector placed behind the flame, so as to throw all that part of the sphere of light issuing from the flame which would naturally go back toward the wall, where it was not wanted, forward into the street. But very soon the attention of scientific men began to be turned to the question whether the intensity of the light itself could not be increased by increasing the intensity of the heat produced, and then promoting the rapidity of the combustion by a more complete and rapid supply of oxygen. There would evidently be a double advantage in this, for, by furnishing a full supply of oxygen, all the carbon would be consumed, instead of being allowed in part to escape unconsumed as smoke, and then, moreover, the particles which were consumed would be raised to a higher intensity of heat, and so would become more highly luminous.

Now, in the case of an ordinary fire of wood or of coal, the way to increase the supply of oxygen is to blow it with the bellows; that is, to send in, by means of the bellows, a rapid current of air containing the necessary oxygen. But it is a curious circumstance that, while the blowing of a solid fire makes it burn all the brighter, blowing the flame of a candle puts it out. What is the reason of this?

Fully to understand the reason, it must be observed that blowing a fire has three different effects upon it—first, to supply oxygen to it, and so make it burn faster; secondly, to cool it; and, thirdly, by its mechanical impulse, to blow the burning fuel away. In the case of the blacksmith's forge only the first of these effects is produced to any considerable extent. The current of air supplies oxygen to increase the combustion, which greatly increases the heat. It brings coolness too, and so prevents the heat from becoming as great as it would be if the bellows could blow hot air instead of cold; but the influence of the greater supply of oxygen in promoting the combustion is vastly greater in increasing the heat than the cooling effect, even in the coldest winter day, is in diminishing it. And as to the third effect, the coals being solid and comparatively heavy, the current of air is not strong enough to blow them away.

Digitized by Google

If, however, we imagine that the blast was so powerful as to blow the coals from the forge all over the blacksmith's shop, the fire would be put out by it at once—that is, as soon as the individual coals had time to go out in their new places, scattered over the bench and floor. If the coals were very small, this would be very soon; and if we imagine each one of them to be no larger than a particle of dust, the extinguishment would be almost instantaneous.

This is precisely what happens when we blow out a candle. The flame is a burning or incandescent gas, with extremely minute particles of solid carbon, infinitely finer than any visible dust, pervading it. When you blow it, therefore, with a strong puff of air, the whole incandescent gaseous mass is blown away, and is instantly cooled below the point of combustion; in other words, it goes out.

If there is at the time, however, a portion of the wick incandescent, as there usually is, that, as it can not be blown away, remains burning, and the more you blow upon it the brighter it glows, until, as fast as successive portions of it become loosened and driven off, the incandescent mass is diminished; and as the coolness of the blast prevents the combustion from extending itself to portions below, the wick, as well as the flame, is soon entirely extinguished.

So much for the philosophy of blowing out a candle.

In view of these facts and explanations it is easy to understand that one way, at least, of attempting to increase the light given out by any flame is to continue some mode of increasing the supply of oxygen for it without dispersing or scattering the burning materials; in other words, of "blowing" the candle or fire without blowing it out.

It was a Swiss inventor named Argand who first contrived to do this, and the contrivance which he devised is called the Argand burner to this day.

But, in order that you may clearly understand the principles of his invention, I must first say there are two ways of "blowing" fires in furnaces and forges—one by driving in the current of air by the force of propulsion below, and the other by drawing it in by the force of exhaustion in the chimney above.

The former is effected by means of bellows, and sometimes by another contrivance, called a fan-blower, by either of which a strong blast is forced into the fire at the grate. In some furnaces, where a very great heat is required, the air is heated before it is driven into the furnace, so that the full effect of the additional supply of oxygen may be secured without any diminution being caused by the coolness of the current of air.

The latter of the modes above mentioned—that is, the drawing of air in by the force of exhaustion in the chimney above—is effected by making the chimney very tall. The air within the chimney, being heated, is light and buoyant, and, of course, the taller the chimney the more buoyancy there is, and the greater the draft—that is, the faster the air is "drawn in," as we usually express it, though the real mode of operation is that the pressure of the atmosphere above the fire being taken off, in part, by the buoyancy of the hot air in the chimney, the air is forced in to the fire by the atmospheric pressure which acts on the orifice below.

Now Argand's plan was to furnish the increased supply of oxygen to the fire in the flame of the lamp or candle by "drawing it in" from below by means of a chimney, and he also conceived the thought of bringing in the current in the middle of the flame instead of around the outside of it.

Argand, as has already been said, was a Swiss. He was of quite humble origin, but he received a scientific education, and in the earlier part of his life he was engaged very successfully in the southern part of France in connection with industrial occupations, in which his scientific knowledge, and especially his knowledge of chemistry, were of great service.

His attention was called while thus employed to the subject of light, especially for use in manufacturing and other such establishments; for in those days—near the close of the last century—there was nothing in use for artificial light but such naked, smoking, and flickering flames as are given out by common lampe, torches, and flambeaux. His knowledge of chemistry showed him that the reason why the flames were not bright was the scantiness of the supply of air, which could only reach the flame on the outside. It had been discovered some time previously that an ordinary flame was hollow—being bright only on the outer surface of it—as, of course, it must be, as in the case of such a flame there is no access to the air within.

So Argand set himself at work to contrive a way by which to admit air to the centre of the flame; and after a great many experiments and a great deal of contrivance, he succeeded in producing a cylindrical wick which was to be inclosed between two concentric tubes, with an opening at the bottom of the inner tube for a supply of air. He also provided suitable mechanism for raising and lowering the wick, and fitted a sheet-iron chimney over it to increase the draught up through the inner tube.

He made his chimney of sheet-iron, because in those days they had no means of making glass chimneys that would stand so great a heat without breaking. Of course it was necessary to place the chimney so that the lower edge of it should be just above the upper edge of the flame, in order that the light might not be intercepted.

Not long after this the glass-makers contrived to make glass chimneys which would stand great heat, provided they were heated gradually, and then Argand's invention was complete.

But the invention, great as its value has proved to be for mankind, was the source to the unhappy inventor of it of nothing but trouble and sorrow. He became involved in disputes and lawsuits with other men, especially with a Frenchman, whose name is spelled Quinquet, and is pronounced, as nearly as can be represented by English symbols, Kaingkay. Quinquet, it would seem, drew Argand's idea from him in conversation, or, at least, obtained such glimpses of it as enabled him to produce a lamp of the same character; and he harassed and thwarted Argand in all his attempts to obtain what would correspond to a patent right to it at the present day. Argand went to England, and there was more successful. His invention was adopted in that country, and was recognized as his, and the contrivance is called the Argand burner there and in America to this day. But in France the name of Quinquet finally carried the day, and a lamp there, with a burner on this principle, is always called a Quinquet.

Argand was worn out, mind and body, by his long-continued disappointments and troubles, and when he was only a little past middle life he returned to the home of his childhood in Switzerland, poor, disheartened, and miserable, and died in the imbecility and wretchedness of a premature old age.

And now, nearly a century since his death, they who understand these facts, after they have been reading for an hour in the evening by the bright light which his simple and beautiful contrivance has given them, sometimes pay a brief tribute to his memory by observing for a moment in silence the brilliant and beautiful effect produced by the double current of air, intensified in its action by the draft of the chimney, and then saying to themselves, "Poor Argand!"

LIVING IN GERMANY.

EDUCATION—ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

NO American would be willing to sacrifice the education of his children for any inducement a foreign country might offer of economical comfort and luxury. If it were his purpose only to eat, drink, clothe, house, and amuse himself at the lowest possible cost, he could find in the southern parts of the Continent, in the less frequented regions of Spain, Austria, and Italy, more material enjoyment at less price than elsewhere in Europe.

It is not only the cheap living, but the supposed advantages which Germany offers for education, that is attracting to it so many of our flitting folks. It would be poor economy indeed to be guided in the choice of teachers for the young by motives only of saving; and while descanting on the smallness of the bills and fees of German schools and colleges, it must not be inferred that these are their chief commendations. The thoroughness of the scholarship of Germany, and the practical excellence of its methods of instruction, are too well recognized to admit of question.

Heidelberg, the seat of a famous university, which naturally gives tone to the whole place, is pre-eminently an educational town. Abounding in professors and teachers of all kinds, it offers every possible facility for learning. We doubt whether there is a branch of knowledge for the pursuit of which competent instructors can not be found in Heidelberg.

The study of the languages is so extensively and thoroughly pursued that it can be said, without exaggeration, there is not one, either ancient or modern, of which there is not an accomplished master in Heidelberg. A Japanese student, who could not speak a word of German, met without difficulty on his arrival a teacher able to converse with him, and give him lessons through the medium of his own tongue. There is hardly one of its many educated men who is not able to express himself with facility in two modern languages at least in addition to his own. There are dozens of Germans in Heidelberg who can not only speak French and English with fluency, but write them with accuracy and elegance. These languages are regarded as essential branches of study in every school, and they are pursued so thoroughly that the pupils learn to speak them intelligibly without opportunity of visiting the countries where they are spoken. An American or Englishman, surprised to hear the words of his own tongue coming so glibly from the mouths of almost every shop-girl or waiter, often exclaims, "How well you speak English!" and asks, "Where did you learn it?" The common answer is, "At school."

The learning of the famous university town is by no means of a purely scholastic character. The natural sciences are pursued to a great extent, and with a success of which the names of Helmholz, Bunsen, and Kirchoff—all professors at Heidelberg—are world-renowned illustrations. Political economy, modern history, international law, and science in its application to agriculture and the arts of manufacture, are fully recognized in accordance with the modern views of education, and a practical bias is observable in all instruction, whether elementary or advanced.

One of the most characteristic features of Germany, to be observed every where in the streets and on the road-sides, is the school-boy. He goes not "creeping like snail, unwillingly to school," but hurrying eagerly forward to his daily duty, with the schulranzen—the knapsack which holds his books—strapped to his back. You can see in him the material, already in the full process of organization, of the solid German citizen-soldier whose steady onward push the world has found so irresistible. During school-hours it is impossible to find in the streets a straggling child, except of the youngest age. The little bouquet dealers and brezel boys are no longer invoking your stray kreutzers, but, laying aside for the time their baskets of small wares, are plying diligently their pens and slate-pencils under the eye of the school-master. The habit of going to school in Germany is so fixed that no child of the proper age seems to think any more of going without his daily lessons than his daily meals.

In addition to the public elementary schools, there is a great variety of excellent private ones. To these the thriving trades-people and the more prosperous citizens send their children; and it is such American parents residing in Germany would probably prefer. They are by no means what we sometimes call in the United States select schools, from which the children of people of moderate circumstances are excluded by exorbitant charges. Their prices are so low as to come within the means of all but those who are either wholly or partially dependent upon the state for the support of their families. A social equality prevails in these private schools, which appears eminently favorable to a common tone of elevation and sympathy among all classes. The children of the baker, butcher, professor, and magistrate mingle together as comrades, and American republicans will not, of course, object to this.

These elementary private schools profess only to be preparatory to the lyceum or gymnasium. Pupils are received at six years, and kept until ten, at which age they are admitted, if found competent, to the higher academies. The studies are, of course, elementary, and consist chiefly of reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, a little French, music, and gymnastic exercises. The charge varies from two to three dollars a quarter.

Girls', or ladies' schools, as perhaps we are expected in America to call them, are, especially when under the control, as is not uncommon, of thoroughly educated men, equally good with those for boys. The charges of the most expensive of these, which are by no means necessarily the best, amount to only thirty-two dollars a year for instruction in all branches with the exception of music and dancing. Lessons on the piano are given at the small rate of thirty-two cents each, and the annual rent of the instrument is but twenty dollars. The price of a dancing lesson is ten cents! Private instruction of all varieties, and of the best, can be had at equally moderate charges. The most distinguished teachers seldom ask as much as forty cents a lesson.

As one of the main objects of American parents in going abroad is to give their children the opportunity of learning the languages, they will find that the surest means of effecting this is not to have them taught at home, but to send them to school, for the young acquire more readily a foreign tongue from the prattle of their comrades than the lessons of their masters.

BARGAINS! BARGAINS! BARGAINS!

"SUCH a bargain, love!" cried Mrs. Ponder, joyously, to her husband.

"A bargain?" Mr. Ponder was used to the word; he didn't like it; he had paid dearly for it; he was tired of paying for it. He laid down his book and asked, "What will you do with it?" "It" was a large handsome wardrobe, with looking-glass doors and extensive drawers and fittings.

"Do with it? Oh, I can do fifty things with it," said the lady.

"But you probably will not do more than one; what will that be?" he asked.

She mused a moment, and suggested the best bedroom. Mr. Ponder remarked that it had a wardrobe.

"Yes, and so has ours, and so has the chintz room; but I could put this into the best room, and put the one there now into ours, and ours into your dressing-room," she remarked, thinking the last concession would win his heart to her bargain.

But the inexorable Mr. Ponder said he had a wardrobe now in his dressing-room which quite satisfied him. In vain the lady suggested various views in which her new purchase might be considered as a valuable investment; he simply replied to each of them that "it was not wanted."

"Well, really, to think of letting this slip out of one's fingers, at such a price! it would have been wasteful, quite wasteful, I consider," said the lady, who was too used to battles over her bargains to be easily daunted.

"Pardon me," replied her husband; "the waste lies in buying it. Intrinsically it may be worth a hundred dollars, as you say; but since you don't want it, I maintain, instead of being worth the ten dollars you paid for it, it is not worth ten cents to us."

"Depend on it, Mr. Ponder, it's absurdly cheap, and an immense bargain!" she cried, replying (like a woman) not to his statement, but to his opposition to her act and deed.

"My dear," he said, resuming his book, "I repeat, the price may be low, but, not being wanted, it is worth nil to us."

A little pouting, a little frowning, a few sentiments, half thought, half spoken, signifying that "some people were very hard to please," "some people were very inconsistent," that "it was enough to deprive any one of spirit and energy to be so continually thwarted and blamed when praise was deserved," accompanied the beautiful bargain to its settled home in the best bedroom, and Mrs. Ponder stood before it with a sorrowful sort of enjoyment, wishing her husband had a more liberal spirit. Mr. Ponder, thinking he had been a little hard on her, followed her up to the best bedroom, and paid a complimentary tribute to her taste.

"Oh, I knew you must admire it!" she said, with animation. "See—what drawers! and look, what lovely deep shelves! and these private drawers! and such room for hanging dresses! Oh, it will hold oceans!"

Mr. Ponder was going to say he was glad that the Pacific and broad Atlantic were not likely to be put up to auction, but having only just made peace he abstained from his joke; and very soon Mrs. Ponder's bargain became rather a care to her.

They seldom used the best bedroom. The wardrobe now in her room was capacious enough for her attic; she was sorry that ten months at least out of the twelve the beautiful convenient bargain should be useless. Suddenly a bright thought struck her; it was just the thing to hold spare linen; but then she had two noble linen chests already. This was soon managed; they should be converted into store chests, and the linen should immediately travel to the wardrobe!

This was excellent management, and all the morning Mr. Ponder heard nothing of his wife; but in the afternoon she said, "I am going to Repp's, dear, with Mrs. Smith; she tells me there is to be a sale of linen—house linen, just such as I want—and it will be marvelously cheap; so I won't lose the opportunity."

"House linen!" exclaimed Mr. Ponder; "surely we can not be in want of that" (remembering as he did the stock of homespun and fine damasks that his good old mother had bequeathed to him in the two linen chests).

"Of course, dear, I don't mean to say we actually want it at this present moment; but linen, like all other things, wears out, and no good manager allows her stock to run down," said Mrs. Ponder, who had a large space yet left in her last bargain which she thought would look well filled up with damasks.

Mr. Ponder happened to be at the hall door when his wife returned from the sale in a coach laden with articles of various kinds. He assisted her to alight, and, rather against her inward wish, watched the packages carried into the house.

"Linen?" he asked, looking at an open hamper of jars and bottles.

"No, dear; I found it was a general sale, and things being almost given away (there being little company there), I couldn't resist buying these fifty-cent bottles of sauce for eight cents, and pickles the same."

"But you and I never eat pickles?" said Mr. Ponder.

"No, but other people do, and it's nice to have them," said the lady, who destined them for her store chests.

"Linen?" again inquired Mr. Ponder, pointing to a huge, greasy-looking, rough box.

"No, that is soap; I have got it at one-third, almost, of the price; and soap is always the better for keeping."

So is money, thought her husband; but he contented himself with saying that he would settle the soap on her in his will as part of her share of his property, for he was sure, unless they not only washed at home, but took in washing, they could never use that quantity.

"Well, my dear, I have bought nothing but useful things," retorted the lady, angrily; "we certainly can not do without soap."

"Linen?" inquired Mr. Ponder, as the last installment came in, his wife following with anxious vigilance.

"No, Mr. Ponder, it is not linen," she cried, defiantly; "it is two dozen of old china plates that will just make up my set. I was delighted to see them; I despaired of ever being able to get any."

"What are they for—dinner plates?"

"Dinner!" said the lady; "they are so tender, the touch of a knife would break them."

"What use will you put them to, then?"

"Use? don't I tell you, they make up an imperfect set, which, being imperfect, was worth little, but now—"

"Would go for a very good bargain at Repp's," suggested Mr. Ponder.

His wife did not stay to argue; she went off with her bales to see them stowed in proper quarters, and found the work sufficient to occupy her till bed-time.

Every now and then Mrs. Ponder is for a day invisible to her friends, unavailable to her family, and uncomfortable to herself, because she has to dust and wash precious articles that she dare not intrust even to her parlor-maid; and when they are washed and dusted, they are put back on the shelves till they want washing again.

Mr. Ponder, who had received with his wife the brilliant reputation of her being a first-rate manager, wishes he had been so happy as to light on a second or even a third rate, for his experience of "first-rate management" is that it leads to very little comfort and very great expense. When he is complimented by outside observers on "what a capital manager Mrs. Ponder is," he thinks to himself that she manages to spend a great deal of money, and he wishes in his heart that she knew the secret of "managing to do without." He sometimes tells her that they will have to take another house for her accumulations of linen they will never use, home-made wines that will go down to their heirs and assigns as vinegar, preserves that are fretting away all their sweetness, and pickles that are drying up their vinegar; and as to furniture, he only wishes he could get a day at Repp's to sell at half their cost "the bargains that just cost nothing!"

MUNICH CORRESPONDENCE.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

AMONG the great capitals of civilized Europe Munich ranks second only as a repository of art treasures. Here noble buildings have been erected for collections of paintings of ancient and modern schools, instead of consigning them, as in many cities, to a portion of some disused government building, very unsuitable for art purposes. It is, I presume, very generally known that this city owes its present importance as an art centre to the exertions of the late king, Louis I., grandfather of the reigning sovereign, who, being himself a poet and man of taste, made the study of art his favorite pursuit from early youth. This noble work was begun by the king while yet crown prince, and his first great enterprise was to form a collection of sculpture entirely at his own expense. For this he erected an elegant building of white marble, called the Glyptothek, designed by Klenze, the great architect of Munich.

Standing in the Schiller Platz with your face to the setting sun, and looking down the spacious Brienner Strasse, a graceful picture meets the eye. At the extreme limits of the city, and striding the street, is the shining marble Propylæen (a beautiful gate), and to the right, all white and shadowy, rises like a cloud-castle the airy outlines, the symmetrical columns, of the Glyptothek—

"A thing of beauty."

Of what this charming representation of Grecian architecture contains I now scarce can speak. Ah! would that every art lover could traverse these magnificent halls! Here are statues as old as the fame of Praxiteles—groups recumbent, groups defiant, figures in every conceivable attitude. There are river divinities, and dryads of the wood. There are sleeping fauns and grinning satyrs, warrior heroes and menacing gods, statues of Roman emperors and busts of Grecian stoics—some beautiful, all interesting. Various is their state of preservation—some defaced, some dismembered, many in all the wonderful perfection with which they came from the hand of the master centuries on centuries ago.

But the dearest-prized treasure of the Glyptothek is not the famous Barberini Faun, nor the exquisite figure of Niobe's son crouching before Apollo's fatal arrow. Art lover and archæologist will find their supremest delight in the Ægina marbles; and our little Bavaria may well be proud of having acquired them. Purchased for six thousand pounds by King Louis I., when crown prince, a messenger from the British Museum with an offer of eight thousand pounds arrived in Ægina just too late to succeed in his mission.

THE GLYPTOTHEK.

For those who have not yet visited Munich I will observe that these celebrated antiques were discovered buried in the island of Ægina in 1811. They consist of several striking groups representing the battles of the Greeks and Trojans presided over by Minerva, and are supposed to have once adorned a temple of Jupiter. The great Thorwaldsen has restored all missing hands and feet, and grouped them as he imagined they must have stood in the days of their glory.

Grander, more spacious, and infinitely more pleasing to me is the Pinacothek, or picture-gallery. Think of twelve hundred and seventy paintings chosen from various art collections! A residence of six months here has been too limited to satisfy my love for these gems of the different schools.

And, first, the corridor, with its frescoes in imitation of the Loggie of the Vatican, is interesting, although the work of modern artists. The designs are all by the great Peter Cornelius, and executed by his pupils. The subjects—scenes from the lives of the early Italian and German painters—are touchingly poetic.

THE PINACOTHEK.

These picture-stories commence with the life of Cimabue, the father of modern painting, as Vasari styles him. He was born in Florence, in the early part of the thirteenth century, and a very naughty boy he grew up, for we hear of his neglecting his studies, and spoiling all his school-books by drawing upon them quaint figures—men, animals, and inanimate things—and this at a time when books were rather expensive playthings.

This fresco represents Cimabue's most celebrated work—a Madonna and infant Jesus—which he painted for the chapel of the Ruccellai, in the church of Santa Maria Novella. As this figure was larger than any which had been previously executed, the Florentines were very impatient to see it, but Cimabue refused to gratify them. When completed it was carried with great pomp from the painter's house to the church, accompanied by bands of music, the chief magistrates of Florence, and crowds of enthusiastic people. This picture still adorns the church of Santa Maria Novella. The Madonna is very stiff, and the drapery would ruin the reputation of a modern artist; but there is in it a depth of feeling, a grandeur of expression, which more than compensate for any want of technical perfection. Still he broke away somewhat from the old Byzantine models, and this departure was the commencement of a new era in painting. This is his epitaph:

"Cimabue thought himself master of the field of painting;
While living he was so. Now he holds his place among the stars of heaven."

Then follows Giotto,

"Tracing his idle fancies on the ground."

"The shepherd boy,

Fra Angelico, the artist-monk, who never painted for money, and was called after his death the "Blessed Brother," is seen refusing a bishopric. Masaccio, Perugino, and Signorelli are also shown at various epochs of their lives, and the great Leonardo is pictured dying in the arms of Francis I. of France. Correggio, Titian, and Michael Angelo fill the remainder of the twelve Italian compartments, and the thirteenth, where German and Italian art meet, is consecrated to the divinest of painters—Raphael.

The continuation of the corridor is devoted to German artists, commencing with "Master Gerard," who built, or at least commenced, the cathedral of Cologne. Then follow William of Cologne, a celebrated German painter of the fourteenth century, and John Van Eyck, the discoverer of oil-painting, Hans Hemling, Van Leyden, Hans Holbein, Albrecht Dürer, Rembrandt, and finally Rubens.

In the gallery proper there are several Mucillos, all glowing with the inspiration of Spain; a number of paintings by Velasquez, and many interesting works by Spanish artists not so generally known. France, too, is represented by Poussin, Le Sueur, with his religious pictures, and Claude Lorraine, of paysage celebrity. Lebrun, too, is here. Chief in interest among his works is his portrait of the beautiful La Vallière. This was painted in the decadence of her love-life. There is no smile upon that once bewitching face; contrition has wrought the change. Sorrowing are all the delicate lines of those lovely features. The artist has appropriately represented her as a forsaken, repentant Magdalen. She holds a prayer-book in her hand, and seems absorbed in devotion.

Italy has sent her varied host. Not only the soft skies of the South, its scented groves and flowering landscapes, have lent their charm—not only the picturesque people, with their impulsive, poetic passions, have aided the artist, but the broad-spread Church, with her legends and shadowy traditions, her majestic rites and pompous spectacles, her silent cloisters where her devout worship, her mysteries and vivid faith, here "communion of saints" and adoration of the Virgin, have been a never-failing source of inspiration.

"Heavenly contemplation ever dwells,"

Almost every Italian artist, from Giotto to Raphael, is represented in the Pinacothek by a Madonna. Fra Filippo has painted an Annunciation, which receives from the crusty Vasari the commendation that the angel Gabriel looks as though really sent from heaven. Fra Filippo is a contemporary of his brother monk, Fra Angelico; but I regret to say that he does not possess the beautiful moral qualities that distinguish "Fra Beato."

Very different is the third of this cloistered trio, Fra Bartolomeo, the friend and almost rival of Raphael. Irreproachable in his character, his paintings are distinguished by the sentiment of holiness. Little is known of his childdays, and of his youth not much more. His devotion to his art was second only to his religious enthusiasm; but when, at a later age, he became acquainted with the great reformer Savonarola, he was persuaded by that stern preacher to burn all of the exquisite productions of his pencil. Bartolomeo was for a time a most devoted follower of the great Dominican, but his gentle spirit did not fit him for a martyr, and when his master's dark days arrived he proved a second Peter. With desperate fear he hid himself, vowing if his life were spared to become a monk; and when finally he ventured to leave his concealment, it was only to enter the convent to which Savonarola had once belonged. For four years Fra Bartolomeo, as he was now styled, refused to resume his painting. Savonarola's denouncement of his beloved art still affected him, and he resisted all of his superior's kind entreaties; but when finally commanded to take up his pencil his conscience would not allow him to break his vow of obedience. Raphael, when in Florence visited him, and then commenced that warm friendship that lasted during the lifetime of Fra Bartolomeo.

This old artist has only one picture in the Pinacothek—a Madonna and Child of great loveliness. Of a Madonna of his in Lucca a great English art critic says that it "combines the merits of Raphael, Titian, Rembrandt and Rubens." Artists of a later date must thank Fra Bartolomeo for the invention of the lay figure.

Bernardino Luini, Leonardo da Vinci's most noted pupil, and gracefully termed the "Raphael of Milan," has several pictures here. One that I thought especially charming in conceit represents the infant Jesus, to whom the little St. John, kneeling, presents a flower.

Of the more resplendent art glories, Titian, Paul Veronese, Correggio, Raphael, etc., there are a sufficient number of their works here to dazzle the eyes of any picture enthusiast. There are five Titians, and as many more accredited to him, but doubtful. Here is his portrait of Charles V., which he came to Augsburg to paint by command of the emperor. While there occurred the oft-told incident of Titian dropping his pencil, which was handed to him by Charles. At Titian's remonstrance Charles replied, "Titian is worthy to be served by Cæsar."

Among the number of Raphael's works here are two of his Madonnas—one very celebrated, the "Madonna del Tempi." A marvel of marvels, that of the hundred and twenty Madonnas that Raphael painted there should be such variety. Only in the chaste maternal loveliness is there a resemblance.

There is one room entirely devoted to my old favorite, Rubens. The whole story of Marie de Medicis is told by his pencil, commencing with her education. Mercury, Apollo, and Minerva are her teachers. Then follow her marriage to Henry IV., her reception as Queen of France, and various incidents and episodes in her regal life. There are eighteen of these pictures, which were subsequently enlarged, and are now in the Louvre.

His famous "Last Judgment," a work terrible to naughty people, is conspicuous in another room. He and one of his wives occupy a place in the picture, and neither appear at all alarmed by the situation.

Those two women-persecuted art saints, Hans Holbein and Albrecht Dürer, are well represented in this gallery. The St. Barbara of Holbein is very charming. I marvel that a man so afflicted by a scolding wife should depict a woman so lovely.

Dürer's portrait of Joseph Fugger, the great patrician of Augsburg, is interesting to those who are familiar with the history of the Fugger family. The head of this celebrated house was styled Sir Anthony the Rich, a grand man, who entertained emperors and kings, and could afford to burn a loan of two millions of florins that he held against Charles V., after he had banqueted him.

COMPOSITION FOR WATER-PROOFING.

THIRTY grains of gum arabic are first dissolved in 250 grains of water. To this are added 30 grains of the spirits of wine of commerce; 300 grains of sulphate of alumina, of potash, or of soda are then to be ground in a mortar to a fine powder, and to this is added, little by little, the gummy solution mentioned above. The whole is kneaded together and moulded into blocks or cakes ready for use. To apply water-repellent compositions such as above described to fabrics to render them water-proof, the composition is to be dissolved in water. If the solution is to be used for treating woolen fabrics, the composition is dissolved in about 150 times its weight of water; if for cottons, in about 100 times its weight; and if for linens or silks, in about 75 times its weight.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. E. AND K. M.—We can not give you the information you desire.

A YOUNG MAN'S MOTHER.—If a lady refuses to accompany a gentleman to a concert, he is at perfect liberty to invite another; and we can not see why the first one should feel in the least aggrieved thereat.

IGNORANCE.—A gentleman offers his arm to a lady in the evening immediately on leaving the door. In the daytime she only takes it when they are engaged.—As to asking your pastor to read or pray with you, it depends very much on the circumstances under which the clerical call is made. A clergyman when calling as an ordinary visitor should be treated as such.

DULL EYES.—Regular hours and plenty of cold water and exercise are the best things we know of to brighten your eyes. We can not undertake to pass judgment on the comparative beauty of sparkling and dreamy eyes; each must decide according to his taste. As to your habit of blushing, which is by no means a bad one, we can only advise you to cultivate self-possession by thinking as little as possible about yourself.

ELLA AND ANNA.—When a lady accompanies a gentleman on a ride, she should be the first to signify her readiness to set out and to return; and should express her appreciation of the pleasure she has enjoyed in terms less formal than thanks. On returning from an evening party she may invite her escort to call at some future time; but the lateness of the hour will usually preclude an invitation to enter the same evening.

BAZAR READER.—You did right to leave your card for the lady who was engaged when you called; but should wait for the call to be returned before repeating the visit, and certainly should not call on her reception day when she had omitted, it would seem purposely, to invite you. You should not, of course, have left a card for the lady who had quitted the city.

MRS. GRANT.—You can have your switch dyed nicely by a hair-dresser. It is said that a large part of the hair imported is dyed, and that hair-dressers themselves can not tell the difference until they make it up, when the color comes off slightly on the hands.

USEFUL KNOWLEDGE.—See answer in last paper to "Tom."

MRS. R.—"Harper's Hand-Book for Travelers in Europe and the East" will give you just the information you desire about the best and most economical method of living in Germany. We also advise you to read the series of papers on the same subject now in course of publication in the Bazar, and which contain many useful hints to persons going abroad.

B. K.—"Carpet-Bagger" is one of a host of contemptuous epithets that have sprung from the ill feeling generated by the late war. It would seem innocent enough in itself; for we know no reason why it should not be as reputable to travel with a carpet-bag as a trunk.—As to the examples of bad and good grammar between which you ask us to decide, we can only refer you to the first good English grammar at hand, as we have no time to waste in giving elementary lessons.

GRACE.—If your affianced lover treats you with indifference, and gives you reason to suspect that he loves you no longer, it is both your right and your duty to call on him for an explanation. It would be very wrong to marry him with such a suspicion. At the same time, we do not think that you ought to ride and flirt with other gentlemen pending the explanation. Retaliation is the worst possible line of conduct in such a case. Try a little plain speaking instead.

STATE-HOUSE.—The pattern of China crape paletot, with funnel-shaped Watteau fold behind, is given in cashmere in Fig. 18 Bazar No. 18, Vol. IV.

MRS. P. C.—We do not furnish samples or buy goods for our readers.

MRS. J. S. N.—Your brown sample would look well with three shaded ruches, the upper one light cuir-color, but not white.

MISS M. S. E.—A yard of crape will suffice.

MRS. R. G.—There is no change in pleating and gathering skirts. Flounces, bands, and fringe are the trimmings used.

MRS. W. W. R.—Fold your material down the centre, and lay the front of the apron-polonaise pattern upon it, then add pieces at each side to fill out the pattern. Open the front as far down as is necessary, face it, and button up. The apron is not separate from the waist. Lay the trimming on in the square design shown in the picture.

MRS. A. W. M.—Your sample will answer for the polonaise suit admirably. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 19, Vol. IV.

MERCY G.—Trim your poplin with silk. Wear a straw gypsy trimmed with ribbon of becoming color. Skirts ruffled to the waist in front are much worn.

MRS. G. A. M'V.—Make your percale wrapper a Gabrielle with deep flounce.

E. M'C.—A postilion-basque, with demi-trained skirt, is all you can make of your twelve yards.

MRS. E. R.—Trim your blue poplin with silk bands of the same shade and fringe. Make by pattern sent you.

ALISE.—A collar is best on a linen duster. You can trim it up the front.

MRS. J. A.—The gray polonaise will not need a waist beneath it, and is more stylish than ever. A white gypsy with black gros grain trimming will suit with all the costumes you have mentioned. Shorten your checked silk, and wear a Swiss muslin polonaise or a black lace sacque with it. Leave your white lawn skirt as it is, and make a new polonaise for it. Black silk skirts under light over dresses will still be worn; but there should be ruffles of black grenadine on the silk skirt worn with an over dress of grenadine.

FANCHON.—Your sample will look well made in a postilion-basque suit by pattern sent you. We would suggest silk of the same shade for trimming. An apron-polonaise suit of your striped silk would be very beautiful.

WILDWOOD.—The only thing you can do to modernize your suit is to make as long a basque as your material will permit, unless you can match it, and make a polonaise. The skirt need not be altered.

M.—As you are in very light mourning you can wear black and white striped cambric, and dresses like the sample. The apron-polonaise will continue in fashion.

MRS. L. M. H.—Bands of alpaca and ruffles of the same trim alpaca suits. Bias ruffles of Japanese silk piped with silk of a darker shade are pretty.

A MINISTER'S WIFE.—Your white ruffles should be bound with green. Do not trim at the top of sleeves.

EMILY B.—The apron-polonaise will be handsome for a mourning suit. Trim with bias bands or side pleatings of the material.

VANPOST PACK.—It would be proper to wear a white apron-polonaise to church in your village.

JACQUITA.—A polonaise and flounced skirt is the prettiest design for a percale suit. The gypsy is decidedly fashionable.—We can not tell you "what will certainly remove moles," and think you had better not trifle with them, or you may make something dangerous.

C. K. S.—Get a Swiss muslin basque and upper skirt to wear with your summer dresses, or else a polonaise of sheer bishop's lawn. Trim with pleated ruffles of the material.

MISS INQUIRER.—Blouse-waists gathered to a belt are called French waists. The same name is given to the loose back and tight front corsage worn now with imported suits.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—Trim your grenadine with ruffles and ruches of the same.

A NEW CORRESPONDENT.—The white muslin pleatings under fringe are the flat kilt pleats ironed to lie all one way, and should be the width of the fringe. You can buy them ready made.

MILLINER.—Scarcely any two bonnets are worn precisely alike, as there is such a variety of shapes, and so many ways of dressing the hair.

R. D.—Twelve yards of linen are not enough for the postilion-basque suit. You will require at least sixteen yards of your wide linen. Trim with ruffles and bias bands of linen.

NELLIE R.—Be guided by your husband's wishes and your own feeling in the matter.

MISS A. J.—We can not answer by mail.

DURING the fierce heats of summer there is no greater luxury than Rimmel's Toilet Vinegar, to which we call the attention of our readers.

It is deliciously refreshing, and its tonic and balsamic properties impart a healthy coolness to the skin which at this season can not be too much appreciated.

It is most effectual in instantly counteracting the irritating and disfiguring effects of musquito bites, and the most painful headache will be speedily relieved by binding round the head a handkerchief saturated with this Vinegar mixed with an equal quantity of water. Its delicate and invigorating perfume is a splendid corrective for the lassitude and feeling of general debility produced by the tropical heat of summer.—[Com.]

DELICIOUS Lemonade made with Pyle's Lemonized Sugar. Beware of unwholesome imitations. The genuine bears the name of JAMES PYLE, 350 Washington St., and is sold by all first-class Grocers.—[Com.]

GRAY hair may be made to take on its youthful color and beauty by the use of Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer, the best preparation for the hair known to the science of medicine and chemistry.—[Com.]

FOR COLDS, COUGHS, BRONCHITIS, and all affections of the Lungs, take AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL.—[Com.]

THE Cheapest Soap is Pyle's "O. K.," because it is the best. Ten years' experience has proved it beyond dispute. All of the best Grocers have it for sale. Depot, 350 Washington St., N. Y.—[Com.]

ASK your Grocer or Tea Dealer for Dooley's Yeast Powder—the best Baking Powder—for preparing Biscuits, Rolls, Bread, Griddle Cakes, Waffles, Pastry, etc.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA will cure CONSUMPTION. Try it!—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

New Styles Now Ready.
UNION ADAMS & CO.,
No. 637 Broadway.

We make only one style, and have but one price for our Pianos, which are all made from thoroughly seasoned and kiln-dried materials, and have seven octaves—rosewood case—carved legs and lyre—large square grand overstrung scale—front round corners—serpentine bottom—iron plate—French action—and are all warranted five years. We have no agents, and allow no commissions or discounts to any one. This explains how we can sell a good Piano for $290, which is about the price Piano dealers pay to manufacturers for instruments similar to ours. Piano dealers are allowed by all manufacturers, except ourselves, to add 100 per cent., and upward, profit to all sales. This the public can prove by investigation to be strictly true. Piano dealers, teachers, professors, and everybody else, are excluded from any and every possibility of a single cent of commission on our Pianos. If you wish a Piano sent for trial, you must make the matter of reference and payment unquestionable; and if the instrument is in any respect inferior to any Piano made in the known world at any price, you may send it back to us at the end of ten days' trial, instead of paying for it. If you order a Piano sent, we have one request to make; and that is, that the trial shall be made by parties who are not interested in other Pianos. Please send for our Circulars containing full particulars and references to bankers, merchants, and families, in thirty-five States and Territories, who are using our Pianos. Address or apply to the

DIAMOND D MOHAIR.
It is an old maxim that a good article is always the cheapest in the end, and to nothing does this more fully apply than alpaca. Unfortunately, it is almost impossible for the consumer to know a good make from a bad one till worn, and the only safe course to pursue is to purchase a make that is known and guaranteed to wear well. The Diamond Mohair is one of the honest old original makes that first rendered the fabric popular for their brilliancy, color, and lasting qualities, and are as well made now as they were twenty years ago.
Retailers say they are difficult to introduce at first, ladies preferring heavier and more leathery goods. But these goods are warranted double warp, and are as heavy as an alpaca can honestly be made. The leathery goods are produced by elastic dressing and an undue quantity of cotton, and, of course, they soon get fuzzy, crease and wrinkle easily, and lose their color, and the dress is done.
The Diamond Mohairs, made only from the best alpaca yarn, are naturally brilliant, and will not lose their brilliancy; springy, and will not crease; and, having no dressing in them, are not injured by water.
Observe the brand, and do not be persuaded to take any other till you have tried these goods once, and you will find you have a handsome dress that will remain handsome.
Now to be had from nearly all first-class retailers.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

APRIL, MAY, and JUNE purify the blood and beautify the complexion by using HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

In the Spring and Summer months the system undergoes a change. This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

THE GREAT SALUBRIENT.

Prepared in an instant, bright and sparkling as champagne. Thirst satisfying, cooling, and refreshing.

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT

Is the most convenient and palatable preparation ever administered to an invalid. If it were not classed among the most celebrated medicines of the age, because of its wonderful efficacy as a corrective and alterative, it might well be styled a choice summer luxury. It is a swift remedy for all the pains and penalties of imprudence in eating or drinking, immediately relieving acidity of the stomach, flatulence, bilious headache, nervousness, physical prostration, colic, and all derangements of the stomach, bowels, liver, or kidneys occasioned by undue indulgence or other causes.

FACETIÆ.

A YOUNG man wants to know what business he had better go into that will enable him to occupy a high position in society. Let him try the roofing business—in that trade a smart man will soon get to the top of the ladder.

A lady, in a philosophical mood, asked a male friend how it happened that boys got all their bad traits from their fathers.

"I don't know," was the reply; "but perhaps it would help us to answer if we could find out where the girls get their blemishes from."

"Oh," replied the fair metaphysician, "they all come from their grandfathers!"

A SORRY PLIGHT.—The man who would have a finger in the pie thought he had got his hand in, but instead of that he managed to put his foot into it. He has now not a leg to stand on, and, being thrown off his balance, has utterly lost his footing in society. He is out at elbows besides, and all respectable members of the community keep him at arms-length.

HOW TO CALCULATE AGE.—A gentleman one day indiscreetly asked a lady how old she was. "Let me see. I was eighteen when I was married, and my husband was thirty; now he is twice thirty, and that is sixty; so, of course, I am twice eighteen, that is thirty-six."

An Irishman calls his sweetheart honey because she is bee-loved.

SIMPLE ADDITION.

NEW GOVERNESS. "Why are you Staring so intently, Blanche dear?"
BLANCHE. "I was trying to count the Freckles on your face, Miss Sandypole, but I can't!"

REAL MOURNING—Invisible black.

AN UNPLEASANT SORT OF ARITHMETIC—Divisions among families.

WATER TRUISM.—Every drop in the sea of life imagines itself an ocean.

A man who cuts his heirs off with a shilling need not necessarily use a silver razor.

An honest banker sometimes fails in making money, but a dishonest one makes money by failing.

A PARADOX.—Do you wish to get up with the lark? Then go to bed without it.

Some people argue—very logically, too—it is impossible to keep your word if you give it.

A contented mind is a continual feast. Yes, perhaps; but there are men—gastrophilistic parties—who read it that a continual feast is the best way of getting a contented mind.

A country merchant, who wanted two tailor's irons several years ago, ordered them of a firm of hardware merchants in the city. He first wrote this order: "Please send me two tailor's gooses." Thinking that this was not grammar, he destroyed it and wrote this one: "Please send me two tailor's geese." Upon reflection he destroyed this one also, for fear he should receive live geese. He thought over the matter till he was very much worried, and at last, in a moment of desperation, he seized his pen and wrote the following, which was duly posted: "Messrs. So-and-so: Please send me one tailor's goose, and, hang it, send me another!"

A POSITIVE FACT.

VICTIM (inspecting his negative). "H'm! very good. But d'ye think my Hair has come out well?"

LATEST RAILWAY MARVEL.

GENT. "I say, Conductor, when does the Next Train start?"
IRISH CONDUCTOR. "The Nixt Train! Sure the Nixt Train has Gone, tin minutes ago!"

A MERE BLIND—A sunshade.

EXTREMES MEET.—People who come to high words frequently indulge in low expressions.

When is a soldier not half a soldier?—When he's in quarters.

At a circulating library in Washington a lady inquired for "Corn and Cheese." They found out she wanted "Cord and Creese."

THE ALMIGHTY DOLLAR.

"Brother Smith, what does this mean?"

"What does what mean?"

"Bringing a nigger to this church."

"The pew is my own."

"Your own! Is that any reason why you should insult the congregation?"

"But he is intelligent and well educated."

"Who cares for that? He is a nigger."

"But he is a friend of mine."

"What of that? Must you therefore insult the whole congregation?"

"But he is a Christian, and belongs to the same denomination."

"What do I care for that? Let him go and worship with his fellow-niggers."

"But he is worth five million dollars," said the merchant.

"Worth what?"

"Five million dollars."

"Worth five million dollars! Jerusalem! Brother Smith, introduce me."

Some years ago, as a Scotch clergyman was walking one summer afternoon, two young beaux took it into their heads to break a jest upon the old parson. Walking briskly up to him, they asked him if he could tell them the color of the devil's wig. The worthy clergyman, surveying them attentively for a few seconds, made the following reply:

"Truly, here is a most surprising case—two men have served a master all the days of their life, and can't tell the color of his wig!"

A gentleman recently being about to pay his doctor's bill, said: "Well, doctor, as my little boy gave the measles to all my neighbors' children, and as they were attended by you, I think you can afford to deduct ten per cent. from the amount of my bill for the increase of business we gave you." This reminds us of a man not far away from Berkshire, whose daughter having died after a severe illness, and left a large quantity of medicine untaken, the father called at the drug store and wanted to know if the druggist wouldn't take it back in part payment of his bill.

Mr. Howles was once appealed to as arbitrator in a quarrel between two individuals, supposed to be a husband and wife. Each accused the other, and both justified themselves. After hearing them he gave his decision in these wise and remarkable words: "Let the innocent forgive the guilty."

DESCENT OF FASHION.

YOUNG SHARP. "Jessy, dear, I have heard you say the Alexandra limp is all the fashion."

JESSICA. "Yes, dear, so it is."

YOUNG SHARP (a fast lad, who has read a Darwinian article in his fishing journal). "Then are the ladies who perform the Alexandra limp descendants of the limp-ets?"

JESSICA (indignant). "You naughty lad."

[Rushes off in despair.

A LOVE-STORY: DON'T BE TOO HASTY.—We were nearing a small skirt of woods, the horses at their best speed. I had determined in my own mind that when we reached a particular spot I would "pop" the question, and so I did, but—would you believe me?—she said no. Just as the word escaped her lips, I purposely ran the sleigh over a stump. Out we went—she to cool herself in the snow, and I to counteract the damage she had given my affections. Her first words after getting in the sleigh were, "Excuse me, Sir; I wished to tell you to notice the stump." My wife often refers to the sleigh-ride, but to this day she believes it was an accident.

WHOLLY IN ERROR.

FIRST GROOM. "I say, Bill, I've bought a watch—look here!"

SECOND DITTO. "Ah! Jeweled?"

FIRST DITTO. "Jeweled—what d'ye mean?"

SECOND DITTO. "Has it got any holes in it?"

FIRST DITTO. "Holes in it! Why, ye fool, it's a new un!"

YOU DON'T CATCH OLD BIRDS WITH CHAFF.

COOK. "Oh, it's from your pa, is it, Master Tom? Well, the telegraph may be very wonderful, but it don't take me in, and if that's your pa's writing, I'll eat my head."

"Now, my boy," said the committee-man, "if I had a mince-pie, and should give two-twelfths of it to John, two-twelfths to Isaac, two-twelfths to Harry, and should take half the pie myself, what would there be left? Speak up loud, loud, so that all can hear."

"The plate," shouted the boy.

VANITY OF VANITIES.

INGENUOUS YOUTH (whispers). "I see you constantly stand on One Leg in Church. May I ask why?"
INGENIOUS MAIDEN (whispers). "You may. It is to Save my Croquet Foot."

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 26.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Summer Hood with Cape, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS hood with cape is made of white cashmere, and is trimmed with crimped white silk fringe and bows of white gros grain ribbon. First join Figs. 1ª and 1ᵇ of the Supplement along the line cut across according to the corresponding figures (see Figs. 1ª and 1ᵇ, which are shown reduced to one-sixteenth of original size), and join the piece turned down in Supplement on Fig. 2; then cut from each of these patterns one piece of white cashmere. Sew up Figs. 1ª, 1ᵇ, and 2 each from 1 to 2, face the two parts thus joined along the outer edge, and also along the slits, with a strip of white lustring an inch and a quarter wide, and arrange the hood at the front edge in a pleat, bringing ×e on ●e. Lay the back of Figs. 1ª and 1ᵇ in pleats at both sides of the middle of the back, bringing ×a on ●a, ×b on ●b, ×c on ●c, and ×d on ●d. Lay the upper edge of Fig. 2 also in two pleats, bringing × on ●; join Figs. 1ª, 1ᵇ, and 2 from 1 to 3, and cover this seam on the inside with a straight strip of lustring and on the outside with a bow. Finally, sew on the remaining trimming as shown by the illustrations, and set hooks and eyes on the hood at the places marked ∗ on Fig. 1ª to close the hood. The seam made by sewing on the hook is also covered by a bow.

COLORING ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

A FRENCH chemist has lately suggested what he considers an excellent method for coloring artificial flowers. For this purpose he selects colors of different tints, soluble in water, and mixes them with a clean mucilaginous gum, and then pours this out upon highly polished square glass tablets of several inches in diameter.

The layer must be put on uniformly, and the tablets exposed for a time to a well-heated stove. The gummy mucilage dries rapidly into a thin polished plate, which afterward separates from the glass and falls off. It may then be reduced to a powder possessing any required degree of fineness, the result obtained being remarkable for its permanency and transparency. The sheets obtained with aniline colors are considered especially beautiful. The tincture of curcuma, combined with a solution of soda, gives a beautiful chestnut; a solution of alcohol and curcuma with fuchsia, a beautiful scarlet-red; and with aniline blue, a handsome greenish-yellow.

THE CLOVER FIELD.

WANDER with the wild wind, go the wide world over,
Where's a sight so lovely as a field of clover?
When 'tis in its purple prime,
Just before the morning time;
When the summer air is sweetest, and the bobolinks are singing,
And on every other dewy top a honey-bee is swinging;
Colored like the blushing cloud, the sunset hanging over,
Fragrant as—what's half as sweet as is a field of clover?

Hither, thither, flitting, restless as a swallow,
Seeking what is fairest, Pleasure's beck'ning follow;
Crested palm-trees towering high,
Lakes where starry lilies lie;
Stately woods and sunny vineyards, hill-sides robed in blooming heather,
Orange groves where fruit and blossoms hang upon the boughs together:
See the best the world can show to a world-wide rover,
Can you find a sweeter sight than a field of clover?

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Labels.

MY DEAR LUCY,—I was strolling in the Park the other morning, when I saw something in which I know that you, as a young mother, will be peculiarly interested. A group of three pretty children were playing, in charge of a nurse, and upon each of them was a large and legible placard upon which was written, "This child has the whooping-cough." I smiled to think of the thoughtful parent who had taken that care—a mother so motherly that she was tenderly mindful of other children than her own, and a Christian so true that she did to other parents what she would have them do to her. It was the golden rule in practice, and in a quite unexpected illustration. I never saw precisely that kind of care before. It seems not to have occurred to other mothers or fathers. But could there be any thing more reasonable! How much sorrow and suffering that simple little care would have prevented! How many lives are shadowed forever in which that little thought would have kept the sun brightly shining!

You go out for a day's pleasure with Harry, for instance, and you take the baby. It is very warm, and Harry insists that you must get into the car, although it is very crowded; and there is a pretty, cooing little man in the arms of a mother or of a nurse, who makes room for you. You look in the bright little face, and you no more suspect mischief than you suspect worms in a rose-bud. The children prattle and play together, and breathe each other's breath, and by-and-by you get out, and the cooing little man, who is full of the poison of whooping-cough, for instance, and who has innocently infected your darling, goes upon his way. Or it is some other child with some other illness sent out to walk, but without a warning to other children, and the contagion spreads. It is true, dear Lucy, that your child must have various diseases, and that you can not by never so much care guard her from all evil influences; but you need not expose her. It is true that she will probably fall down stairs several times; but you need not, therefore, push her down.

The mother who labeled her children whom I saw in the Park was not foolish, certainly, because she did what she could to spare the children of other mothers. On the other hand, there is nothing more foolish than the feeling that because children must have mumps and other diseases—even the terrible scarlet fever—nothing need be done to defend them. It is the maddest and most criminal fatalism. It must needs be that offenses come, but woe unto him by whom the offense cometh. This was the obscure yet wise saying which repeated itself in my mind as I saw the little victims of the whooping-cough, and blessed the kind mother who would save your children and spare your heart, my dear Lucy. It was curious to observe how every body looked at the labeled children as they ran along. Mothers and nurses, who the moment before were lingering along, languid convoys of their pretty fleets hung with gay streamers, suddenly braced up, closed around their charges, and swept them off to the safety of distance. It was a pretty parody of the terrible yellow fever van, or the hospital carriage, before which every body retires in fear and awe. Indeed, such candid truth-telling as those whooping-cough labels is not often to be found in the Central Park or elsewhere.

It was the most striking incident that I have observed in my recent rambles; and as I turned into a more retired path, with my thoughts still dwelling upon those children, I remarked a figure moving on before me, which I soon recognized as Mr. Gregory Grind. He was unexceptionably dressed, as usual, and he carried a little cane, and walked briskly, bowing politely to his friends. A loiterer joined me, and after a little conversation said that he saw Mr. Grind before us, and spoke of him as a most exemplary and respectable personage. I asked him if he had remarked the labeled children, and he answered, with the same feeling that I had, that he had seen them, and that the mother ought to have her statue in gold erected in the Park by the penny subscription of all other fond mothers. He proceeded to remind me of the mischief that the poor darlings might occasion if they were turned into public resorts unlabeled. Their loveliness and innocence, he added, would both win and deceive. The labels were practical humanity.

He left me; and still Mr. Grind walked on before me. As I watched him, my dear Lucy, I confess that I could not help asking whether loveliness and innocence were the only things in the Park likely to deceive, and whether the public would not be the gainer if some of us older people were labeled as those dear children were. The boys, upon April-Fool's Day, sometimes pin a descriptive placard to the most dignified skirts. I have seen a reverend bishop sedately promenading upon that terrible day with a paper pinned behind him, on which was conspicuously written, "April-fool." The good man proceeded, serenely unconscious, truly modest and gentle, yet inevitably ridiculous. So I have seen a lady who wished to be very fine, and who was willing to be very mean, airily promenading, wrapped in a shawl which she intended every body should believe to be costly camel's-hair. But she had forgotten to remove the label, which legibly announced from the edge of the garment, "Warranted cheap at ten dollars."

These, however, were random shots, although the last was very effective and suggestive, and the first, had the paper been pinned to another gentleman's skirts, would have been ludicrously appropriate. But how, I asked myself, if Mr. Grind were labeled truthfully, like the children? Why would it not be an equal public service to put upon that comely coat a large and legible label, stating, "This is a mean man?" It would save him and all others a great deal of trouble. The young fellow who is suddenly cornered, and who needs only a kind, helping hand for a little while, would waste no time upon Mr. Grind. The poor woman whose rent is not ready would not try to persuade her labeled landlord that it was not her fault, but would march meekly out of the house. Men of generous thoughts and lives would seek their friends elsewhere. As the sweet faces and lovely ways of the children who were labeled as victims of the whooping-cough would not entice mothers to let other children play with them, so the label of "mean man" would teach the rest of us that good clothes and politeness and general respectability may cover moral disease. Mr. Gregory Grind would be left very much to himself, and as it would be the most disagreeable society in the world, he would be stimulated to fit himself for better associations by ceasing to deserve the label.

But when I sat in church the following Sunday, and with no ill intention found myself observing some of my neighbors, I discovered, to my great amazement, that a great many of them were already labeled as legibly as the dear victims of the cough. There was one lady, for instance, whose silks, and laces, and feathers, and flounces, and rings, and bracelets, and necklace, whose whole dress and all her movement, were a label printed in the largest possible letters. Not only the saints looking down upon her, but the poor little sinners looking up at her, could not help reading it, as if every letter had been especially emphasized, "Vain and vulgar." It was one of the costliest labels I ever saw. The legend was woven in the superbest silk, and threaded in the airiest lace, and jeweled in diamonds and rubies; and they only made it the more conspicuously legible—"Vain and vulgar." Yes, and even people who can not read, but who can, nevertheless, feel and perceive, if they had seen that label would have had a positive consciousness of its meaning, and in their way would have known it to mean "vain and vulgar."

And as I was meditating upon this fact my attention was attracted by Mr. Gregory Grind, who sat where a side light fell full upon his face; and then I saw that Nature was much wiser than I, and had already labeled him. His face was very smoothly shaven, and his hair was carefully brushed, and his clothes were spotless; but as I looked in his face I read the label distinctly—"This is a mean man." The typography seemed to be a kind of short-hand character. It was made up of lines and marks, some of them almost invisible; but their significance was as plain as that of the whooping-cough label. And just beyond him I saw a figure modestly dressed—a young woman with clear eyes, and a sweet face full of feeling and intelligence. There was a nameless grace in her aspect, a tasteful propriety in her whole appearance, which were most winning. And as I gazed at her it suddenly occurred to me that she too was labeled, and that I was reading, in the most unmistakable letters, "Modest, intelligent, and lovely." If the words had been printed in large red characters all over her dress they would have been no more legible. I was conscious that whoever saw this label would be refreshed and charmed, as when the sailor sees the light-house that shines at the harbor's mouth. And when I asked who she was, do you think that I was surprised, dear Lucy, to hear that she was the thoughtful, tender, and wise mother who had labeled her children in the Park?

So we are all labeled, my dear young friend, upon this great journey; and the labels are all legible to the eyes that can read. And those who can not read, I say, can sometimes feel the meaning. The celebrated Dr. Fell was revealed in this manner. The person who disliked him could not read, apparently; he could not state what the difficulty with the doctor was; but he was perfectly sure of it:

> "For this I know, and know full well,
> I do not like you, Dr. Fell."

We might have supposed it. If human mothers are so thoughtful, the great mother, Nature, is not likely to be less so. But her skill is subtle. Upon the persons of men she does not always hang even her finest labels in comeliness and strength. How often, in the bowed frame, in the melancholy eyes, she writes, "This is my worthiest!" And upon the figures of women, dear Lucy, it is not always with color and form, but with a beauty that only the soul can see—with a plain face often, and with awkward motions—that she says, "This is my best." Thus you see that the label of whooping-cough which the mother put upon her children was a label of true mother which the angels hung upon her.

Your friend always,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

A "NEW DEPARTURE."

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

THE world knows nothing of its greatest men, and sometimes one is tempted to think the world knows nothing of its greatest events—does not, at least, know that they are its greatest. Here we have all of us been at work ever since we were born, preaching and praying, sending out missionaries, establishing Sunday-schools and week-day schools, writing books, editing Bazars, in season and out of season trying to lift the world up to a higher plane, and usher in the golden year. Every now and then we would fain hearten ourselves by reporting progress—such a pitiful little progress as it is—such a one-sided, limping, bedraggled little progress! So many years and so much money we have spent on China, and so many converts we count up to show for it—a mere handful of wheat in a granary of chaff—and say nothing at all of the fact that when the Chinese come to our shores we beat them and bruise them and send them away empty, and which, oh! which is the converted and which the to-be-converted nation? So many churches lifting their spires to heaven; but oh! the generations old over whom no church-bell tolled! and oh! the generations young that never hear the church-bell rung! No, the world's growth in grace is like the boy's growth in stature. Eye hath not seen it nor ear heard it. You look at it, and it is the same yesterday and to-day and forever, for all your measuring. But look away, go about your business, and by-and-by, lo! the boy has taken a leap upward, the world has taken a start onward, and we are all indeed moving to the golden year.

Teaching and preaching are good, though we can not see the world clarify under them from day to day; but to-day, on this annus mirabilis, this dies alba, before our very eyes the blood-red blossoms of war bloom into the white lilies of peace; and we go on our way and call it the Treaty of Washington, and talk about the High Joints—that is, you city folk do; but we in the country are so glad that we do not mind if the canker-worms are eating up our apple-trees and the drought devouring our tender plants. We call it the treaty of peace on earth, good-will to man. We call it the Highest Joint that ever was fashioned in this world; for it not only joins two nations in friendship and kindred advancement, but it joins all the forces of common-sense, common blood, common interest, against brute violence and unreined passion and reckless destruction. We do not so much reckon on the nature of the treaty, but we think the existence of such a treaty one of the great landmarks of time, as distinct and significant a historic event as the Reformation of LUTHER or the Revolution of WILLIAM. If there had been a persecution, a pageant, a wild mob, a great army, a grand battle, how should we have rung the bells over this reconciliation! But the Son of Man only came eating and drinking, quietly, socially, without parade, with singular modesty; and there were even not wanting those who spoke scornfully of gluttons and wine-bibbers. And so the treaty was made before the war instead of after the war; and so the sword rusts in the scabbard, and the powder gathers dampness, and the plowshare refreshes the weary earth; husbands are saved to their wives and sons to their mothers, and the work is peaceful upbuilding instead of bloody overthrow. What hath God wrought? It has taken centuries to reach this point, but we have reached it at last. Out of the sea of blood and fire that threatens to ingulf a sister nation rises this cloud no bigger than a man's hand, and its promise is the healing of all the nations. War between England and America can never, it would seem, arise after this. Dining and dancing for six weeks on a foreign shore is hard work, but it is not so hard as marching and countermarching, fighting and bivouacking, for six months; and if your dining party is only six or eight strong, and your fighting party is six or eight hundred thousand, the difference in expense is very considerable. England and America have tried both ways, and if at any time hereafter they prefer bullets to billets, they deserve to be shot, and may every shot hit the mark till both nations are exterminated!

And if England and America refuse to fight, what nation in Christendom can long live by the sword? Already the wounded Prussian and French privates lying in hospital side by side discover a common character, an identical interest, and ask why they fight—an impertinent question, which their ancestors would never have thought of. Let them have added to their moral consciousness the sight of two nations adjusting their relations as two men adjust theirs, and bayonets will presently begin to think effectively and refuse to budge. Nations have hitherto settled their quarrels like bullies with fists. The two kindred nations have set the example of behaving like gentlemen, and it must be irresistible.

The fact is just there: John Bull is a gentleman. He is all sorts of wrong-headed and bullet-headed, arrogant and stupid and blundering often, given to dogmas and dogmatism, and turning into enemies those who never meant to be any thing but friends. But somewhere in him lies the instinct of the gentleman, and in an emergency it is very apt to come to the surface. A gentleman may be carried away by the passion of the hour, or deceived by superficial resemblances, and make great and disastrous blunders; but to see that they are blunders, to offer honorable reparation and apology, in the face of possible misconstruction by the narrow and the unmannerly, yet in such a way as to win respect and admiration from the high-minded—this is the prerogative of the gentleman. Yes, Old England, we hated you and rated you soundly during the war, and you deserved it; at least there was enough of you deserving it to warrant our doing our best that way; and we hated you up and down, for the side that you loved you did not help, though the other side you hurt. But by taking the initiative in this new line of treaty-making, by organizing before the world a High Court of Claims, wherein reason and right shall be arbiters instead of thew and brawn, you have done humanity such signal service as would blot out a darker record than yours. You have kindled such a fire as, by God's grace, shall never be put out. Now if America would only add to her superstructure of brilliancy your substructure of solidity, she would be such a nation as even you would stand on your dignified tiptoes to stare at.

The geologists tell us nowadays that there never were any great convulsions to mark the epochs, but that age succeeded age as imperceptibly and gently as the moments of to-day. Astronomers soothe away our dread of comets by telling us that a comet's tail is one that no man can tell, and we may any day be rushing through it and nobody know. No doubt it is true in all the ways of life. On a pleasant May morning, with flowers and music and mirth, we passed unaware out of the old red sandstone, out of the dueling, the prize-fighting, the fisticuff period, into the gentle epoch, the golden year, the holy Sabbath of the world.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THIN DRESSES.

GRENADINE and Chambery gauze are the most stylish materials for thin dresses. The first is for street and day wear, the last for the house and for evening. Striped grenadine, all black, a thick satin-finished stripe nearly an inch wide alternating with a stripe of small-meshed grenadine, is in favor with ladies of fashion. Polonaises of this fabric are made to wear over black silk skirts flounced with the striped goods. These are among the most elegant costumes of the season. As they are worn both in the house and street, modistes make the skirts long enough behind to train about a fourth of a yard when in the house, and arrange loops on the seams and in the centre of the widths to fasten over buttons on the belt, by which to shorten the skirt for walking. The loops are concealed by the over-skirt, and should be near together, or the skirt will droop in scallops in the spaces between.

The counters are filled with cheap grenadines marked as low as twenty-five cents a yard, of which very tasteful dresses may be made for the house; but the fabric is flimsy, and soon becomes limp if exposed to the dampness of the street. They are black, with white, blue, green, or écru stripes, and when made up over an old silk dyed black, look very well, cost but little, and help to keep down laundry bills. The prettiest have a slightly trained skirt with two narrow bias flounces, hemmed, gathered, and placed below a broad flounce. The over-skirt is deep, with an apron front and bouffant back. The waist is a négligé box-pleated blouse with half-flowing sleeves. There is a box-pleat down the centre of the front, with two on each side and three in the back. Tom Thumb fringe of the two colors in the dress edge the pleats. The neck is heart-shaped, and a flat pleating of white net or muslin surrounds it, and is basted inside the sleeves. A gros grain belt without a sash bow confines it at the waist. This blouse is becoming to slender waists; but fleshy ladies prefer a short basque made over a silk lining.

Silks good enough for skirts to wear under grenadine may be bought at $1 15 a yard. They are full, lustrous black, and measure twenty-two or twenty-four inches in width.

Chambery gauzes, in the pale tea-rose, China pink, mauve, Nile green, and sky blue tints, are shown for dinner and evening dresses at summer parties. They have narrow satin twilled stripes of the same shade, are about three-fourths of a yard wide, and cost $1 75 a yard. White gauze is most effectively used as parts of dinner costumes. A model dress has a skirt of Nile green silk with three graduated flounces of white Chambery gauze, each sewed on with a bias fold of silk. The Marguerite polonaise is of the white striped gauze, open and pointed in front, bunched high up on the hips, edged with white fringe and green ruches, and caught up in the back by three lengthwise bows of green and white gros grain. Another, for a brunette, is of palest écru gauze, striped, over silk of the same shade. A single deep-pleated flounce of gauze trims the skirt. There is an over-skirt of gauze, and a basque made over silk, cut square-necked in front and back, and with a square Louis XIV. vest of the silk, buttoned, and edged with gauze pleating. This stylish dress will be worn with pink coral ornaments.

Among lawns, the linen lawns—cool, thin, and wiry—are much used: but the French lawns, all cotton, so popular at the South, are seldom worn here. Of these light linens, so delightful for midsummer wear, the prettiest have pencil stripes of black, brown, or scarlet on white, or else large dots at wide intervals. They cost from 25 to 35 cents a yard. They should be made with two skirts and a little jacket, or else a sailor blouse with great box-pleats, a sailor collar, and full coat sleeve with deep, square cuff. Side-pleated ruffles trim the skirts. These sailor blouses of thick linen striped with a color, or of plain Irish linen, or else the palest buff, are greatly worn in the morning with a black silk skirt and over-skirt. They are especially pretty in the house, and are often seen in the street on ladies taking their morning "constitutional" walk, or shopping in the coolest part of the day. Sometimes, to make this toilette more suitable for the street, a black lace sacque is added. Wide-brimmed Leghorn hat and sun umbrella, either white, blue, or plum-color, fill up the picture.

A new importation of nansook morning robes shows some original designs. One style is a loose Gabrielle, open and rounded down the front to disclose a petticoat trimmed with Hamburg insertion and Valenciennes lace. Insertion extends up the seams of the Gabrielle, the sleeves are open, and the garment may be worn with or without a sash. Price $38. A flowing robe de chambre has a Pompadour square yoke covered with embroidery and edged with lace. The skirt and waist in one are gathered into the yoke, and so shaped that they will hang gracefully. Price $40.

SUMMER MANTLES.

New mantles and mantelets with sleeves are being introduced for evening and carriage wraps, and to wear on the sea-shore. Algerienne in alternate stripes of satin and wool is used for this purpose, also soft white cashmeres with gay fringed borders, while very elegant ball cloaks are of China crape and lace, and even of rose or blue silk under white organdy. A novelty reported from abroad is called the Anderlon mantelet. One model is of black China crape edged with black lace. The front is a round mantle, the back is a casaque with a hood, the sleeves are wide and open to the shoulder. Insertions of Valenciennes and bias bands of black gros grain form the hood. A mantelet of white crape is trimmed with black velvet and feather fringe; another, of violet crape, is lightly embroidered with gold. A sortie du bal is of white organdy, lined with rose-colored silk, trimmed with tassel fringe and passementerie. The hood is deeply pointed, and ornamented with bows with floating ends. Similar bows fasten the front.

FANS.

The newest fans have long sticks in the centre, with short ones on each side, forming a horse-shoe shape when opened; others have sticks of different lengths, making deep vandykes at the top, but neither shape is as pretty as the old regular half circle. The fan most used, serving for plain and dressy occasions alike, is made of yellow ivory sticks, highly polished, either plain or carved, strung together by a narrow ribbon. The fan for brides and for full dress is of white satin and point lace, mounted on pearl sticks. Pompadour fans, to accompany the pretty afternoon costumes of summer, have sticks of white enameled wood mounted with rose, blue, or white silk cut in leaf shape, with a Watteau scene painted on each leaf. Violet-wood fans, breathing forth a delicious odor, are quaintly carved, and ornamented with the monogram of the owner. Another fragrant fan, and a most substantial one for excursions, traveling, etc., is of Russian leather, dark maroon, with a line of gilt on each stick: price $9. Such fans have cord and gimp strings for fastening them to the belt on the right side. Small Japanese and fancy straw fans, and the inevitable palm leaf, form acceptable articles of furniture—shall we say?—in summer parlors.

GLOVES.

Palest primrose buff is the leading color in the new stock of gloves, and next in proportion is pale gray with a lavender cast—a shade especially pretty with black toilettes. Gloves fastened by but one button are seldom seen on well-dressed ladies. Long-wristed gloves, the wrist piece cut in one with the glove instead of being a separate band, are preferred. Those fastened by two or three buttons are most used in the daytime. From four to six buttons are on evening gloves. Those without fancy stitching on the back are in best taste. The best quality of kid gloves, fastened by two buttons, cost $2 50 a pair, and each additional fastening adds twenty-five cents.

SUMMER SHOES.

French heels are entirely out of fashion for walking shoes. We have said this before, but repeat it now for the benefit of Western correspondents who have written us on the subject. The fashionable shoe for the street is a French kid buttoned boot, measuring seven or seven and a half inches from the top of the back seam to the heel-tap, with toes medium rounded, and thick heels slightly curved, yet broad at the bottom, and an inch and a quarter high. The ornamentation is a light stitching of white silk, zigzag or in fence rows. Two rows of this stitching are around the vamp of the boot and up the instep seams. The button-holes are worked with white, and the scalloped top of the boot is overcast to match. Price $9.

The effort to revive side-laced boots failed. Ladies who have the bad taste to wear fancy boots have box toes, heels an inch and a half high, and elaborate ornaments of patent leather in appliqué, stitched with white. These are usually laced on the side, and cost $10. Fan or tasseled stitching is passée.

Now that dress skirts are lengthened, ladies are beginning to wear low buskins for carriage shoes, and when shopping in the morning, or for country wear, but they are not, and probably never will be, adopted for general use in city streets. The prettiest buskin, called the Newport tie, is shaped like the low shoe gentlemen wear, with a tongue-piece on the instep and the sides tied over it. Made of Grisons kid, with white zigzag stitching, they cost $5 50. The price ranges, according to material and style, from $4 50 to $10. A similar buskin, more fancifully decorated, is called the croquet shoe.

House slippers still retain the Marie Antoinette shape, with pointed back, French heels, and long oval rosette.

PERSONAL.

MISS FANNY BUTLER, daughter of PIERCE BUTLER and FANNY KEMBLE, has just gone to her mother, in London, there to marry the Hon. Mr. LEIGH, a gentleman of good position. During the matrimonial infelicities between Mr. and Mrs. B. this daughter remained with the father, though often visiting the mother. At Mr. B.'s death she inherited a handsome estate, in which was included a rice plantation in South Carolina. With a female friend as companion she spent all her winters on it, often not seeing the face of a white person but that of her friend during the entire winter. Last year Mr. LEIGH, traveling in this country, and anxious to visit a well-conducted rice plantation, went to hers; and, as a sequel to that visit, she has gone to London to "change her local habitation and her name."

—The potentates of the Old World are making sure about the pecuniary future. Following the example of LOUIS NAPOLEON, King VICTOR EMANUEL, though king of a poor people, is one of the richest of monarchs, having a fortune of twenty millions of dollars; and to while away the hours goes to some one of his twenty palaces, and goes a-riding on one of his seven hundred blood-horses.

—It is gratifying to one's national pride to learn from the London Court Journal that "Miss NEWBOLD, of the United States, was remarked for her beauty and elegance at one of the Queen's recent drawing-rooms at Buckingham Palace."

—Mrs. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE is having a fresh burst of popularity in Europe, three different translations of the Rural Abode of our Uncle Thomas having just made their appearance in Berlin.

—It went all abroad in the newspapers recently that Mrs. JULIA WARD HOWE had been appointed a justice of the peace in Boston, but up to June 3, 1871, that accomplished woman had not been commissioned.

—We copy, without vouching for its accuracy, a report that when Mr. BEECHER was in the country last summer he lost his hat, and found it a week afterward in the barn where he had left it, but with four eggs in it. Mr. B. had just written a eulogy on the Hen. Why shouldn't the Hen re-ward Beecher?

—Mr. SUMNER will have his little anecdote. When one of the Tribune correspondents told the Senate he was bound in honor to keep the secret of his obtaining the treaty, Mr. SUMNER remarked that he wished the Senate could be screwed up to a similar point of honor. A palpable hit!

—While diamonds are increasing in value, pearls seem to be somewhat depreciated. The famous pearl necklace bridal gift of the ex-Empress EUGÉNIE to the Princess ANNA MURAT has been sold in London for 90,000 francs. Its original cost was 300,000 francs.

—"Master FRANK LINCOLN, the youngest son of the late President LINCOLN," is announced by the Bellevue (Ohio) Gazette to lecture in that village.

—The property of Mrs. FAIR, recently decided to have been guilty of some illegal informality in San Francisco, is said to be quite respectable—that is to say, government bonds to the amount of $40,000, six city lots, two Derringer pistols, and three revolvers.

—RULLOFF's brain was weighed by the Binghamton doctors, and proved to be almost unprecedentedly large, weighing fifty-nine ounces. The brain of DANIEL WEBSTER weighed sixty-four ounces; that of CUVIER sixty-five ounces, which is the largest ever weighed. The head measured twenty-four and a half inches around the brow, and the skull was found to be the thickest ever known, it being in most places half an inch thick, and nowhere less than three-eighths of an inch. It required three-quarters of an hour to saw around the skull, and before the surgeons got through, it is said, they began to think it was solid! The scalp is represented as being found to be as thick and tough as a rhinoceros's hide. The cords in his neck were as heavy and strong as those of an ox

—Mr. MENDEL, a cotton-broker in Manchester, is one of the most liberal patrons of art in England. His stud surpasses that of many of the nobility; while the jewels belonging to Mrs. M. are said to excel the famous gems of the Countess of Dudley.

—Since the organization of the Roman Catholic Church there have been but thirteen popes who have lived to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of their first mass. These were:

Pius VI., Pius VII., and Gregory XVI.

—When ROSSINI was presented by the city of Paris with the charming villa of Passy he caused his wines to be transported thither. They were celebrated throughout Europe, being mainly the gift of sovereigns, or those whose vineyards have the greatest reputation among connoisseurs. During the Prussian occupation of Passy the house of the old composer and its contents were held inviolate, but when they left the Mobiles replaced them: the look of the bottles was too much for them, and they reveled in the contents of the cellar. "It must have been carried away; it can not ALL have been drunk!" exclaimed Madame ROSSINI, on her return. "Indeed, the scoundrels drank every drop," exclaimed the concierge; "and, moreover, complained that it was poor stuff—not a single drop of petit bleu among the whole lot!"

—Another stupendous honor hovers over the country! The Emperor of Brazil, after completing his European tour, will sail from London to New York, and after gazing benignly upon the general get-up of things here, will move in imperial style to Washington, and pay a visit of state to the President of the United States.

—Captain HALL, who is about to show in the waters of New York, in command of the Polaris, in which he proposes to go Arctic-ing, is a gentleman who, in height, talls up above the average man. He is of that fat, plump, round, oily make which should characterize the Federal explorist, and he will certainly ferret out things up around the pole in a way that will cheer the cockles of the heart of the American scientist, and settle things that have bothered the geographers.

—The wife of General VON MOLTKE is an Englishwoman, the daughter of his sister's husband from a former marriage of the latter. MOLTKE passed several years at Constantinople, where he wrote to his sister letters which so interested the young step-daughter of the latter that she entered into a correspondence with him, and married him a few years afterward.

—Much has been said and sung of the personal appearance and manner of RUSKIN—"the sweet, angelic face," and all that; but a gentleman who has recently been favored with a private view says the real RUSKIN is one of the plainest men he ever saw. And as if to intensify nature, his manner of wearing his hair, and his rudely fitting dress, only emphasized the natural want of charms. RUSKIN's face has neither fineness of feature nor winning expression. His eye, it is true, is large and eloquent, but not enough so to offset the rest of his face. He read a paper to a few friends that evening—not with much eloquence, but with a jerky, unnatural flinging out of the words, quite unlike the flow of a good American reader. But the charm was underneath, in the thought itself, which, like every thing of RUSKIN's, was original, paradoxical, stimulating. The paper was afterward printed, and forms the first half of his "Sesame and Lilies." He is a good American-hater, lives in great seclusion on Denmark Hill, one of the suburbs of London, princely in his generosities, gracious to all young art students who seek his advice, and, with all his feudal tendencies, incontestably one of the noblest spirits of our age.

—The funeral of THALBERG, at Naples, was an imposing ceremonial. Two military bands joined in the procession, and the orations delivered over the grave are said to have moved the mourners to tears.

—It is among the curious things incident to the present condition of affairs in Italy that the most influential writers connected with the press are Jews. The patriarch of Italian journalism, GIACOMO DINA, editor of the Florence Opinione, is a Jew. The ablest of the Liberal editors in Rome is EDWARD ARB, a Jew. CARLO LEVI, editor of the Nuova Roma, is a Jew. The most accomplished critics of belles-lettres—ALESSANDRO D'ANCONA, of Pisa, and LUIGI CAMERINI, of Milan, are Jews; and these are only a few among the distinguished Jewish writers for the Italian press.

—A Russian nobleman, who received his degrees from the universities of St. Petersburg and Heidelberg as a thorough student of jurisprudence, and who can read, write, and speak the Russian, German, French, Italian, English, Latin, and Greek languages, advertises in a Hartford paper for a position as coachman. To any gentleman who owns imported stock, this gentlemanly and accomplished exile would be an acquisition.

—A sister of IDA LEWIS—AGNES by name—is winning laurels in California by her remarkable performances as a farmeress, especially in the manœuvre of plowing. Plowing is her forte. Yet she is only sixteen.

—The result of sudden joy is thus exemplified: Mrs. ANNIE BREED, of Norwich, Connecticut, died recently and left $20,000 to a faithful servant, ABBY NILKEY, for twenty years of devotion. The domestic was so delighted with the legacy that she died of excess of felicity in less than two weeks.

—Mr. JAMES GRANT, formerly editor of the London Morning Advertiser, is about to cause agitation among the newspaper men of the British monarchy by the early publication of his new history of the newspaper press. It will contain revelations more or less interesting to the journalists of both hemispheres.

—The Princess MARGUERITE, wife of the eldest son of the King of Italy, is pronounced by a newspaper correspondent to be the "whitest woman" he has ever seen; also that she is passionately fond of the theatre, and so artless and lovely in manner that she fascinates all who approach her.

—General SICKLES, it is said, is soon to be married to a young and beautiful Spanish lady. Gen. S. has received from the President leave to be absent from his post for three months. During that period he will travel on the Continent, accompanied by his mother and daughter.

—Mr. MONCURE D. CONWAY expresses the opinion that the University College, London, is much better as an institution of learning than either Oxford or Cambridge, and that it is so regarded by the ablest men of England. The heads that conduct the intellectual every-day work of Great Britain receive their instruction and are moulded at the London University.

—The American citizen does not contemplate WASHINGTON as a dancer, yet in the second volume of the "Life of Nathaniel Greene," just published, is a letter from General GREENE stating that he had attended a ball where WASHINGTON danced three hours with Mrs. GREENE "without once sitting down." He also says that "at the most gloomy period of the Revolutionary struggle grand luxury prevailed in New York and Philadelphia."

—Miss PHŒBE COUZINS, who graduated last month from the St. Louis University Law School, attended a reception given to the faculty by Dr. WALKER, at which all sorts of pleasant things were said, all sorts of presents made, to Miss COUZINS—Mrs. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON going so far as to donate the herewith verses:

For PHŒBE COUZINS in wig and gown
There's coming riches and renown.
With her own raven hair for a wig,
And her gown even short and trig,
May this pupil of KENT and CHITTY
Be wise and good as she is witty:
While her fees ne'er exceed what her client expects,
May she never have causes without effects.

—That was an assemblage of men of mark at the funeral of Sir JOHN F. W. HERSCHEL, at Westminster Abbey, a month ago. Among the pall-bearers were the Duke of Devonshire, Duc DE BROGLIE, Sir CHARLES LYELL, General SABINE, Professor AIRY, Sir HENRY HOLLAND, and Sir JOHN LUBBOCK. There were also present Professors TYNDALL, HUXLEY, OWEN, SYLVESTER, STOKES, and ADAMS, Sir C. WHEATSTONE, Mr. LOCKYER, and Dr. CARPENTER. The body was laid near the tomb of Sir ISAAC NEWTON.

—The present year marks the hundredth anniversary of the founding of the banking house of the ROTHSCHILDS.

—ABNER NEWTON, who died recently in Middletown, Connecticut, was doubtless the oldest printer and editor in that State. He was seventy-five. He entered the profession at twenty-one, and continued at it to the period of his decease. He was the first editor in the State to employ female compositors, and first also to teach the trade to a colored man.

—Elder EVANS, of Lebanon, deeming it of some importance that a correct notion of the theology of the Shakers should be diffused throughout the community, is preparing his autobiography, in which he will give account of the "trillers" of England.

Knitted and Crochet Insertion for Lingerie, Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—KNITTED AND CROCHET INSERTION. To make this insertion knit, first, the middle strip with a double thread of white embroidery cotton, No. 40, and two very coarse steel knitting-needles, as follows: Make a foundation of 2 st. (stitches), throw the working thread over the still free needle of the right hand once, and purl the two foundation stitches together; * now turn the work, throw the working thread over the free needle of the right hand once, and purl the st. and thread thrown over on the other needle together. Repeat from * until the strip is of the requisite length, then cast off. Now crochet with tatting cotton, No. 100, on the loops at both sides of the knitted strip each one round of cross double crochet, between the two upper veins of each cross double crochet always three chain stitches (see illustration).

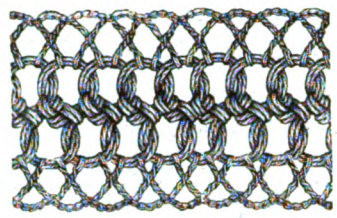

Fig. 1.—KNITTED AND CROCHET INSERTION FOR LINGERIE.

Fig. 1.—MEDALLION FOR ALBUM COVERS, PORT-FOLIOS, ETC.

Fig. 2.—KNITTED INSERTION. Knit the middle strip of this insertion like the middle strip of the insertion Fig. 1, but with triple instead of double thread. Then take up the loops at each side of the strip on a fine knitting-needle, and, with twisted crochet cotton, No. 80, knit three rounds, going backward and forward, as follows: 1st round.—On each loop knit one stitch plain and one stitch purled. 2d and 3d rounds.—One stitch knit plain on each stitch of the preceding round. Now follows one round more all knit plain with simple embroidery cotton, then cast off loosely.

Medallions for Album Covers, Port-Folios, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE medallions, in colored embroidery, are worked in application, half-polka, and satin stitch embroidery. For the foundation, take cloth, velvet, or gros grain of the color desired, and work the application work with cloth, velvet, and pieces of silk in colors which contrast with the foundation. The half-polka stitch, satin stitch, and point Russe embroidery are worked with saddler's silk of various colors.

Curtain Bands, Figs. 1-3.

THE curtain band of which Fig. 1 shows a full-sized half section, and which is seen reduced in size in Fig. 2, page 405, is made of white woven cotton cord in braid-work. Transfer the design, half of which is given in Fig. 1, in full size to paper, baste on three pieces of cord lying flat next each other, following the lines of the design, and braid the coils of the cord as shown by the same illustration. Pass two single pieces of cord along the still free line of the design through the coils already fastened, knot the ends of both cords together at the ends of the curtain band, where they project ten inches, and furnish them, as shown by Fig. 2, each with a crochet and braided tassel. Tassels suitable for this are given in Figs. 8–12, No. 9, Harper's Bazar, Vol. IV.

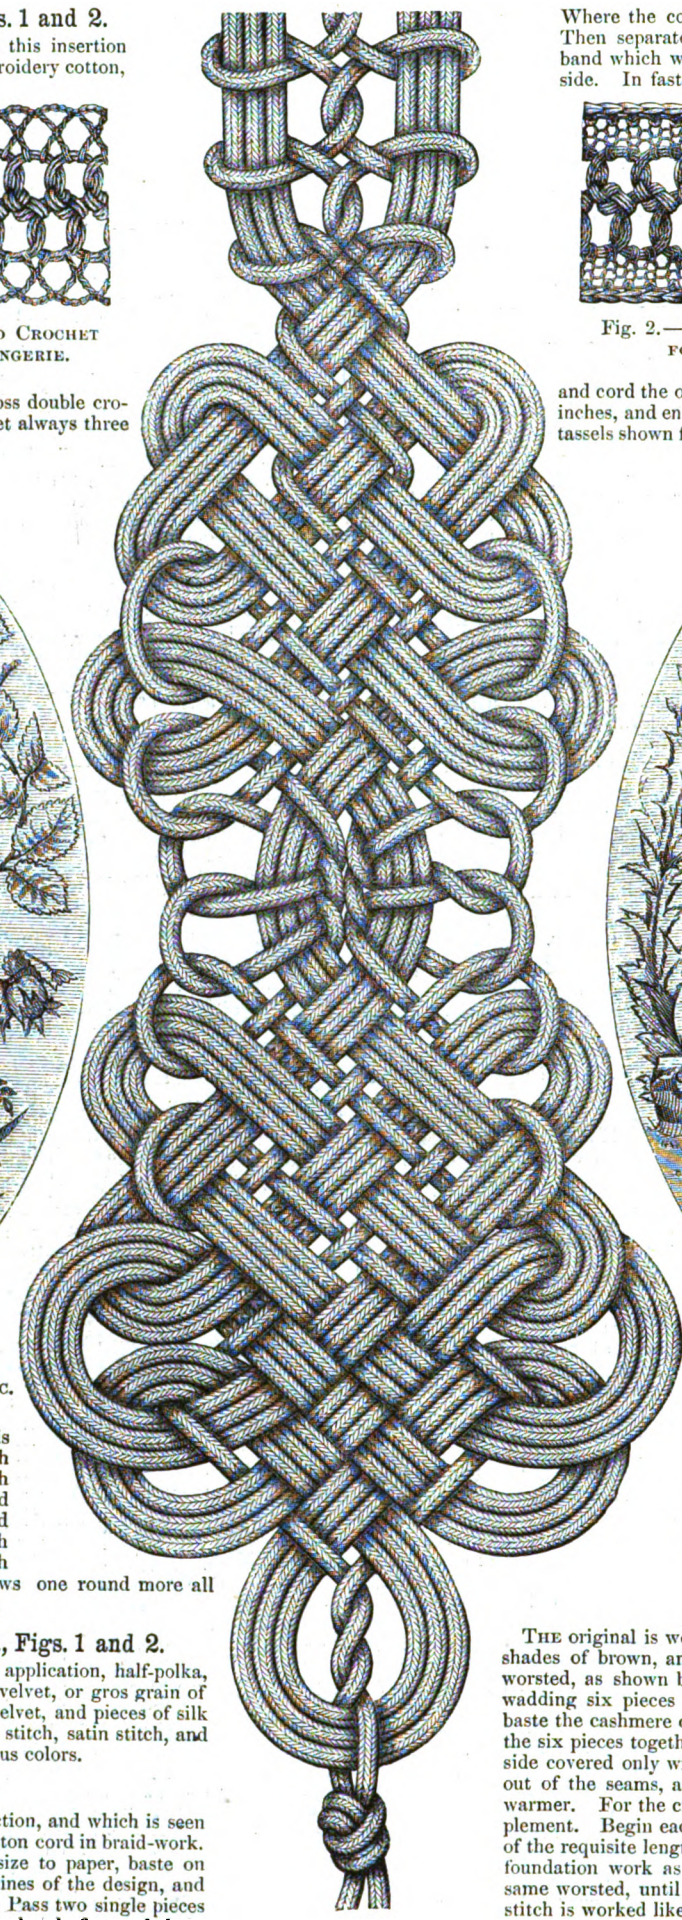

Fig. 1.—HALF OF CORD CURTAIN BAND.—[See Fig. 2, Page 405.]

Where the coils cross or meet, they are joined by means of a few stitches. Then separate the braiding from the foundation. The side of the curtain band which was turned outside in working it is now regarded as the under side. In fastening the curtain band around the curtain, tie the ends of the cord in a bow, as shown by Fig. 2. Fig. 3 shows a curtain band suitable for colored curtains. This is worked in cross stitch on canvas, according to the pattern, one-half of which is given in Fig. 46, Supplement; Figs. 47 and 48 show two suitable designs for the embroidery. The description of symbols under the designs names the colors of the worsted and silk. Of course the colors selected must be in harmony with the color of the curtain. Line the curtain band with muslin of a suitable color, and cord the outer edge. At the ends of the curtain band the cord projects ten inches, and ends in a tassel. Tie the cords in a bow as shown by Fig. 3. The tassels shown for the coffee-warmer, p. 405, may also be used for curtain bands.

Alphabet for marking Lingerie.

THE letters of this alphabet may be used for marking handkerchiefs, bed-linen, towels, table-cloths, napkins, etc. The letters may be worked in point Russe, diagonal half-polka stitch, or back stitch embroidery, with embroidery cotton, red worsted, or black silk.

Coffee-Warmer, Figs. 1-3.

See illustrations on page 405.

THE original is worked in Tunisian loop crochet stitch with double zephyr in two shades of brown, and is ornamented with crocheted cord and tassels of the same worsted, as shown by Fig. 1. Cut of a double layer of net, brown cashmere, and wadding six pieces from Fig. 23, Supplement; lay the wadding between the net, baste the cashmere on one side of the latter, and quilt the whole in diamonds. Sew the six pieces together at the side edges, so that the edges of the seams come on the side covered only with net (the outer side) of the coffee-warmer, draw the wadding out of the seams, and run the material together at the under edge of the coffee-warmer. For the crochet cover work six pieces in the shape given by Fig. 23, Supplement. Begin each part at the under edge as marked on Fig. 23 with a foundation of the requisite length (23 stitches in the original) with the lighter worsted. On this foundation work as many pattern rows in the crochet stitch referred to, with the same worsted, until the straight line given on Fig. 23 is reached. The loop crochet stitch is worked like the simple Tunisian (Victoria or afghan) stitch, only, after the second round of each pattern row, after every two stitches, work one loop of seven chain stitches; these loops must alternate in the following pattern rows: thus the loops must be formed alternately in one pattern row before casting off each second following stitch, in the following pattern row after casting off each second following stitch. Widen at the side edges of the work corresponding to the shape of the pattern. Work the part from the straight line given on Fig. 23 to the upper point with the darker worsted in a similar manner; in working this part first widen, and then narrow at both sides of the work, in order to give it the shape of the pattern. When the six parts are thus completed, sew them together on the under side, cover the joining seams with twisted cord of the lighter worsted, and sew on bows of similar cord and tassels, as shown by the illustration. Make the tassels in the following manner: Take a ruler, or a strip of pasteboard, two inches and two-fifths wide, wind the light brown worsted around it from forty to fifty times, tie the loops thus formed firmly together at one end, take them off the ruler, and run the thread with which the loops have been tied through between the layers of loops to the other end of the loops, draw it tight and sew the loops together there, fastening them at the same time to the end of the cord which is to be ornamented with the tassel. A wooden mould covered with light brown worsted forms the head of the tassel; instead of the wooden mould, one of pasteboard may be used for the head of the tassel; this mould is then covered with worsted as shown by Fig. 2, which shows the tassel in full size. Draw the cover thus far completed over the lining part, sew it on the latter, and furnish the cover at the middle of the top with the rosette and cord loop shown by Fig. 1. For this rosette work with the lighter worsted a foundation of twelve stitches, close this in a ring, and then crochet the first round.—On each foundation stitch 1 dc. (double crochet; three chain stitches instead of the first dc.), after each dc. two chain stitches. 2d round.—1 dc. on each stitch of the first round. Finally, take up two loops from each stitch of the second round, work one chain stitch after forming each loop, and stretch the loop on the needle to a length of two inches and two-fifths. When the loops are worked in this manner all along the outer edge of the rosette, fasten the working thread and cut the loops. Make a foundation of twelve stitches with the darker worsted, close it in a ring, and on this work two rounds of single crochet, widening in such a manner that the part neither gathers nor puckers. Work a round of loops all around this part for the fringe. Crochet over a pasteboard ring, large enough to cover the single crochet part of the darker rosette, with light brown worsted in single crochet, and run the ends of a cord loop two inches and two-fifths long first through a wooden ring covered with light brown worsted, and then through the pasteboard ring described and the two rosettes. Finally, fasten both ends of the loop in the middle of the coffee-warmer as shown by Fig. 1; the covered wooden ring is also fastened to the cord loop with a few stitches. Instead of the tassel shown by Fig. 2, that given in Fig. 3 may be used. The under part of the latter is worked with light brown worsted in the shape of a worsted ball; the head of the tassel is made of pasteboard in the shape given by the illustration, covered with light brown worsted, afterward with a web of dark brown split zephyr worsted.

Netted Cover for Circular Stand.

FOR the foundation of this cover work a square piece of straight netting, which is 209 squares (netting holes) long and broad. Then work the white parts of the design with cotton or glazed yarn in point de reprise, the darker parts in point de toile; the black squares remain free. The last row of squares at both straight outer edges of the illustration form the middle of the design. Round off the corners of the cover, work the outer edge in button-hole stitch, and sew fringe or lace to the under side. The design may also be worked in crochet or tapestry work. For the former crochet for the open-work foundation alternately one double crochet, two chain stitches; for the close squares of the design work the requisite number of double crochets without chain stitch interval. If the design is worked in tapestry for covering sofa-pillows, etc., the embroidery must be worked in three different shades.

AN AFRICAN HAREM.

A COMPANION of Dr. Livingstone gives an interesting account of a visit which was paid by them to Prince Mahomet, of Johanna, one of the Comoro Islands, which lie between the northern extreme of Madagascar and the African coast. He says:

At the time appointed the prince came off to the ship in order to take us on shore in his own boat. He was arrayed in a magnificent dress of bright blue silk, ornamented with gold-lace, and he was evidently in a delightful state of self-consciousness. Dr. Livingstone, two other gentlemen, and myself were ready to accompany him.

The prince's establishment consisted of a group of buildings surrounded by a wall of stone. One of the houses was much larger than the rest, and to this we were taken. After passing through a desolate-looking anteroom we entered an apartment about forty feet square; but though its proportions were noble, its appearance was not attractive. The furniture was scanty, mean, and much worn; the chintz that covered the couches was faded, and the glasses that hung on the whitewashed walls were, with one exception, cracked; the floor was uncarpeted. This was the prince's own apartment, and this probably accounted for the poverty of its appearance. Each wife has her own chamber; and as the greater part of her dowry is expended upon the decorating and furnishing of it, the prince's room probably afforded no fair indication of the character of his whole establishment. Here it was, however, we were to have audience of the ladies.

After inviting us to be seated the prince left us, in order to apprise his wives of our arrival. He went out by a door-way covered by a damask hanging, which, we presumed, led to the ladies' apartments. He returned in a few minutes, and with him came, not a wife, but a little Malay woman, old and shriveled, but full of vivacity. Her sharp, shrill voice rang through the room when she announced that the ladies would soon appear. She was evidently the janitress of the harem, and the prince seemed to be much in awe of her. She was born at Cape Town, but had many years ago married a Johanna man. She spoke English very imperfectly, but Dutch like a Dutchlander; and when she found that Dr. Livingstone could speak that language, her pleasure was so demonstrative I thought she would have embraced him. It seemed greatly to cheer her old heart to hear once more that most ugly of all languages. She asked a multiplicity of questions about Cape Town. She rattled away at the highest pitch of her voice until her excitement fairly broke her down; then she seemed to recollect herself, and, with a kind of chuckle, said, "Now I will send in the ladies," and ran off with quite a youthful agility. After she had retired, the prince, who was evidently excited and somewhat nervous, said, "My wives say I must tell you of a little custom we have whenever strangers are introduced to them. When they come in, they will each one of them come to each of you, and you will have to go through a little ceremony each of you with each of them. Oh, it is not much; it is not what you think," he continued, with a shrewd smile. "It is only this: each of them will hold in her hand a little bit of bread, and each of you will break off a small piece from each and eat it. That done, we are friends—always friends."

We expressed gratification and ready compliance. The ladies not appearing, he disappeared behind the curtain again, but quickly returned. The curtain was then withdrawn, and, standing in a row on either side of the passage, we saw a number of little slave-girls, some of whom were very gayly dressed. Then there came from a room at the end of the passage a stout lady about twenty-five years of age, whose face was only saved from being commonplace by her large and really beautiful eyes. Her appearance as she entered the room was dazzling. The bodice of her dress was of cloth of gold; the short skirt was of Indian muslin, elaborately worked with gold and silver thread; her drawers were of the same material, and similarly ornamented. Her naked feet were slipped into richly adorned sandals, and on her head she wore a purple velvet fez-shaped cap, that was refulgent with gold-lace and jewels. Round her waist she had a jeweled zone, and round her neck "jewels of silver and jewels of gold" were multiplied in a barbarous profusion; she had rings on all her fingers; she wore bracelets, armlets, and anklets of gold; and her ears were strangely decorated, for not only were the lower lobes perforated, but the rim of each ear was pierced in several places, and instead of one jeweled drop, each ear sustained four or five. The first effect produced on me by this profuse display of personal ornamentation was amazement, and then the absurdity of it appeared so great that it was difficult to refrain from laughter. Yet we could not help being pleased with the woman who had taken so much pains with herself to please us; and when she came forward to shake hands, which she did rather awkwardly, we bowed our lowest and smiled our sweetest. To her succeeded a tall, finely built, very handsome woman, of about twenty years of age. Her figure was perfect, the grace of her carriage was faultless, and her large black eyes were so lustrous they seemed to flash light. With the first lady the richness of costume was most prominent, but with this woman the beauty of her person far outshone the magnificence of her attire. She was dressed and ornamented, with some slight variation, like unto her sister-wife, to whom, indeed, she was really sister; for the prince informed us that they were the children not only of the same father, but by the same mother. She moved toward us like a queen—self-possessed and gracious; and though she had not the manner of a European lady, the mode of her hand-shaking was unimpeachable. A few moments elapsed before the third wife presented herself. Her appearance was insignificant, her features expressionless; her eyes lacked lustre; her form, though not angular, was spare and destitute of all grace; her movements were awkward; and though dressed not less grandly than the others, her costume appeared far less resplendent. The prince appeared to feel that we were conscious of her defects, for, as she turned from us after the usual salutation, he exclaimed, "Oh, she is a very tame wife!" (These ladies, be it said, did not understand English.) The curtain over the door-way fell; no other lady appeared. To our look of inquiry the prince replied, "That is all. I have but three wives—only three. If I had as many as my birth entitles me to, I should have twelve—as many as the king; but the French have my island, and so I am only a poor devil with but three wives!"

The introductions ended, the senior lady came forward and held out to us what looked like a thin slice of gingerbread, from which we each broke off a small portion and ate it. It was abominable to the taste; a vile compound of bad oil, Indian corn meal, and sweets. The ladies then seated themselves on a couch opposite to that on which we sat; and we were instructing the prince to convey to them our thanks for the great honor they had done us in granting this interview, and an unbounded admiration of themselves, when, by all that is shocking, we discovered that they chewed betel-nut! For right and left, with a volume, a precision, and a force that a Yankee might have envied, they began to relieve themselves of the consequences of this abominable habit. Up to this point all had seemed consistent with the place and the occasion; but this was a feature in the romance of the harem that I had not looked for. However, we expressed our gratification; and our sentiments being made known to the ladies, they showered upon us smiles and pleasant glances. At this juncture the prince's mother entered the room. She was a very fat, very dirty, but very cheerful old woman. Her dress was a simple robe of brown cotton without ornament of any kind. The prince rose as she entered and led her to a seat; his manner in doing this was most respectful and almost affectionate. He told us that she was a very religious woman, had made the pilgrimage to Mecca, and was regarded as a saint. She showed us a gold watch which she had received from the East India Company in acknowledgment of her kindness to certain English ladies and children, the passengers of one of the Company's ships that had been wrecked on the reef that runs around Johanna. She took them into her house and entertained them for weeks, and from them obtained the knowledge she possessed of the English language.

Our conversation with this old lady was interrupted by the entrance into the room of three African slave-girls, who were very prettily attired in vestments of many colors. Two of them carried silver trays, the contents of which were hidden from our eyes by veils of white muslin; the third was laden with sherbet. At an indication from the chief wife the sherbet-bearer approached and knelt before us, and continued kneeling until we had emptied our glasses and replaced them on the tray. Then one bearing a veiled tray went up to the ladies, and knelt before them. Upon the veil being removed we saw four bouquets, composed of the blossom of a sweet-scented shrub that had been sewn on to a piece of calico cut into the shape of a heart. She who had the pre-eminence with the ladies took a bouquet and looked and smiled at Dr. Livingstone, who went up to her and received it from her hands, and then gallantly fastened it on to the breast of his coat. We were each similarly favored. Then the third girl approached with her burden, and upon the veil being removed, we found that it consisted of four mouthfuls of betel-nut, wrapped in the leaf with which it is masticated. Again a pleasant smile and a sunny glance brought us to the ladies, and we each received our portion of betel-nut. But what were we to do with it? We had disposed of the bouquets satisfactorily, but the betel-nut puzzled us. Was it intended for use or for show? The prince explained that as it was the custom of the English to offer wine to their guests, so was it the custom of his people to offer betel-nut; and when offered, as in the present instance, by a lady, it could not be refused or taken away untasted. After which explanation, we, of course, expressed ourselves delighted to do what was expected of us; but before we had put the objectionable morsel into our mouths, the ladies volunteered to flavor it with a preparation of lime, which they keep by them in small silver boxes, and which gives to it an additional pungency. This the prince declared was not only a delicate attention, but a great honor also; inasmuch as in days gone by only those who had achieved the renown which the pilgrimage to Mecca gave were permitted to take their betel-nut flavored with lime. The thing itself was not offensive to the palate; it tasted something like nutmeg, and it caused an excitement of the glands which was far from being unpleasant, but it made expectoration a necessity. Despite the example of the ladies I strove against doing as they did, but in vain; I was compelled to relieve my mouth or choke. My companions were in the same predicament, and the position became so ludicrous that laughter long and loud was the result. The ladies ascertaining the cause of our mirth laughed also, and we quickly became a very merry party. They told us that the use of betel-nut ought to be general; that it cheered the spirits, allayed pain; that without it fasting was impossible, as it assuaged hunger; that it quieted the restless, and soothed the temper; that it gave rest to the weary and sleep to the sleepless; that, in fact, it made all who used it happy, and should be used, therefore, by every body. The repulsive consequences of its use were as nothing. And we were advised to take a quantity of betel-nuts to England, in order that the English might experience the benefits of its rare qualities. Then the young ladies sought information upon the social and domestic life of English women, and were much amused by our replies; and one of them remarked that it must be very dull to be the only wife of any man—they preferred their own arrangements.

THE HAPPY VALLEY.

In the heart of the long bare uplands
It lies like a river of green,
And the trees each slope descending
Leave a flowery sward between:

A flowery path for the children,
With the oak and the thorn on high;
Coverts to tempt the boldest,
And shelter-spots for the shy.

Come, Love, to the happy valley,
Where the turf slopes smooth and dry;
At our feet the laughing children,
Above the laughing sky.

Life has no hour more golden
Than thus on the grassy slope,
While we blend the age of reason
With the dearer age of hope.

For childhood is of the valley,
Havened from tempest and heat,
With flowers beyond its grasping,
And flowers beneath its feet.

Mid-age has the long bare uplands,
Bare to the heat and the rain:
Come, Love, to the happy valley,
Children with children again.

THE OLD PLUM-TREE.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

"I always loved a fine plum-tree," said the old gentleman, sitting down on the opposite garden bench. "I always longed to own one. And though I came back to this village with another object than to sit beneath this tower of flowers again, yet I could have begged admission to your pleasure-ground for that alone."

He was a handsome, stately gentleman, though long since past the period of his prime. His teeth were still fresh and sparkling, his lips firm and fine; and though wrinkles here and there scored his smoothly shaven face, and though the heavy eyebrows were white as fleece, yet the dark eyes had a certain fire in them, and there was apparent in all his bearing that spirit of undying youth which gives to so many of the old a charm not even possessed by youth itself. He wore on his head a black velvet skull-cap, round whose edges little silver curls fringed themselves picturesquely; and a long cloak—more on his arm than his shoulder—while it gave grace to his figure, told of the liabilities of advancing age.

This personage had, an hour or two before, been seen down the elm-shadowed street of the village alighting at the inn from the coach that once a day lumbered through the place; and now, strolling leisurely up the way, after his rest at the inn, he had paused at the garden gate, surveying the pleasant scene where neighbors' children tumbled together on the fresh-grown turf, watched by a lady whose gray hair was folded away from a sweet, pale face beneath a black lace cap, the lower part of which fell down round her shoulders like a nun's cape.

It was an unusual day for the time of the year; a week of sunshine had already withdrawn all superfluous moisture from the sod, and now this afternoon, with its southerly wind blowing up blue hazes from the woods and meadows, had warmed the air so that no one staid within-doors who had grass-plot or piazza without; and all at once—it seemed as if by the stroke of a wand—the fruit trees had burst the spell of bareness and clothed themselves in bloom, till the whole land was an orchard, billowy with waves of blushing snow.

The stranger had gazed a few moments at the children, who were nowise disconcerted by his neighborhood, and then, with a courteous motion of his hand to the lady, had requested and taken for granted permission to enter the open gate-way, and at the first step had been saluted by the children, who always recognize their friends, with a pelting of cowslip-balls, which he was fain to welcome and return, before passing to the mistress of the garden with some light sentence about the noisy music of the children's laughter.

"Who is ever annoyed by such a sound?" he said. "Not you, my dear madam, I am sure. Who is ever annoyed by the cheerful hubbub of the birds? And the children—"

"Give us our youth again, Sir," said the lady, with a second glance; for there was something in the stranger's face and voice that lent her a vague trouble of remembrance; she could not have told you what.

"There are things in this quaint old garden that exercise such enchantment far more potently for me than they," said the old gentleman. "It is that tree, for one. I always loved an old plum-tree," said he, seating himself uninvited on the rustic bench. "I always longed to own one. And though I came back to this village with another object than merely to sit beneath this tower of flowers again, yet I could have begged admission to your pleasure-ground for that alone; since they told me at the gossiping inn—where they are as familiar with every one's intimate affairs, it seems, as they used to be half a hundred years ago, or less—that this tree was still alive, and that Miss Mabel Vaunce was still its guardian," with an obeisance of lofty kind: "begged admission," he continued, "not to play with any children, or admire them better on one side the gate than the other, but just to see the plum-tree bursting into bloom, as it used to do every spring of my boyhood."

The lady had looked quickly up and then down again, the color came and went on her withered cheek, and a sad smile flitted across her lips and was gone, ere she answered, "I am glad it still lives to give you pleasure, then," and began to look at him more intently than before.

"I thank you," said he. "I thank you. It is a pleasure; as innocent and simple a one as the pleasures of the old are fain to be. But, in truth, where can you find a rarer? When this plum-tree blooms, a flush, a cloud of snow, it is the first act in the whole drama of the year. Ah! once its blooming was for me the first act in a very different drama."

Miss Mabel had turned a little away again; her cheek was very pale, her eyes were downcast—beautiful, soft dove's eyes they were—whether a chord of ancient pain thrilled to these words, or whether some strange premonition warned her of what her unnamed guest was about to say.

"Can it be," she cried, in a tremulous, eager voice, penetrating to the heart—"can it be—"

"I see," he interrupted her, "that the tree has meaning for you as well as me. Pardon me. And let me tell you why it is one of the precious monuments of the past to me. A tough old tree, the plum-tree; nothing but teak and heart of oak can rival it: it will be shaking its bloom and putting on its purple still when you and I are dust and ashes, Mabel."

The lady looked up suddenly once more and bent forward, a thousand thoughts and feelings, apparently, chasing across her face, as cloud-shadows and sunbeams sweep over a field of clover. The stranger gave her a searching glance from those powerful eyes of his, and, as she would have sprang to her feet, his gesture quieted and detained her again to listen.

"I was twenty years old then," said he. "It is almost half a century ago. The blood of youth is hot; its current brooks no obstacles, its impatience no delay. And certainly she was beautiful. No poet ever dreamed of greater beauty than hers, no painter ever painted it—the dark lustre of the eye; the rose upon the cheek; the hair, where just a shadow lay upon the gold; the radiant smile! For forty years and over I have but had to close my eyes to bring that perfect face like a picture before them. As beautiful in its own way now. Only seventeen then, but a woman, with all a woman's dignity and strength beneath her girlish grace. Well, well! You can see that I loved her, madam. I am unwed to-day for her sake. We were neighbors, as they say; our gardens joined; we made love as children across the hedge; we deposited our notes and keepsakes in the hollow of the plum-tree that stood on the dividing line. It is in the middle of the garden now, for the hedge is gone, since, when my father died, it was discovered that his place was mortgaged to the neighbor; and though the payment was long overdue, the kindly neighbor had let the matter alone till the days should be more prosperous with the man whose days were suddenly no more. I was alone in the world, and my tears made my way dark and dim. But then I remembered that she loved me, and a glory would seem to illuminate it. I was penniless too; but what was that to youth and hope and daring? I felt myself rich with all the bounty of her love. My neighbor, moreover, had cared for my future; he had secured me a situation in a house at Hong-Kong; and when he told me of it, time was an affair of moment, and I was to sail the next day. I was in a consternation, not that it gave me no time for preparation, but that I had no time to make my darling ready for my departure. But perhaps I weary you? This long-drawn story—" And he paused till she lifted her white face, and, with a sigh that was half a sob, bade him go on.

"She had been gone from home a month," said he, after a moment more, in which he was gazing not at her, but on the ground, "and was to return that day. On the spot, with all the fire and fervor of my heart, I told her father—the kindly neighbor who was making my fortune for me—how his daughter and I stood with one another. I thought he had known it long ago; but he had seen only two children playing together, and had forgotten that the years were making them man and woman. He smiled. 'It is a boy's dream,' said he.

"'Oh, it is the whole of life!' I answered him.

"'Nay, nay,' he said; 'I have pledged my daughter's hand, so far as I have authority, to my friend;' and he spoke of a man I knew—a noble fellow, I believe he was. 'I must use all effort to redeem my pledge,' said he; 'and I must command you, by your dead father's memory, and by my friendship for him, to make no effort to see my daughter before you sail; to speak to her no syllable of this romantic nonsense, whose meaning you are yet too young fully to comprehend!'

"But I refused to give the promise. How could I, fresh struck and quivering? 'Then,' said he, 'you hurt me to the quick, for you oblige me to refuse to my friend's son the hospitality of my house. I will meet you at the coach-office to-morrow morning, but till then my threshold is forbidden you to cross.' Nor could I blame him. Who is there would have given the treasure he possessed to a beggar such as I? Ah, madam, forgive me for pouring out this story unbidden, this effusion, this license I have no right to take. But indeed I had my purpose in it. And do not think me quite the garrulous old fool I seem. I am back in my own land for the first time in almost fifty years, seeing the faces of my race, hearing its language. The sound of my voice is good to me, here in this garden, beneath the shadow of this snowy plum-tree. Some of its boughs are dead, I see; the little hollow has become a great rent. Well, a portion of our own selves is dead also. And then, when a beggar comes before you, he has always the story that you must hear, you know."

He waited a little while, his head thrown back while he looked steadily up the great blossoming dome of the tree, with the blue pavement of heaven glinting through; and Miss Mabel, sure that he was no longer looking at her, perhaps no longer thinking of her, gazed at him herself again, till all at once an image that was he and yet another swam before her eyes, and the tears burst forth and flooded all the gentle face that years ago had been stamped with the imprint of grief—a grief whose memory had strangely and distantly grown to be something like a joy.

"But you went?" said she, hoarsely, calling him back with the words.

"Ah! Yes, I went. But not till I had seen her come home, rosy and laughing and lovely; had waited in the garden in vain for her to come running down the long pleached alley on the other side of the hedge, as she used to do—a glorious shadow in the sunset splendor streaming through; and at last in a despair had written her, folded the letter in a leathern wallet which we kept for such purpose, and inclosed that again in the little japanned box within the hollow of the plum-tree, that was rocking with a wild, high wind. In my letter I told her," said he, as a hasty flush overspread his hearer's face, while her brown eyes opened in a wistful sort of surprise and bewilderment, "of my fate, of the fate proposed for her. I pleaded for her faith till I could return to claim her. I vowed her mine. And I begged her, if she loved me, if she meant never to swerve, if she was mine for time and for eternity, as I was hers, to assure me of it once again, and for the last time, by setting her light in the little latticed niche that night, that I might see it and take heart of grace, and make my vows again before it, as before a shrine. But that night," said the old man, "the house was dark, the latticed window never showed a spark. Ah! ah! in youth the blood is like a running flame, which it needs the tears of middle life, the snows of age, to extinguish! But perhaps all this is fond and foolish at my years—at yours. Yet there are but a dozen words more, and then 'the rest is silence.'

"It was morning, and I had not slept. I knew I had no choice but to go. And then it was, indeed, the quickest way to her—to her and all the future so close at heart for me by day and night. I sat down to gather the papers in my father's desk together. As I turned them over suddenly the world shrunk into ashes before me; I was myself a burning flame. I had touched papers that but for sudden death would have been destroyed—evidence that my father had been saved from ruin, from more than ruin, from black disgrace, by his neighbor. And as I sat trembling with them in my hand, that neighbor entered. He saw then that I knew all. 'I can not wonder,' cried I, 'that you will not trust your child with one in whose blood creep crime and shame! Oh no; a thousand times no! And see, I owe you so much; I will not owe you all the rest. I will make you the sacrifice; I will give her up.' I sprang through the open door; I ran to the old plum-tree; I put in my hand to learn if she had taken my letter, to withdraw it myself. The place was empty. An adder reared its tiny head and fangs instead. Then she also knew it; she had had my letter; she had refused to give the sign at the latticed niche; she severed our futures herself! What matter was it what became of me! There was no time to lose. They came for me from the coach-office. I was away. Presently the round side of the earth was between us. I tried to forget. I tried to hate. As well try to cease breathing and yet live! Once, when the longing of a year grew unbearable, I wrote to her, and waited. A year afterward my letter, which had been inclosed to her father, was returned to me, unopened, but folded in a kind and friendly letter from himself. I said to myself that it was enough; I would think of that side of the world no more. By-and-by one came from the place, and said my patron, the old neighbor, was about to marry his daughter to—the person of whom he had spoken with me. For a season, then, passion ran riot in these veins. My heart swelled, indeed, as if it would burst. I was wild with longing and envy and hate and love. I engaged a passage back to my home. I would break in on their scheme; I would destroy it; I would destroy them; I would have my own! Furious hopes—but the hopes of forty years ago. And suddenly I was prostrate with the fever of the climate, that left me half destroyed myself; and when I was able again to reason, I said, 'To what end? She is at peace. She is happy. Her own act renounced me. She has forgotten that romance of her childhood and youth. She obeys her father. Why should I go home and shatter all that, bring about discord and grief and pain? And it seems I could not, if I would. Nay, would I, if I could, seal her lot beneath the stamp of so fiery and undisciplined a nature as my own? He is a better man than I. Let me suffer by myself.' And I did—for forty years and over. Day after day, year after year, I loved her none the less. I said to myself, 'She is another man's wife.' But my love was purified from dross, till at length she grew to be to me like the creature of a beautiful dream. And then, at last, came one again from that part of the world where I had left her—the second one in all those years—and I learned that when the time of trial came she had refused to obey her father's command and wish; that the father had long since gone to his rest; that the village fancied—no matter what; that she was still Mabel Vaunce. And the next steamer brought me from sea to sea, till I am at her side. Mabel—?"

But for answer to all that one word said and pleaded, Miss Mabel had started from her seat, had run down the alley once more like a girl, and, flushed and fevered now, was pulling away the moss and brambles from the old plum-tree's hollow, where some birds were building their nest—was thrusting in her hand as she used to do when the hollow was hardly more than the size of the little hand. But it was a different hollow now; her whole arm could disappear in it. What did she care for worms or adders or fluttering birds? Her hand was stirring in the soft powder of débris that had cushioned the place, deepened by the rents of one night's high wind nearly half a hundred years ago—was groping, finding, re-appearing. She held a little worn and rusty japanned box; she had forced it open, unwound a blistered leathern wallet, and had seized the semblance of a letter whose superscription was half illegible with time and damp and rottenness. And then she came slowly back to the old man's side. Happy old Miss Mabel! As she unfolded the sheet, yellow and mouldy, and falling to pieces with the kiss of the fresh air, as her hand shook with it, as her head sank upon it, it was not of the old man before her that she thought at all. Who was he? What was he now to her? A dim shadow in her light. For her part, she was young again—she held a message from the lover of her youth!

But when she had read the letter through, as she might, and its shreds had fluttered from her fingers, the stranger gently took the hand in his.

"Mabel," said he, "we have foregone our youth; should we sacrifice our age? It is true that marriage can not be for us the union of delight and all dear hopes that once it would have been. But it can be peaceful rest in one another's smiles. Believe me, I shall not be less tender of you because my hair is gray and your step is feeble. I shall love you all the better, dear, for the bliss that we have lost out of our lives. Mabel, because we missed the flood of the tide is it any reason that we should not drop down together on the ebb?"

And as Miss Mabel's tears fell on the hand he kissed in such a stately fashion, through their mist the old man seemed to her indeed the lover she had lost; and though the autumn season of her life, with all its frosts and chills, was well-nigh spent, and the hoary winter coming on, its air seemed all at once to be full of Indian summer sunshine. The plum-tree towered and rustled overhead, in itself a wilderness of bloom; the building birds flew in and out of the boughs; the sweet May weather breathed about them a breath of hope and cheer that stirred the pulse; and there in the old garden their age took on a gilding from their youth, and the lives that had been two became one—because love is immortal, and to love all times and seasons and years are the same.

GOLD-FISH.

IT is so pleasant to have bright little living things to caress and to pet that, even in a house where there are baby children, it is quite easy and natural to widen the home circle, so as to include some of Nature's tinier nurslings.

Such happy objects as birds and flowers and innocent animals vie with human beings in their plea to be loving and to be loved, and the manifold claims do not conflict; for the law of affection is so liberally ordained that in its house of many mansions for every new guest a new guest-chamber opens; and "the more the merrier" is the motto of every sunshiny heart.

Having our pets, we must know how to pet them. We must understand something of their nature and their tastes, so as to adapt our attentions appropriately, and not fall into the error of that Parisian young lady who, having enjoyed her new carriage and horses all day in driving from one place of refreshment to another, was told at last that the horses were hungry. "Poor things! is it really possible?" she exclaimed; and, in all the poignant realization of compassion, immediately sent her ice-cream to them.

We must know something, too, about certain characteristic boundaries of "Enough," so that our defenseless treasures shall not be killed with kindness. "A little wholesome neglect" is applicable to the proper management of all the lesser varieties of pets, as well as to the paragon of animals.

Our sensitive Augusta was presented with a gold-fish—one only, because the glass globe in which it was confined was not capable of holding sufficient water to sustain a companion. The globe was hung in the midst of an ivy-arched jardinière; and nothing could be more charming than the effect of this beaming little liquid world shining through the fairy fern-trees of the miniature wild-wood.

The swift circuits of the fish, who darted like a jeweled wand from point to point, gave to his crystal zone quite an air of enchantment; and his two twinkling black eyes and industrious velvet-lipped mouth seemed never weary of exploring. The globe, too, caught bright reflections, and told the story of the room in a quaintly pictured fable.

Every day, in order to renew the water in the vase, it was necessary, temporarily, to remove the fish; and for this exciting transfer Augusta's nerves had not the steadiness. Her slender white fingers trembled at the very thought of seizing the slippery morsel. Her school-boy brothers, however, were only too happy to be intrusted, in turn, with the delicate office; and their rough little brown hands had not the slightest compunction in pulling poor "Flannery"—as they called him—out of one water into another.

The helpless wight accommodated himself to the operation bravely; dashed into the cold gulf without a murmur, and flashed about the big basin like a miracle of joy. He had a way of swallowing whatever his open mouth encountered; and then, if the mouthful proved distasteful, of flinging it contemptuously far out of his jaws. This trick the boys delighted to encourage; and they strewed atoms of straw into the water on purpose to tease their small mountebank into a more frequent performance of "the whale and Jonah."

For a while all went well. But suddenly Augusta noticed a row of black spots upon the shining sides of her "dear, darling gold-fish." These spots gradually enlarged; around his eyes came ominous dark rings. She fancied he grew thinner, and had a melancholy expression; and she began to inquire, anxiously, "How shall I keep him from dying?" "Perhaps," some one suggested, "you ought to feed him with something." But when she asked the men who sold gold-fish, "What do you give your fishes to eat?" they all answered, "Nothing but water."

Her brothers laughed at her fears; said the black spots were the nature of the 'cute beastie; and all the jolly big gold-fish in Central Park had lots of them. And they wagered, with their usual arithmetical prudence in such matters, "ten thousand million dollars" that little "Flannery" would live as long as Uncle Jake's gold-fish—a model thriver, who had been for three years the jovial occupant of a sumptuous water-plant aquarium—the delight of observant acquaintances, and the adoration of his humble companions, a meditative regiment of snails, and its solemn corporal, a tadpole.

But Augusta was not to be comforted. One night the moonlight shone into her chamber, and she could see within the gleaming globe the tiny gold-fish plodding away at his endless curves, and now and then darting frantically to the surface. "They may say what they like," she sighed; "I can feel that little thing suffering."

Surely enough, the imprisoned pet had suffered! On the morrow all was over with poor "Flannery." A dark speck floated on the water, dull as lead, motionless, its pretty wiles quite forgotten, and like nothing so little in the world as a sunny wand of enchantment, or any thing bright, or happy, or living.

A victim, not to cruelty, but to ignorance! To begin with, the globe was too small—too small for any live thing over an inch in length that ever cared to stretch itself from one perpetual routined curve into a little straightforwardness and freedom. Uncle Jake's gold-fish had a habitation ten times his own length, besides romantic ins and outs, fashioned for his daily windings by arches of sparkling rock, and bowers of blooming water-plants. He had, too, the inspiring glances of his kindly companions to encourage his career. No wonder his shadow never grew less!

Poor "Flannery" had one stem of water-plant when he was first put into his globe; but when this was nibbled away no one thought to replace it. All the green reflections necessary to give a pretty effect to the vase were furnished by the fernery in which it was hung. Yet gold-fish love water-weeds. They enjoy the purity that these growing plants give to the water; they like their umbrage as tents and parasols to shield them from the intense rays of the sun; and they are nourished by the leaves.

They are fond of red-stemmed "starwort;" and "milfoil," that changes its winter leaf so daintily to summer flowers; and "anacharis," with pale stem and oval leaf; and grassy "balisneria," that harbors minute water-snails; and "water-pennywort" or hornwort (Hydrocotyle), and floating grains of the duck-weed (Lemna phyrhyza). All these plants can easily be procured from the fresh-water ponds where golden carp are reared, and where they build their leafy nests and exercise, amidst the floating bowers of this familiar foliage, those parental affections for which their special tribe is exceptionally famed.

Wheaten bread, finely crumbled, they will eat also, and the yolks of eggs boiled hard and powdered. But nothing coarse or prickling should be dropped into the globe. The sticks and straws that "Flannery" so funnily flung away tore his delicate mouth and hurt him sorely. As for the rough hands of the school-boy brothers, they were instruments of torture. Those dark spots on his tender sides and the rings of pain around his eyes all came from bruises. He should have been lifted gently in a cup or a little linen net. A perfectly calm and smooth hand, holding water in the hollow of its palm, might, perhaps, avoid giving pain; but the Chinese, who are very successful in their treatment of water pets, say that contact of the hand is sooner or later fatal to gold-fish.

And the water in the globes should not be changed too often. Three times a week in summer is sufficient, in winter twice; and in aquariums where plants are growing freely the needed change is far more seldom. Very cold water makes the gold-fish shudder. They inherit from their ancestry of the Chinese lake—Tche Kiang—certain proclivities that require their tiny zone to be at least temperate. And they are not averse to torrid, as has been proven by mill-ponds in England, where the nature of the manufactory engendered an artificial heat, and their stock of gold-fish, at a temperature of 80°, thrived and multiplied incalculably.

Delight in these gentle and glittering pets is derived from the Orient. The Chinese and Japanese have in every house an aquarium, and they tame the gold-fish to answer whistles and pet names. The Romans cultivated them enthusiastically. One Roman emperor was surnamed "Aurelius" for his love of gold-fish. In Portugal they were introduced early, escaping, it is said, from a vessel of Chinese cargo, and from Lisbon were carried to France and England, and eventually to America.

But the most beautiful gold-fish are still peculiar to China. One naturalist describes eighty varieties of the most graceful shape, and not shining only with silver and jet and red bronze and gold, but sparkling with the colors of jewels—topaz and sapphire and rubies and pearls.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE Boston school committee to whom was referred the matter of making Saturday a holiday in the Latin School, and thus decreasing the hours of study demanded, have come to the conclusion that ample time for relaxation is afforded the pupils under the present system. The average amount of time the boys study out of school is only two hours and six minutes! Moreover, on questioning parents, a large proportion do not feel sure that their children are injured by hard study, and do not care to have Saturday a holiday. We wonder how many of those parents considered the matter in a physiological point of view, and how many only thought, "What a noise there will be in the house on Saturdays if John and James are at home all day long!" If Boston children grow pale and sickly, will not the parents have to share the responsibility with the school committee?

It seems that the committee referred to considered it better to distribute the studies through six days in the week rather than to crowd them into five. Possibly. But does not the difficulty lie farther back? We confess to having a strong sympathy with the views of the superintendent of the public schools in Maine, who is courageous enough to demand that sundry mathematical conundrums and puzzles, and useless memorizing of hard names, be eradicated from the course of common-school study; that all be taught the really common branches thoroughly, but that the overstimulating of tender brains, which so often results in sickness and death, be avoided. The children of the present day are forced into learning too much, and too early, from books. Their pale faces and weary looks often plead for them that their bodies may have time to grow.

Apropos of schools and their management, the town of Ithaca appears to be yet in the dark ages of barbarism. Otherwise, why should a schoolmaster be suffered, for a trifling fault, to inflict an unmerciful flagellation on a little girl of eight years old? The strap used left her back inflamed and discolored. In extenuation of his treatment the master told the mother of the child that "he whipped the child so hard because she screamed!"

A lady sends a request to a Washington paper that it will advertise for one hundred and fifty young men of all shapes and sizes, to form a gaping crowd to stand at the door-ways when evening assemblies are dismissed, to stare at the ladies and make remarks about their persons and dress. We think this branch of business must have been advertised largely before—it is so very flourishing.

Most bright boys will remind their fathers of the trout-fishing season by a request for a five-jointed fishing-rod. Judicious paternals will give heed to the demand. To those who demur to the request, a gentle intimation may be given that a wise man once said, "Spare the rod, and spoil the child," and that doubtless this was the kind of rod to which he referred. At any rate, it generally makes a boy good and happy, for a while at least.

The "Primitive Methodists" of London and vicinity recently held a great camp-meeting in Talltrees Meadows. It is seven years since so large a gathering of this character has been held in London.

A German writer informs us that a great variety of colors and dyes can be readily obtained from common plants, the method consisting principally in boiling them in water so as to produce a strong decoction. For instance: the well-known huckleberry or blueberry, when boiled down, with an addition of a little alum and a solution of copperas, will develop an excellent blue color. The same treatment, with a solution of nut-galls, produces a clean, dark brown tint; while, with alum, verdigris, and sal ammoniac, various shades of purple and red can be obtained. The fruit of the elder will also produce a blue color when treated with alum. The privet boiled in a solution of salt will furnish an excellent color, while the overripe berries yield a scarlet-red. The seeds of the common burning-bush, when treated with sal ammoniac, produce a beautiful purple-red; while the juice of the currant, pressed out and mixed with a solution of alum, will furnish a bright red color. The bark treated in the same way produces a brown. Yellow can be obtained from the bark of the apple-tree, the box, the ash, the buckthorn, the poplar, elm, etc., when boiled in water and treated with alum. A lively green is furnished by the broom-corn, and brownish-green by the genista.

A young girl about fifteen years old, and an orphan, recently committed suicide in this city under peculiarly sad circumstances. She was an interesting, intelligent girl, but one day yielded to temptation and purloined a bit of silk from the room of a lady living in the same house with her, and with it trimmed a hat. The loss of the silk was discovered, and the girl confessed her fault and begged forgiveness, and also entreated that her uncle, with whom she lived, might not be informed of what she had done. But the lady deemed it her duty to resist the appeal, and said she should tell her uncle. The poor girl went from her overwhelmed with shame and terror. Nothing more was seen of her until—in the evening—she was found dead in her bed, having shot herself through the heart with a pistol which she had taken from her uncle's trunk.

The voice is frequently an index of the mind. Temper has an effect upon tone, and habits of querulousness or ill-nature will communicate an unpleasing quality to the voice, noticeable both in speaking and in singing. To all, and particularly to women, an agreeable voice is a very desirable endowment.

The sculptor Powers seems not to have been always successful in collecting his debts. In his studio in Florence are three plaster busts on which are written in full the names of the owners, and below the words, "Put into marble and sent home, but never paid for." It is the custom of Mr. Powers to retain many of his works in plaster, and thus his studio is one of the most interesting in Florence.

In Venice there is a little newspaper published every Sunday, entitled La Donna. It is edited by a lady, Signora Gualberta Alaide Beccari, and among its contributors are several well-known ladies.

Santa Clara Valley, in California, contains a strawberry plantation of about three hundred acres, which is irrigated by artesian wells. The best fields of vines in California yield, in their third and fourth year, from four to six thousand pounds of strawberries per acre. We say pounds, for in California, as might well be the custom elsewhere, fruit is sold by weight. The wholesale price of strawberries in San Francisco about the middle of May was five cents a pound, and from sixty to seventy thousand pounds were received every day. The strawberries are mostly grown on shares by Chinamen, and as the vines produce nothing the first year, the land owner supplies necessaries to the cultivators on credit. It is estimated that the profit to the owner of the ground from this crop amounts to $100 an acre.

June is the month of roses—and never is our charming Central Park more lovely than when this favorite flower is in abundant blossom. The so-called "Bank of Roses," when in full bloom, is a beautiful sight, and of itself will amply repay any visitor. The largest rose-bush known is said to be a white banksia, in the Marine Garden at London. It was donated in 1812. Its numerous branches, some of which measure eighteen inches in circumference, cover an immense wall to a width of nearly sixty feet, and at times, in early spring, as many as fifty thousand flowers have been counted on this queen of all roses. An ancient rose-bush, supposed to be the oldest in existence, is trained upon one side of the cathedral of Hildesheim, in Germany. The root is buried under the crypt, the stem is a foot thick, and half a dozen branches nearly cover the eastern side of the church, bearing countless flowers in summer. Its age is unknown, but documents exist which prove that a Bishop Hezilo, nearly a thousand years ago, protected it by a stone roof, which is still extant.

"An Autobiography of Satan," by an English clergyman, is announced. "The History of the Devil" was written years ago by Daniel De Foe.

The famous German novelist, Berthold Auerbach, has dropped light subjects, and turned his attention to political matters.

The publisher of the Moscow Gazette has offered 10,000 rubles for the best novel, written either in Russian, German, or French, upon a Russian subject.

There grows on some of the Western prairies a "compass plant," so called because it has been alleged to possess a remarkable property of directing its leaves north and south to such a degree that the points of the compass can readily be determined from their examination. This statement has been contradicted by some travelers, who have been able to detect no such tendency in the leaves. This discrepancy has been recently reconciled by the discovery that the peculiarity is only appreciable in the young plants when they first come up, since after becoming larger they are moved out of their place by wind and rain, and unable to regain their original position.

One evening at Booth's Theatre, when Richelieu (Edwin Booth) had uttered the words, "France, my mistress, my wedded wife, who shall proclaim divorce 'twixt thee and me?" a deep voice from the audience replied, "Chicago!" Considerable audible smiling followed.

Henry Ward Beecher says: "Making people happy is neither a small nor an unimportant business. As I regard good-nature as one of the richest fruits of Christianity, so I regard the making of people round us happy as one of the best manifestations of that Christian disposition which we are commanded to wear as a garment."

Cambric Garden Hat.

THIS garden hat is made of a square piece of white cambric twenty-six inches long and wide, and is trimmed with pink silk ribbon. Cut, first, for the crown, of a double layer of stiff lace, one piece eight inches and three-quarters wide and ten inches and a half long; lay one end of this piece in a pleat half an inch deep at a distance of two inches and a half from each side. Sew covered wire along the outer edge of the stiff lace crown, and two inches and a half from it, and bind it with a strip of Swiss muslin. On the crown thus formed arrange the cambric part, which is hemmed on the edge half an inch wide (the pleated end of the crown forms the back edge). Lay the cambric part on the crown so that one corner of it projects over the front edge of the crown six inches and a half; turn down this corner on the under side of the crown, and fasten it there with a few stitches. Then turn down the side edges of the piece of material on the under side of the crown, and arrange them in triangular pleats, which are fastened at the front corners of the crown, and, six inches and a half from these, to the side edge of the crown. Then arrange the material at the middle of the back, at a distance of fourteen inches and a half from the back (the under) corner, in four pleats four-fifths of an inch deep, facing each other, the outer folds of which must be an inch and a quarter apart. Set a pink silk ribbon sixteen inches long and two inches and a half wide on each of the two side corners of the piece of material. These ribbons are tied in a bow at the middle of the back of the hat above the pleats there, as shown by the illustration. Finally, furnish the hat with strings, which are fastened on the inside of the crown at a distance of two inches and a half from the side edge, and five inches and a quarter from the front edge of the crown.

Swiss Muslin Fichu-Collar with Frills.

THIS collar is made of Swiss muslin, trimmed with box-pleated frills of the same material an inch and a half, three-quarters, and half an inch wide, application needle-work figures, pipings, and a rosette of pink crêpe de Chine. To make the collar, cut of Swiss muslin one piece from Fig. 21, Supplement. Lay the front of this piece along each dotted line in a fold, by which the revers are formed. Sew on the trimming as shown by the illustration. The revers are sewed on the foundation with a few stitches.

Swiss Muslin Fichu-Collar with Ribbon Trimming.

TO make this collar, which is usually worn with dresses with heart-shaped necks, cut one piece of Swiss muslin from Fig. 22, Supplement. Trim the edge of this piece with a strip of French embroidery two inches and a half wide, and the neck with a strip of the same three-quarters of an inch wide. Trim the collar also with black velvet ribbon an inch and three-quarters wide, as shown by the illustration. At the front of the collar set a bow and ends of the same ribbon.

Fig. 1. — FOULARD DRESS WITH SQUARE-NECKED BASQUE. This dress is made of white and blue striped foulard, trimmed with bias strips of blue silk piped on both sides. The neck, basque, and sleeves are trimmed with a side-pleated strip of foulard. Chemisette and sleeves of Swiss muslin and embroidery. Hat of English straw braid, trimmed with blue gros grain ribbon and blue flowers. Blue parasol lined with white.

Fig. 2.—LOW-NECKED SILK DRESS WITH SWISS MUSLIN BASQUE. This dress is made of lavender silk, over which is worn a Swiss muslin basque trimmed with Swiss muslin insertion and side-pleated Swiss muslin ruffles. Lavender silk bow. To make the basque cut of Swiss muslin two pieces each from Figs. 16 and 17, Supplement, from Figs. 18 and 19 one piece each, and the sleeves from Fig. 20, observing the deviating contour of the under part of the sleeve. Sew up the darts in the fronts, face the front edge of the fronts with a strip of Swiss muslin an inch and a quarter wide, and join Figs. 16–19 according to the corresponding figures. The upper edge of the basque skirt (Fig. 18) must first have been arranged in pleats, bringing × on ●. Make a narrow hem on the bottom of the basque and along the slits, cord the neck with Swiss muslin, and sew on the trimming as shown by the illustration; cut away the material of the basque under the insertion, and fasten the edges carefully. Sew up the sleeves from 43 to 44, and from 45 to 46, face the bottom and the slit with a strip of Swiss muslin half an inch wide, set on the trimming, lay the top in pleats, bringing × on ●, and sew them into the corded armholes according to the corresponding figures. Buttons and buttonholes close the basque. Set a lavender REST.

THERE comes a time in a man's life when he looks out for pauses and periods of rest. There is a time when a man is overflowing with energy. He both finds work and makes work.

GYMNASTIC SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 24–27.

He cuts down trees in the forest of difficulty. He fights with windmills. He sketches out a programme which it would take several lifetimes to encompass. He puts no limit to his energies or his range of possibilities. By-and-by a man finds that his sphere is strictly limited and defined. He seeks to curtail rather than extend his engagements. He no longer thinks that he can know every body and go every where, but recognizes that in fact he can, comparatively, only know few persons and go to a few places. He understands small economies of time and circumstances. He appreciates the laissez faire. He has a growing opinion in favor of holidays. Instead of being always busy, he appreciates pauses from business. He studies to be quiet. He begins to think that speech is silvern and silence is golden. He appreciates rest.

GYMNASTIC SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 30

The taste for rest grows with our growth in wisdom. A child can not understand it. When a child is told that his father or mother wants to be quiet, the sentence is a wonderment to him. Mrs. Schimmelpenninck says that, when she was a child of six, her parents taught her to fold her hands and be quiet for half an hour. This valuable art might be taught at our schools, even if charged for as an extra. The taste for quiet and thoughtfulness ought to be developed as much as any other taste. Rest is an investment for action. All mere friction—friction and nothing more—is waste and loss. The wasted sparkle and glitter might have been consolidated into the diamond. There is a balance and equipoise in nature, and any caloric that is uselessly given off is a deduction from the sum of vital heat. In rest you recuperate from fatigue, and you also store up force for action. The prophet is sent into the wilderness before he begins his mission amidst cities. In the lives of various great men you will find periods in which they seemed condemned to inactivity. But they were merely couchant for a spring. In fact, I have known energetic men who, in very quiet times, ask themselves for what special work they are reserved, and are firm in the belief that their rest simply means that there will assuredly be a strain upon their energies. And they find that thus it comes to pass.

There are all kinds of ways for economizing rest. And just in proportion as a man realizes the preciousness of effort and of work, as he would desire not to lead a feeble life of ineffectual aims, so far will he be jealous of useless effort, and desire to spare himself all friction and controversy. Life is too short for quarreling and for a lot of other things as well. As far as possible let there be no waste in life, as there is none in nature. There are many ways in which a man may achieve a masterly inactivity. You may be silent when others speak. You may be solitary when others are in company. You may refuse to see people in the morning. You may always have a cigar or a novel after dinner. You may resolve never to do any work after the curfew-bell. You will insist that your space of life shall have park and flowers as well as pavement and cabbage-garden. You will beware of sudden abnormal effort, relying rather on steady, careful work. Rest is a true element in good workmanship. Of course rest is mainly for the sake of work. A wise man will rather wear out than rust out, considering that he must work while it is day, and that there is all eternity wherein to rest. But still we may have "a central peace subsisting at the heart of endless agitation," a restfulness of heart which sweetens work and alone makes it prosperous. A cynical statesman once said that life would be very tolerable if it were not for its amusements; but amusement implies rest, and without rest life would be intolerable—impossible. A wise man will lay it up as treasure and economize its stores.

SUMMER FLOWERS.

See illustration on page 412.

WHEN skies are bright, and Nature's face
Of sadness knows no shadow,
And Summer's hand is clear to trace
In woodland and in meadow;
What time the long-lost summer sun
Laughs on the laughing hours—
Hinted by Spring ere spring was done—
We pluck the summer flowers.

Or culled in garden's rich parterre,
Or by the hedge-row wild,
Where cultured fragrance steeps the air,
Or where, by breezes mild
Nurtured spontaneous, Summer's store
Fulfills the pledge of Spring,
We search the flowery treasure o'er
Which summer bounties bring.

Those summer flowers, where'er they be,
In wild or tutored places,
Are sweet; but ah, more sweet to see
Are yonder summer faces!
And summer flowers, from out their bed
When plucked by girlish hand,
Show best encircling girlish head
Within their odorous band.

Then gather flowers while yet you may;
Life's opening sweetness cherish,
Ere age shall shadow youth's glad day,
Ere life's one summer perish.
Ah me! you merry girlish crew,
Your laughter speeds the hours;
Your flowers are very fair, but you
Are summer's choicest flowers.

THE LEGEND OF RHOSBERRY TOPPING.

See illustration on page 412.

DREAM had warned and seer had spoke of Northumbria's heir:
"Count his birthdays one by one, of the fifth beware!"

Chance, disease, or traitor's blow—what, no prophet said:
Heavy hung the mystic doom o'er the bright baby head.

Fair upon the Yorkshire moors glowed the 8th of June—
Five years would Prince Oswy count at the stroke of noon.

High on lofty Rhosberry sat the nurse and child;
Princess Gerda's trusty guards round its base defiled.

Bright the sun on Cleveland rose, gilding hills and dales;
Rich the uplands swept away on to Richmond's vales.

O'er Guisboro's lordly towers rose Upleatham's height;
Beyond, the glorious Northern sea lay in living light.

Down the hill-side from the crags rang the shout of joy,
As 'mid rocks and heather blooms sprang the happy boy.

True and keen the soldiers watched; rough and tender jest,
Swore no harm could touch the babe on the Topping's crest.

At her Priory at Mount Grace, Princess Gerda prayed—
All her care could do was done—"Mary Mother, aid."

On the counted hours crept; the anxious vigil done,
Over Easby's crimsoned moor sinks the ling'ring sun.

"Call the boy. What, ho, my Prince!" through the summer gloaming
Rose the Northman's ringing hail, "Lo, the Princess coming."

"What! he hears not! Call once more." With a growing dread,
Fast and far up hill and holt cnecht and captain sped.

Low voice steady, dark eye fixed, white lip set like stone,
Speechless in her presage dark, Gerda led them on.

High on lofty Rhosberry the false guardian slept;
Just below a tiny beck through green fern leaves crept.

It danced with lily blossoms, with violet leaflets played;
It sighed around a baby face, amid its eddies laid;

It kissed the rosy lips, the bright curls floating there;
It sang its dirge above him, the widow's treasured heir.

Dead on lofty Rhosberry—silent, dead, and cold:
Out from fair Kirkleatham's towers June's sad midnight tolled.

Where the Esk's brown waters blend with the fatal beck,
They laid the pretty boy to sleep, fair craft for early wreck.

To Mount Grace's Priory the pale Princess went;
There the crushed life wore away, prayer and penance spent.

Still at lone Osmotherley stands the old gray cross;
Still the hamlet's name recalls Gerda's bitter loss.

Still the travelers who climb the Topping's rocky side
Sigh, recalling where of old the mother's darling died.

FISCHER'S METHOD OF BLEACHING STRAW.

A METHOD of bleaching straw, which is said to secure a result much superior to that of the ordinary processes, while not affecting the firmness of the material in the slightest degree, consists in placing the straw in question in tubs of whitewood, and pouring hot water upon it, and allowing it to remain twenty-four hours, after which the water is to be poured off. The straw is then to be boiled for three hours in a copper vessel in a lye prepared by adding one pound of soda to one quart of water, and from time to time replacing the water which escapes in steam without interrupting the boiling. The solution is then allowed to cool, and the straw again placed in the tub and covered with cold water, which is poured off after it has become of a yellow color. Then fresh water is to be used in the same manner several times until the water seems clear. The straw is again to be boiled in a solution half as strong as the original one, and then removed, and boiling water poured over it in a tub, which is allowed to cool, and cold water again poured upon it. This operation is to be repeated from time to time for three days. After this the straw is to be covered with a solution of chloride of lime or chloride of sodium, the vessel closed and left for twenty-four to thirty-six hours, or longer, until the straw becomes completely bleached. The liquid need not be thrown away, but can be used for the earlier processes of the preparation of other quantities of straw. The straw thus prepared acquires a peculiar and rather persistent smell, which can, however, be removed by placing it in water in which a little sulphate of soda has been dissolved, and then rinsing it off with fresh water.

DUTCH MARRIAGES.

IS it possible that even the young of the sober-minded Dutchmen fall in love? Young people do fall in love in the customary manner, and the swain makes his offer without any intermediary assistance. A marriage of convenience is an unheard-of thing. Consent of parents, however, is necessary, for without it the marriage of persons, even up to the age of thirty, may be declared absolutely null and void; but any one who is more than twenty-one has a legal means of bringing a recalcitrant parent to reason. When all that delightful private arrangement has been made, and consent of parents obtained, the engagement soon gets abroad, and the young couple have to go in company to make calls upon his friends and her friends. The proverbial slip 'twixt cup and lip is not unknown in Holland as elsewhere; nevertheless, this system of making formal engaged calls certainly does tend to prevent a rupture upon slight grounds; for it is a matter of no small embarrassment to call upon the same people a second time and ceremoniously introduce sweetheart number two! It is held to be part of a lover's duties to accompany his mistress to parties and balls, and also his right and pleasure to take her to theatres and concerts unaccompanied by a chaperon; but he is seldom asked to pay a visit in the same house with her for more than the day. Lovers always choose the house and buy the furniture together during the courtship. When the time comes the two go together alone to the town-hall for the "aanteekening" or betrothal. This is merely a public notice of the intention to marry, and is given in writing. The notice is then put into a kind of box, protected by brass wire, and placed for some time in a conspicuous part of the hall. Bans are also published in church. A runaway match is held to be thoroughly disgraceful, is accomplished with difficulty, and seldom attempted. Friends now, in place of wedding-cards, receive by post a lithographed document announcing the aanteekening. On the first Sunday afternoon subsequent to this the bruid and bruidgom, who are thus called in the interval between the aanteekening and the wedding-day, hold a grand reception in the drawing-room of the father of the bruid. A sofa, sometimes gayly decorated with flowers and evergreens, being occupied by the two; the bruid's relations range themselves at his right hand, the bruidgom's at hers. The bruid wears her wedding-dress, veil, and orange wreath on this occasion, and the company generally are in gala costume. Visitors then, when announced, march up between the two opposite lines of relations, and make pretty speeches to the happy pair, and, after having intrusted themselves for a short time to the care of the bruidsmeisjes, who, dressed for the occasion, show the presents, placed upon a table at the other end of the room, and offer hippocras and sweets called "bruidssuikers," and cake, make a rapid departure, and are succeeded by others. The wedding commonly takes place on the Thursday week after reception Sunday, and during the interval balls and parties are given in honor of the young couple. On the appointed day of the wedding-party bruid and bruidgom, going alone in the first carriage, make first for the town-hall. The burgomaster marries them, makes a little speech, and receives their signatures; to all this there must be four witnesses. Then to church in the same order. The party having assembled in a sort of vestry, the bruidgom gives his right arm to the bruid, and leads the way to the chancel (reserved nowadays for marriages only) or to the body of the church in front of the pulpit. Here the pair seat themselves upon a central sofa, and relations range themselves as at the aanteekening reception. The ceremony is simple, the couple being already married. After a hymn has been sung they merely have to acknowledge the fact of marriage in answer to the clergyman, and having advanced to two kneeling-chairs ready placed a few steps in front, receive a blessing from him and a short exhortation. No ring is used, but one is sometimes worn subsequently. The new husband then gives his left arm to his wife and leads the way home again. The wedding breakfast is a small affair, attended by very near relations only, and the happy pair slip off without adieux as soon as possible. The wedding dress is never worn again in its original state. Settlements seem to be in full accord with the Code Napoleon.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER XVI.

LORD CALDERWOOD IS THE CAUSE OF INCONVENIENCE.

THE preparations for the wedding went on gayly, and whatever inclination to revolt may have lurked in George Fairfax's breast, he made no sign. Since his insolent address that night in the corridor he had scarcely spoken to Clarissa; but he kept a furtive watch upon her, notwithstanding, and she knew it, and sickened under it as under an evil influence. He was very angry with her—she was fully conscious of that—unjustifiably, unreasonably angry. More than once, when Mr. Granger was especially attentive, she had encountered a withering glance from those dark gray eyes; and she had been weak enough, wicked enough, perhaps, to try and make him perceive that Mr. Granger's attentions were in no way pleasant to her. She could bear any thing better than that he should think her capable of courting this man's admiration.

While this silent struggle was going on, and the date of the marriage growing nearer and nearer, Mr. Granger's attentions became daily more marked. It was impossible even for Clarissa, preoccupied as she was by those other thoughts, to doubt that he admired her with something more than common admiration. Miss Granger's evident uneasiness and anger were in themselves sufficient to give emphasis to this fact. That young lady, mistress of herself as she was upon most occasions, found the present state of things too much for her endurance. For the last ten years of her life, ever since she was a precocious damsel of twelve, brought to a premature state of cultivation by an expensive forcing apparatus of governesses and masters, she had been in the habit of assuring herself and her confidantes that her father would never marry again. She had a very keen sense of the importance of wealth, and from that tender age of twelve or so upward she had been fully aware of the diminution her own position would undergo in the event of a second marriage, and the advent of a son to the house of Granger. Governesses and maid-servants had perhaps impressed this upon her at some still earlier stage of her existence; but from this time upward she had needed nothing to remind her of the fact, and she had watched her father with an unwearying vigilance.

More than once, strong-minded and practical as he was, she had seen him in danger. Attractive widows and dashing spinsters had marked him for their prey, and he had seemed not quite adamant; but the hour of peril had passed, and the widow or the spinster had gone her way, with all her munitions of war expended, and Daniel Granger still unscathed. This time it was very different. Mr. Granger showed an interest in Clarissa which he had never before exhibited in any member of her sex since he wooed and won the first Mrs. Granger; and as his marriage had been by no means a romantic affair, but rather a prudential arrangement made and entered upon by Daniel Granger the elder, iron-master, of Sheffield, on the one part, and Thomas Talloway, cotton-spinner, of Manchester, on the other part, it is doubtful whether Miss Sophy Talloway had ever in her antenuptial days engrossed so much of his attention.

Having no one else at Hale to whom she could venture to unbosom herself, Miss Granger was fain to make a confidante of her maid, although she did not, as a general rule, affect familiarity with servants. This maid, who was a mature damsel of five-and-thirty or upward, and a most estimable Church-of-England person, had been with Miss Granger for a great many years; had curled her hair for her when she wore it in a crop, and even remembered her in her last edition of pinafores. Some degree of familiarity therefore might be excused, and the formal Sophia would now and then expand a little in her intercourse with Warman.

One night, a very little while before Lady Geraldine's wedding-day, the cautious Warman, while brushing Miss Granger's long, straight, light brown hair, ventured to suggest that her mistress looked out of spirits. Had she said that Sophia looked excessively cross she would scarcely have been beside the mark.

"Well, Warman," Miss Granger replied, in rather a shrewish tone, "I am out of spirits. I have been very much annoyed this evening by papa's attentions to—by the designing conduct of a young lady here."

"I think I can guess who the young lady is, miss," Warman answered, shrewdly.

"Oh, I suppose so," cried Sophia, giving her head an angry jerk, which almost sent the brush out of her abigail's hand: "servants know every thing."

"Well, you see, miss, servants have eyes and ears, and they can't very well help using them. People think we're inquisitive and prying if we venture to see things going on under our very noses; and so hypocrisy gets to be almost part of a servant's education, and what people call a good servant is a smooth-faced creature that pretends to see nothing and to understand nothing. But my principles won't allow of my stooping to that sort of thing, Miss Granger, and what I think I say. I know my duty as a servant, and I know the value of my own immortal soul as a human being."

"How you do preach, Warman! Who wants you to be a hypocrite?" exclaimed Sophia, impatiently. "It's always provoking to hear that one's affairs have been talked over by a herd of servants; but I suppose it's inevitable. And pray what have they been saying about papa?"

"Well, miss, I've heard a good deal of talk of one kind and another. You see your papa is looked upon as a great gentleman in the county, and people will talk about him. There's Norris, Lady Laura's own footman, who's a good deal in the drawing-room—really a very intelligent, well-brought-up young man, and, I am happy to say, not a dissenter. Norris takes a good deal of notice of what's going on, and he has made a good many remarks upon your par's attention to Miss Lovel. Looking at the position of the parties, you see, miss, it would be such a curious thing if it were to be brought round for that young lady to be mistress of Arden Court."

"Good gracious me, Warman!" cried Sophia, aghast; "you don't suppose that papa would marry again?"

"Well, I can't really say, miss. But when a gentleman of your par's age pays so much attention to a lady young enough to be his daughter, it generally ends that way."

There was evidently no consolation to be obtained from Warman, nor was that astute handmaiden to be betrayed into any expression of opinion against Miss Lovel. It seemed to her more than probable that Clarissa Lovel might come before long to reign over the household at Arden, and the all-powerful Sophia sink to a minor position. Strong language of any kind was, therefore, likely to be dangerous. Hannah Warman valued her place, which was a good one, and would perhaps be still better under a more impulsive and generous mistress. The safest thing, therefore, was to close the conversation with one of those pious platitudes which Warman had always at her command.

"Whatever may happen, miss, we are in the hands of Providence," she said, solemnly; "and let us trust that things will be so regulated as to work for the good of our immortal souls. No one can go through life without trials, miss, and perhaps yours may be coming upon you now; but we know that such chastisements are intended for our benefit."

Sophia Granger had encouraged this kind of talk from the lips of Warman and other humble disciples too often to be able to object to it just now; but her temper was by no means improved by this conversation, and she dismissed her maid presently with a very cool good-night.

On the third day before the wedding George Fairfax's mother arrived at the Castle, in order to assist in this important event in her son's life. Clarissa contemplated this lady with a peculiar interest, and was not a little wounded by the strange coldness with which Mrs. Fairfax greeted her upon her being introduced by Lady Laura to the new arrival. This coldness was all the more striking on account of the perfect urbanity of Mrs. Fairfax's manners in a general way, and a certain winning gentleness which distinguished her on most occasions. It seemed to Clarissa as if she recoiled with something like aversion at the sound of her name.

"Miss Lovel of Arden Court, I believe?" she said, looking at Lady Laura.

"Yes; my dear Clarissa is the only daughter of the gentleman who, till lately, was owner of Arden Court. It has passed into other hands now."

"I beg your pardon. I did not know there had been any change."

And then Mrs. Fairfax continued her previous conversation with Lady Laura, as if anxious to have done with the subject of Miss Lovel.

Nor in the three days before the wedding did she take any farther notice of Clarissa; a neglect the girl felt keenly; all the more so because she was interested in spite of herself in this pale, faded lady of sixty, who still bore the traces of great beauty, and who carried herself with the grace of a queen. She had that air du faubourg which we hear of in the duchesses and marchionesses of a departed era in Parisian society—a serene and tranquil elegance which never tries to be elegant, a perfect self-possession which never degenerates into insolence.

In a party so large as that now assembled at Hale, this tacit avoidance of one person could scarcely be called a rudeness. It might so easily be accidental. Clarissa felt it, nevertheless, and felt somehow that it was not accidental. Though she could never be any thing to George Fairfax, though all possibility even of friendship was at an end between them, she would have liked to gain his mother's regard. It was an idle wish, perhaps, but scarcely an unnatural one.

She watched Mrs. Fairfax and Lady Geraldine together. The affection between those two was very evident. Never did the younger lady appear to greater advantage than in her intercourse with her future mother-in-law. All pride and coldness vanished in that society, and Geraldine Challoner became genial and womanly.

"She has played her cards well," Barbara Fermor said, maliciously. "It is the mother who has brought about this marriage."

If Mrs. Fairfax showed herself coldly disposed toward Clarissa, there was plenty of warmth on the parts of the Ladies Emily and Louisa, who arrived at the castle about the same time, and at once took a fancy to their sister's protégée.

"Laura has told us so much about you, Miss Lovel," said Lady Louisa, "and we mean to be very fond of you, if you will allow us; and, oh, please my we call you Clarissa? It is such a sweet name!"

Both these ladies had passed that fearful turning-point in woman's life, her thirtieth birthday, and had become only more gushing and enthusiastic with increasing years. They were very much like Lady Laura, had all her easy good-nature and liveliness, and were more or less afraid of the stately Geraldine.

"Do you know, we are quite glad she is going to be married at last," Lady Emily said in a confidential tone to Clarissa; "for she has kept up a kind of frigid atmosphere at home that I really believe has helped to frighten away all our admirers. Men of the present day don't like that kind of thing. It went out of fashion in England with King Charles I., I think, and in France with Louis XIV. You know how badly the royal household behaved coming home from his funeral, laughing and talking and all that. I believe it arose from their relief at thinking that the king of forms and ceremonies was dead. We always have our nicest little parties — kettle-drums, and suppers after the opera, and all that sort of thing—when Geraldine is away; for we can do any thing with papa."

The great day came, and the heavens were propitious. A fine, clear September day, with a cold wind and a warm sun. A day upon which the diaphanous costumes of the bride-maids might be a shade too airy; but not a stern or cruel day, to tinge their young noses with a frosty hue, or blow the crinkles out of their luxuriant hair.

The bride-maids were the Ladies Emily and Louisa Challoner, the two Misses Fermor, Miss Granger, and Clarissa, six in all; a moderation which Lady Laura was inclined to boast of as a kind of Spartan simplicity. They were all to be dressed alike, in white, with bonnets that seemed composed of waxen-looking white heather, and tremulous harebells, and with blue sashes to match the harebells. The dresses were Lady Laura's inspiration. They had come to her almost in her sleep, she declared, when she had well-nigh despaired of realizing her vague desires; and Clarissa's costume was, like the ball-dress, a present from her benefactress.

The nine-o'clock breakfast—a meal that began at nine and rarely ended till eleven—was hurried over in the most uncomfortable and desultory manner on this eventful morning. The principals in the great drama did not appear at all, and Clarissa and Miss Granger were the only two bride-maids who could spare half an hour from the cares of the toilette. The rest breakfasted in the seclusion of their several apartments, with their hair in crimping-pins. Miss Granger was too perfect a being to crinkle her hair, or to waste three hours on dressing, even for a wedding. Lady Laura showed herself among her guests, for a quarter of an hour or so, in a semi-hysterical flutter; so anxious that every thing should go off well, so fearful that something might happen, she knew not what, to throw the machinery of her arrangements out of gear.

"I suppose it's only a natural feeling on such an occasion as this," she said, "but I really do feel as if something were going to happen. Things have gone on so smoothly up to this morning—no disappointments from milliners, no stupid mistakes on the part of those railway people—every thing has gone upon velvet; and, now it is coming to the crisis, I am quite nervous."

Of course every one declared that this was perfectly natural, and recommended his or her favorite specific—a few drops of sal-volatile—a liqueur-glass of dry Curaçoa—red lavender—chlorodyne—and so on; and then Lady Laura laughed and called herself absurd, and hurried away to array herself in a pearl-colored silk, half smothered by puffings of pale pink areophane and Brussels lace flounces; a dress that was all pearly gray and rose and white, like the sky at early morning.

Mr. Armstrong, Mr. Granger, with some military men and country squires, took their breakfast as calmly as if a wedding were part of the daily business of life. Miss Granger exhibited a polite indifference about the great event; Clarissa was pale and nervous, not able to give much attention to Daniel Granger, who had contrived to sit next her that morning, and talked to her a good deal, with an apparent unconsciousness of the severe gaze of his daughter, who sat exactly opposite to him. She had a feeling as if she had been acting a part in a tragedy, the end whereof was near at hand.

She was glad to make her toilette an excuse for leaving Mr. Granger; but once in the sanctuary of her own room, she sat down in an absent manner, and made no attempt to begin dressing. Fosset, the maid, found her there at a quarter past ten o'clock—the ceremony was to take place at eleven—and gave a cry of horror at seeing the toilette uncommenced.

"Good gracious me, miss! what have you been thinking of? Your hair not begun nor nothing! I've been almost torn to bits with one and another—Miss Fermor's maid bothering for long hair-pins and narrow black ribbon; and Jane Roberts—Lady Emily Challoner's maid—who really never has any thing handy, wanting half the things out of my work-box—or I should have been with you ever so long ago. My lady would be in a way if you were late."

"I think my hair will do very well as it is, Fosset," Clarissa said, listlessly.

"Lor', no, miss; not in that dowdy way. It don't half show it off."

Clarissa seated herself before the dressing-table with an air of resignation rather than interest, and the expeditious Fosset began her work. It was done very speedily—that wealth of hair was so easy to dress; there was no artful manipulation of long hair-pins and black ribbon needed to unite borrowed tresses with real ones. The dress was put on, and Clarissa was invited to look at herself in the cheval-glass.

"I do wish you had a bit more color in your cheeks to-day, miss," Fosset said, with rather a vexed air. "Not that I'd recommend you any of their vinegar rouges, or ineffaceable blooms, or any thing of that kind. But I don't think I ever saw you look so pale. One would think you were going to be married, instead of Lady Geraldine. She's as cool as a cucumber this morning, Sarah Thompson told me just now. You can't put her out easily."

The carriages were driving up to the great door by this time. It was about twenty minutes to eleven, and in ten minutes more the procession would be starting. Hale church was within five minutes' drive of the Castle.

Clarissa went fluttering down to the drawing-room, where she supposed people would assemble. There was no one there but Mr. Granger, who was stalking up and down the spacious room, dressed in the newest and stiffest of coats and waistcoats, and looking as if he were going to assist at a private hanging. Miss Lovel felt almost inclined to run away at sight of him. The man seemed to pursue her somehow; and since that night when George Fairfax had offered her his mocking congratulations Mr. Granger's attentions had been particularly repugnant to her.

She could not draw back, however, without positive rudeness, and it was only a question of five minutes; so she went in, and entered upon an interesting little conversation about the weather. It was still fine; there was no appearance of rain; a most auspicious day, really; and so on—from Mr. Granger; to which novel remarks Clarissa assented meekly.

"There are people who attach a good deal of significance to that kind of thing," he said, presently. "For my own part, if I were going to be married to the woman I loved, I should care little how black the sky above us might be. That sounds rather romantic for me, doesn't it? A man of fifty has no right to feel like that."

This he said with a half-bitter laugh. Clarissa was spared the trouble of answering by the entrance of more bride-maids—Lady Louisa Challoner and Miss Granger—with three of the military men, who wore hot-house flowers in their button-holes, and were altogether arrayed like the lilies of the field, but who had rather the air of considering this marriage business a tiresome interruption to the partridge-shooting.

"I suppose we are going to start directly," cried Lady Louisa, who was a fluttering creature of three-and-thirty, always eager to flit from one scene to another. "If we don't, I really think we shall be late; and there is some dreadful law, isn't there, to prevent people being married after eleven o'clock?"

"After twelve," Mr. Granger answered, in his matter-of-fact way. "Lady Geraldine has ample margin for delay."

"But why not after twelve?" asked Lady Louisa, with a childish air: "why not in the afternoon or evening, if one liked? What can be the use of such a ridiculous law? One might as well live in Russia."

She fluttered to one of the windows and looked out.

"There are all the carriages. How well the men look! Laura must have spent a fortune in white ribbon and gloves for them. And the horses, dear things!"—a woman of Lady Louisa's stamp is generally enthusiastic about horses, it is such a safe thing—"they look as if they knew it was a wedding. Oh, good gracious!"

"What is the matter, Lady Louisa?"

"A man from the railway, with a telegram—yes, I am sure it's a telegram! Do you know, I have such a horror of telegrams! I always fancy they mean illness—or death—or something dreadful. Very absurd of me, isn't it? And I dare say this is only a message about some delayed parcel, or some one who was to be here and can't come, or something of that kind."

The room was full of idle people by this time. Every one went to the open window and stared down at the man who had brought the telegram. He had given his message, and was standing on the broad flight of steps before the Castle door, waiting for the return of the official who had taken it. Whether the electric wires had brought the tidings of some great calamity or a milliner's apology for a delayed bonnet it was impossible to guess. The messenger stood there, stolid and impenetrable, and there was nothing to be divined from his aspect.

But presently, while a vague anxiety possessed almost every one present, there came from the staircase without a sudden cry of woe—a woman's shriek, long and shrill—a cry as ominous as the banshee's wail itself. There was a rush to the door, and the women crowded out in a distracted way. Lady Laura was fainting in her husband's arms, and George Fairfax was standing near her reading a telegram.

People had not long to wait for the evil news. Lord Calderwood had been seized with a paralytic stroke—his third attack—at ten o'clock the previous night, and had expired at half past eight that morning. There could be no wedding that day—nor for many days and weeks to come.

"Oh, Geraldine, my poor Geraldine, let me go to her!" cried Lady Laura, disengaging herself from her husband's arms, and rushing up stairs. Mr. Armstrong hurried after her.

"Laura, my sweet girl, don't agitate yourself; consider yourself," he cried, and followed, with Lady Louisa sobbing and wailing behind him. Geraldine had not left her room yet. The ill news was to find her on the threshold, calm and lovely in the splendor of her bridal dress.

CHAPTER XVII.

"'TIS DEEPEST WINTER IN LORD TIMON'S PURSE."

BEFORE nightfall—before the evening which was to have been enlivened by a dinner-party and a carpet-dance, and while bride and bridegroom should have been speeding southward to that noble Kentish mansion which his uncle had lent George Fairfax—before the rooks flew homeward across the woods beyond Hale—there had been a general flight from the Castle. People were anxious to leave the mourners alone with their grief, and even the most intimate felt more or less in the way, though Mr. Armstrong entreated that there might be no hurry, no inconvenience for any one.

"Poor Laura won't be fit to be seen for a day or two," he said, "and, of course, I shall have to go up to town for the funeral; but that need make no difference. Hale is large enough for every one, and it will be a comfort to her by-and-by to find her friends round her."

Through all that dreary day Lady Laura wandered about her morning-room, alternately sobbing and talking of her father to those chosen friends with whom she held little interviews. Her sisters Louisa and Emily were with her for the greater part of the time, echoing her lamentations like a feeble chorus. Geraldine kept her room, and would see no one—not even him who was to have been her bridegroom, and who might have supposed that he had the chiefest right to console her in this sudden affliction.

Clarissa spent more than an hour with Lady Laura, listening with a tender interest to her praises of the departed. It seemed as if no elderly nobleman—more or less impecunious for the last twenty years of his life—had ever supported such a load of virtues as Lord Calderwood had carried with him to the grave. To praise him inordinately was the only consolation his three daughters could find in the first fervor of their grief. Time was when they had been apt to confess to one another that papa was occasionally rather "trying," a vague expression which scarcely involved a lapse of filial duty on the part of the grumbler. But to hear them to-day one would have supposed that they had never been tried; that life with Lord Calderwood in a small house in Chapel Street, Mayfair, had been altogether a halcyon existence.

Clarissa listened reverently, believing implicitly in the merits of the newly lost, and did her best to console her kind friend during the hour Mr. Armstrong allowed her to spend with Lady Laura. At the end of that time he came and solemnly fetched her away, after a pathetic farewell.

"You must come to me again, Clary, and very, very soon," said my lady, embracing her. "I only wish Fred would let you stay with me now. You would be a great comfort."

"My dearest Lady Laura, it is better not. You have your sisters."

"Yes, they are very good; but I wanted you to stay, Clary. I had such plans for you. Oh, by-the-bye, the Grangers will be going back to-day, I suppose. Why should they not take you with them in their great traveling carriage?—Frederick, will you arrange for the Grangers to take Clarissa home?" cried Lady Laura to her husband, who was hovering near the door. In the midst of her grief my lady brightened a little with the idea of managing something, even so small a matter as this.

"Of course, my dear," replied the affectionate Fred. "Granger shall take Miss Lovel home. And now I must positively hurry her away; all this talk and excitement is so bad for you."

"I must see the Fermors before they go. You'll let me see the Fermors, Fred?"

"Well, well, I'll bring them just to say good-by—that's all.—Come along, Miss Lovel."

Clarissa followed him along the corridors.

"Oh, if you please, Mr. Armstrong," she said, "I did not like to worry Lady Laura, but I would so much rather go home alone in a fly."

"Nonsense! the Grangers can take you. You could have Laura's brougham, of course; but if she wants you to go with the Grangers, you must go. Her word is law, and she's sure to ask me about it by-and-by. She's a wonderful woman; thinks of every thing."

They met Mr. and Miss Granger presently, dressed for the journey.

"Oh, if you please, Granger, I want you to take Miss Lovel home in your carriage. You've plenty of room, I know."

Sophia looked as if she would have liked to say that there was no room, but her father's face quite flushed with pleasure.

"I shall be only too happy," he said, "if Miss Lovel will trust herself to our care."

"And perhaps you'll explain to her father what has happened, and how sorry we are to lose her, and so on."

"Certainly, my dear Armstrong. I shall make a point of seeing Mr. Lovel in order to do so."

So Clarissa had a seat in Mr. Granger's luxurious carriage, the proprietor whereof sat opposite to her, admiring the pale patrician face, and wondering a little what that charm was which made it seem to him more beautiful than any other countenance he had ever looked upon. They did not talk much, Mr. Granger only making a few stereotyped remarks about the uncertainties of this life, or occasionally pointing out some feature of the landscape to Clarissa. The horses went at a splendid pace. Their owner would have preferred a slower transit.

"Remember, Miss Lovel," he said, as they approached the village of Arden, "you have promised to come and see us."

"You are very good; but I go out so little; and papa is always averse to my visiting."

"But he can't be that any more after allowing you to stay at the Castle, or he will offend commoner folks, like Sophy and me, by his exclusiveness. Besides, he told me he wished Sophy and you to be good friends. I am sure he will let you come to us. When shall it be? Shall we say to-morrow, before luncheon—at twelve or one, say? I will show you what I've done for the house in the morning, and Sophy can take you over her schools and cottages in the afternoon."

Sophia Granger made no attempt to second this proposition; but her father was so eager and decisive that it seemed quite impossible for Clarissa to say no.

"If papa will let me come," she said, doubtfully.

"Oh, I am quite sure he will not refuse after what he was good enough to say to me," replied Mr. Granger; "and if he does not feel equal to going about with us in the morning, I hope we shall be able to persuade him to come to dinner."

They were at the little rustic gate before Mill Cottage by this time. How small the place looked after Hale Castle! but not without a prettiness of its own. The Virginia creeper was reddening on the wall; the casement windows open to the air and sunshine. Ponto ran out directly the gate was opened—first to bark at the carriage, and then to leap joyously about Clarissa, overpowering her with a fond canine welcome.

"You will come in with us, Sophia?" asked her father, when he had alighted and handed Clarissa out of the carriage.

"I think not, papa. You can't want me; and this dreadful morning has given me a wretched headache."

"I thought there was something amiss. It would be more respectful to Mr. Lovel for you to come in. I dare say he'll excuse you, however, when he hears you are ill."

Clarissa held out her hand, which Miss Granger took with an almost obvious reluctance; and the two young ladies said "Good-by" to each other without a word from Sophia about the engagement for the next day.

They found Mr. Lovel in his favorite sitting-room; not dreaming over a Greek play or a volume of Bentley, as it was his custom to do, but seriously engaged with a number of open letters and papers scattered on the writing-table before him—papers that looked alarmingly like tradesmen's bills. He was taken by surprise on the entrance of Clarissa and her companion, and swept the papers into an open drawer with rather a nervous hand.

"My dear Clarissa, this is quite unexpected!—How do you do, Mr. Granger? How very good of you to bring my little girl over to see me! Will you take that chair by the window? I was deep in a file of accounts when you came in. A man must examine his affairs sometimes, however small his household may be. Well, Clary, what news of our kind friends at the Castle? Why, bless my soul, this is the wedding-day, isn't it? I had quite forgotten the date. Has any thing happened?"

"Yes, papa; there has been a great misfortune, and the wedding is put off."

Between them Mr. Granger and Clarissa explained the state of affairs at the Castle. Mr. Lovel seemed really shocked by the intelligence of the Earl's death.

"Poor Calderwood! He and I were great friends thirty years ago. I suppose it's nearly twenty since I last saw him. He was one of the handsomest men I ever knew—Lady Geraldine takes after him—and when he was in the diplomatic service had really a very brilliant career before him; but he missed it somehow. Had always rather a frivolous mind, I fancy, and a want of perseverance. Poor Calderwood! And so he is gone! How old could he have been? Not much over sixty, I believe. I'll look into Debrett presently."

As soon as he could decently do so after this Mr. Granger urged his invitation for the next day.

"Oh, certainly, by all means. Clary shall come to you as early as you like. It will be a great relief for her from the dullness of this place. And—well—yes, if you insist upon it, I'll join you at dinner. But you see what a perfect recluse I am. There will be no one else, I suppose?"

"You have only to say that you wish it, and there shall be no one else," Mr. Granger answered, courteously.

Never had he been so anxious to propitiate any one. People had courted him more or less all his life; and here he was almost suing for the acquaintance of this broken-down spendthrift—a man whom he had secretly despised until now.

On this assurance Mr. Lovel consented to dine with his neighbor for the first time; and Mr. Granger, having no excuse for farther lingering, took his departure, remembering all at once that he had such a thing as a daughter waiting for him in the carriage outside.

He went, and Clarissa took up the thread of her old life just where she had dropped it. Her father was by no means so gracious or agreeable to-day as he had been during his brief visit to Hale Castle. He took out his tradesmen's letters and bills when Mr. Granger was gone, and went on with his examination of them, groaning aloud now and then, or sometimes stopping to rest his head on his hands, with a dreary, long-drawn sigh. Clarissa would have been very glad to offer her sympathy, to utter some word of comfort, but there was something in her father's aspect which forbade any injudicious approach. She sat by the open window with a book in her hand, but not reading, waiting patiently in the hope that he would share his troubles with her by-and-by.

He went on with his work for about an hour, and then tied the papers in a bundle with a hasty, impatient air.

"Arithmetic is no use in such a case as mine," he said; "no man can make fifty pounds pay a hundred. I suppose it must end in the bankruptcy court. It will be only our last humiliation—the culminating disgrace."

"The bankruptcy court! Oh, papa!" cried Clarissa, piteously.

She had a very vague idea as to what bankruptcy meant, but felt that it was something unutterably shameful—the next thing to a criminal offense.

"Better men than I have gone through it," Mr. Lovel went on, with a sigh, and without the faintest notice of his daughter's dismay; "but I couldn't stand Arden and Holborough after that degradation. I must go abroad, to some dull old town in the south of France, where I could have my books and decent wine, and where, as regards every thing else, I should be in a living grave."

"But they would never make you bankrupt, surely, papa!" Clarissa exclaimed, in the same piteous tone.

"They would never make me bankrupt!" echoed her father, fretfully. "What do you mean by they? You talk like a baby, Clarissa. Do you suppose that tradesmen and bankers and bill-discounters would have more mercy upon me than upon other people? They may give me more time than they would give another man, perhaps, because they know I have some pride of race, and would coin my heart's blood rather than adopt expedients that other men make light of; but when they know there is no more to be got out of me they will do their worst. It is only a question of time."

"Are you very much in debt, papa?" Clarissa asked, timidly, anticipating a rebuff.

"No; that is the most confounded part of the business. My liabilities only amount to a few pitiful hundreds. When I sold Arden—and I did not do that till I was obliged, you may believe—the bulk of the purchase-money went to the mortgagees. With the residue—a paltry sum—I bought myself an annuity: a transaction which I was able to conclude upon better terms than most men of my age, on account of my precarious health, and to which I was most strongly urged by my legal advisers. On this I have existed, or tried to exist, ever since; but the income has not been sufficient even for the maintenance of this narrow household. If I lived in a garret, I must live like a gentleman, and should be always at the mercy of my servants. These are honest enough, I dare say, but I have no power of checking my expenditure. And then I had your schooling to pay for—no small amount, I assure you."

"THERE WAS A RUSH TO THE DOOR."

"Thank Heaven that is over, papa. And now, if you would only let me go out as a governess, I might be some help to you instead of a burden."

"There's time enough to think of that. You are not much of a burden to me at present. I don't suppose you add many pounds a year to the expenses of this house. And if I have to face the inevitable, and see my name in the Gazette, we must begin life again upon a smaller scale, and in a cheaper place—some out-of-the-way corner of France or Belgium. The governess notion will keep till I am dead. You can always be of some use to me as a companion, if you choose."

This was quite a concession. Clarissa came over to her father's chair, and laid her hand caressingly upon his shoulder.

"My dear father," she said, in a low, sweet voice, "you make me almost happy in spite of our troubles. I wish for nothing better than to stay with you always. And by-and-by, if we have to live abroad, where you need not be so particular about our name, I may be able to help you a little—by means of art or music—without leaving home. I think I could be happy any where with you, papa, if you would only love me a little."

That appeal touched a heart not easily moved. Marmaduke Lovel put his hand—such a slender, feminine hand—into his daughter's with an affectionate pressure.

"Poor child!" he said, sadly. "It would be hard if I couldn't love you a little. But you were born under an evil star, Clarissa, and hitherto perhaps I have tried to shut my heart against you. I won't do that any more. Whatever affection is in me to give shall be yours. God knows I have no reason to withhold it, nor any other creature on this earth on whom to bestow it. God knows it is a new thing for me to have my love sued for."

There was a melancholy in his tone which touched his daughter deeply. He seemed to have struck the key-note of his life in those few words: a disappointed, unsuccessful life; a youth in which there had been some hidden cause for the ungenial temper of his middle age.

It was nearly six o'clock by this time, and Clarissa strolled into the garden with her father while the table was being laid for dinner. There were faint glimpses of red and yellow here and there among the woods around Arden Court, but it still seemed summer-time. The late roses were in full bloom in Mr. Lovel's fertile garden, the rosy apples were brightening in the orchard, the plums purpling on a crumbling old red-brick wall that bounded the narrow patch of kitchen-garden. Yes, even after Hale Castle, the place seemed pretty; and a pang went through Clarissa's heart as she thought that this, too, they might have to leave; even this humble home was not secure to them.

Father and daughter dined together very pleasantly. Clarissa had been made quite happy by her father's unwonted tenderness, and Mr. Lovel was in tolerable spirits in spite of that dreary afternoon's labor, that hopeless task of trying to find out some elastic quality in pounds, shillings, and pence.

SNAKES IN IRELAND.

SOMEBODY once wrote a book upon popular errors. We do not know whether it passed through many editions—in fact, we doubt it; for some popular errors which have held ground from time immemorial seem as firmly set as ever. There are some pleasing delusions which people love to cling to, and the correction of them, like the proverbial good advice of friends, is generally thrown away. With reference to the well-known tradition among the Irish peasants, that serpents can not exist in Ireland, a correspondent informs us of the unfortunate fact that not only do serpents and frogs manage to exist in Ireland, but, worse still, that they absolutely swarm, the latter especially, in the country districts—notably in the County Dublin and Queen's County. It is commonly supposed that if any adventurous spirit took the trouble to introduce a few of the reptiles, he would find it labor lost.

But as the snakes are there, and old authorities maintain that Ireland was free from them until comparatively recent times, the fact remains that somebody must have imported them. One account gives it out that they were first propagated from spawn introduced as an experiment in 1696 by a Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin; another, that a gentleman imported a number of vipers from England into Wexford about the year 1797, but that they died immediately after. In the summer of 1831, however, a gentleman, by way of experiment, brought a few pairs of the common snake from Scotland, and placed them in a plantation at Milecross, near Newtownards; and the readiness with which they multiplied was more alarming than pleasant. A late marquis, well known in his day for his strange freaks, is said to have tried the same experiment on his own estates, but with no success. May not, after all, the idea of St.

Patrick's prohibition of snakes in the Green Isle be traced to the association of the serpent with the Evil One, and to the success which his Reverence had in reforming the vices of his barbarian disciples?

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

XENIA.—Rimmel's Toilette Vinegar is an admirable cosmetic for summer use. It produces a refreshing effect when thrown into a bath, and is an excellent remedy for headache—and some say for mosquito bites; though we must say that the specimens of these worthy insects that we have known have contrived to leave a sting in their wounds that naught but time could thoroughly eradicate.

LADY'S MAID.—Such a treasure as you must be invaluable in a household. Your only failing seems to be a limited acquaintance with Lindley Murray, which, as Truthful James, Mrs. Brown, and other modern writers prove, is no bar to success in literature. As for your young lady, with her $200 worth of torturing boots and shoes, we can only advise her to sell them at auction, and try two inches more of leather as a remedy for swollen feet. Complaisant boot-makers usually make their wares to suit their customers; and much-abused Dame Fashion has to bear the blame of silly women's caprices.

MARY.—You had better consult a bird-fancier about cutting your canary's nails. His tottering may arise from weakness. Give him stale bread and milk and hard-boiled egg, and if he is constipated, mix a drop of sweet-oil with his food. It may be well to grease the bottom of his feet with sweet-oil, which you can easily do by putting it on his perches, or in your hand if he is tame enough to perch on your finger.

FLORA.—Of course the guest makes the first call within a week after a party.

BUNNY.—If you even suspect that you are de trop in the presence of your friend and her cavalier, you should absent yourself as often as you can on some pretext that is easily found.—Your letters were addressed rightly; if you received no answer, it was probably because Mr. Bonner, who must be a busy man, had none to give.

J. H. B.—In binding the Weekly the Supplements and maps should follow the numbers to which they belong.

U. L.—There are various theories in vogue concerning the origin of the alphabet. Historians generally ascribe it to the Phœnicians or Chaldeans. Some claim for it a greater antiquity, and claim that it was invented by Noah or his sons.

MRS. W. W. T.—Explicit instructions in guipure and netting have been given from time to time in our columns.

NELLIE.—It is only necessary to address your letter to The Aldine, New York city.

C. H.—We think it would be perfectly proper for a young lady to go to a ball or party "without the consent, permission, or even knowledge of her betrothed, who lives in another city," supposing, as we do, that betrothal does not confer the right of ownership, and also that if they love each other well enough to marry, neither will desire to do any thing to which the other has well-founded objections.

H. A. T.—Not having the gift of second-sight, we do not venture to decide in advance whether you will succeed or fail as a story-writer. But with your versatile talents, which fit you to be cook or kitchen-maid at a pinch, you have the consolation of knowing that there is something to fall back upon if your MSS. are returned to you by unappreciative editors.

JULIA.—Make a Swiss muslin polonaise, or else a long Swiss upper skirt and postilion, trimmed with a pleated ruffle of the same, edged, if you choose, with Valenciennes. This will make your light silk stylish for small parties. You might also put pleated Swiss flounces on the silk skirt.

MAGGIE.—Taffeta silk like your sample will not make a handsome silk suit, but is precisely the fabric for using under grenadine. Grenadine basques are lined throughout with silk—skirt, sleeves, and all. Ruffles of grenadine are bias, and hemmed on the outside, with a fold in the hem. A pleated ruffle alternating with a gathered ruffle is effective. Half-flowing sleeves like the pattern sent you do not require a coat sleeve beneath, but open under-sleeves of pleated muslin ruffles edged with Valenciennes. You must have a cape for your linen overall. Try again to match the linen.

ADDIE W.—Put bias bands on your under-skirt that you will use as an over-skirt also. Many imported suits retain the short upper skirt.

MRS. L. C.—A polonaise and single skirt, trimmed with bias bands of black silk stitched on with white, is the best design for your suit of black and white plaid.

H. L.—Make your summer silk by the pattern of Postilion-Basque Walking Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., and use the tiniest piping fold of blue silk to edge the bands and ruffles.—Clytie was the daughter of Oceanus, and was changed into the plant heliotrope.

MRS. E. M.—Trim your dark serge with bias bands of black silk and fringe.

SYN SAXON.—Make ruffles a finger deep, bias, and alternately pleated and gathered, for trimming your light alpaca.

MRS. DR. C.—Trim the white organdy with pleatings of the same, and the grass-cloth with bias bands and ruffles.

JENNIE G.—Make dress with basque, long over skirt, and short under-skirt, trimmed with darker brown silk bands and fringe. Put two narrow flounces, with a wider one above, on the lower skirt.

H. R. K.—About nine yards of linen three-fourths of a yard wide are required for a linen overall. Simply hem it or stitch on a bias band of linen.

E. S.—Grenadine dresses are described at length in Bazar No. 20, Vol. IV. Basques are more stylish than sacques. Plain bias bands and a ruffle, or a little lace or fringe, will trim a black silk sacque prettily.

MRS. J. M. J.—Your sample is ottoman velours.

ADMIRER OF THE BAZAR.—The Postilion-Basque Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., is very pretty for grenadine. It is not necessary to head all the ruffles. Hem the lower edge, let them overlap, and put a bias band of the same to head the group. Make a baby's Marseilles cloak with two large capes trimmed with a muslin ruffle slightly embroidered.

MRS. S. T.—Your pongee poplin is a good color and fabric. Make it by pattern of Short-Sacque Walking Suit, and trim with bias bands of brown silk and ruffles. Brown straw gypsy, with darker brown gros grain ribbon and tea-roses. Black velvet is not pretty on alpaca—the materials do not seem appropriate. Striped shawls are worn in the simplest manner—merely folded in half like a scarf, and drawn tightly around the shoulders.

H.—A light quality of Irish linen is used for suits.

MRS. J. W.—For French waists read reply in last number to "Miss Inquirer." Kilt pleats are side pleats—that is, all turned one way and ironed flatly. Black silk basques continue in fashion, also white over dresses with colored skirts.

MARY.—We do not give addresses in this column.

LEONORA B.—As you must consider expense, we advise a handsome traveling dress that can be used for the ceremony also. Lyons poplin of exquisite new colors is sold at Stewart's for $1 25 a yard. Get a tea-color, or a cuir or gray; make with a long polonaise, and trim with alternate ruffles of silk and poplin. The undressed silks are also handsome for the same purpose.

M. M.—A sleeveless basque of black silk is more stylish than a fichu of silk would be. This, with an over-skirt, would look well with any dress.

M. C.—It is admissible to wear a white polonaise with colored skirts. Corsages are cut very high at the throat for street suits, very low for the house.

JENNIE S.—A basque and over-skirt like your dotted Swiss sample would look well over colored and black dresses, but do not trim your grenadine with it; let it be entirely black. Japanese poplin is mixed silk and linen.

OLD SUBSCRIBER.—The pattern of shoulder braces for a girl of fourteen in Bazar No. 39, Vol. III., will probably be suitable for a lady also.

W. E. B.—Have your parlor walls tinted a pale French gray or delicate green, with gilt cornice around the ceiling. A rose-tinted mauve will be handsome with your crimson-draped room. In the hall have oak panels with dark walnut mouldings. There is no charge for advice in this column.

A. E. AND D.—Gray or brown English mohair, made by the pattern of Traveling Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 21, Vol. IV., trimmed with bias silk and fringe on cape and polonaise, and ruffles on the skirt, is handsome for traveling in May and June. The grenadine you describe would be very pretty. A light silk with Swiss ruffles and over dress is pretty for concerts. The best English mohairs are 75 cents for single width goods, $1 25 for double fold.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

DIAMOND D MOHAIR.

It is an old maxim that a good article is always the cheapest in the end, and to nothing does this more fully apply than alpaca. Unfortunately, it is almost impossible for the consumer to know a good make from a bad one till worn, and the only safe course to pursue is to purchase a make that is known and guaranteed to wear well. The Diamond Mohair is one of the honest old original makes that first rendered the fabric popular for their brilliancy, color, and lasting qualities, and are as well made now as they were twenty years ago.

Retailers say they are difficult to introduce at first, ladies preferring heavier and more leathery goods. But these goods are warranted double warp, and are as heavy as an alpaca can honestly be made. The leathery goods are produced by elastic dressing and an undue quantity of cotton, and, of course, they soon get fuzzy, crease and wrinkle easily, and lose their color, and the dress is done.

The Diamond Mohairs, made only from the best alpaca yarn, are naturally brilliant, and will not lose their brilliancy; springy, and will not crease; and, having no dressing in them, are not injured by water.

Observe the brand, and do not be persuaded to take any other till you have tried these goods once, and you will find you have a handsome dress that will remain handsome.

Now to be had from nearly all first-class retailers.

PURIFY THE BLOOD AND BEAUTIFY THE COMPLEXION BY USING
HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and
HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

Prescriptions accurately compounded. French, German, and Spanish spoken. Stores open all night.

P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

MEDICAL MADNESS.

Let us hope that the insane practice of administering poisonous evacuants in cases of indigestion, biliousness, constipation, and female debility, is almost out of date. When the Tonic-Cathartic produced by Nature herself in the most valuable Sanitary Spring in the world is reproduced by science, in the form of it is indeed midsummer madness to rack, relax, and irritate the diseased or enfeebled system with drastic purgatives. This refreshing and delicious counterpart of a remedy prepared by the creative hand of the Omnipotent Physician himself is every where superseding the nauseous and sickening compounds heretofore used as laxatives.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT,

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

No more delightful travels are printed in the English language than appear perpetually in Harper's Magazine. They are read with equal interest and satisfaction by boys of every grade from eighteen to eighty. Its scientific papers, while sufficiently profound to demand the attention of the learned, are yet admirably adapted to the popular understanding, and designed as much to diffuse correct information concerning current scientific discovery as it could be if it was the organ of the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There are few intelligent American families in which Harper's Magazine would not be an appreciated and highly welcome guest. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

Harper's Bazar at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

FACETIÆ.

A COUNTRY preacher holding forth one very sultry day in a small hall was much annoyed by those who kept dropping in after the service had commenced, invariably closing the door after them. He bore the vexation with Job-like patience, but at length, being fairly exhausted by the extreme oppressiveness of the heat, he vociferated to an offender, "Friend, for goodness sake let that door be open. I believe if I was preaching in a bottle you would put the cork in!"

EDUCATIONAL.—"Do you believe in the rod as an instrument of discipline?" asked a mother of a schoolteacher in Nevada, to whom she had taken her unruly son. "No, madam." "Oh, I'm so glad! What do you substitute for it?" "The revolver, madam." (Exeunt mother and unruly son.)

A young doctor, on being asked to contribute toward inclosing and ornamenting the village cemetery, very coolly remarked that if he filled it he thought he should do his part.

Can a man eating dates be said to consume time?

The most celebrated wits and bon vivants of the day graced the dinner-table of the late Dr. Kitchener, and, inter alia, the late George Colman, who was an especial favorite. His interpolation of a little monosyllable in a written admonition which the doctor caused to be placed on the mantel-piece of the dining-parlor will never be forgotten, and was the origin of such a drinking bout as was seldom permitted under his roof. The caution ran thus: "Come at seven, go at eleven." Colman briefly altered the sense of it; for upon the doctor's attention being directed to the card he read, to his astonishment: "Come at seven, go it at eleven," which the guests did, and the claret was punished accordingly.

NOT TO BE BEATEN.

"My Mamma's got the Shiningest hair in all Brooklyn."
"My Mamma's got the Curlingest hair in all New York."
"My Mamma's got the Longest hair in all America."
"My Mamma's got the Thickest hair in all the whole World."
"My Mamma can Sit on her hair."
"My Mamma can take hers Off!"

HOW TO MANAGE HIM.

"How shall you manage your husband?"
I will tell you, my dear, if I can.
He is really a wonderful creature,
That troublesome animal—man.
Yes, really a wonderful creature,
Inconsistent and queer;
But you'll soon know the secret by learning
The modus operandi, my dear.

If he stays out too late in the evening,
Partaking of supper and wine,
Don't prove him a base fabricator,
When he comes, by asking the time.
For he surely will tell you the town clock
But a moment before rang out one—
When it struck he had "counted it over
Just three times before it had done."

And then if his hat, in the morning,
Is smaller by far than his head,
Don't hint by merest allusion
That his lordship went tipsy to bed,
But rather regard the occurrence
A phenomenon puzzling, queer,
With a strange look of mystification
In your eyes, if he's watching, my dear.

And don't fail to sew on his buttons,
And mend all his clothing with care;
Don't tease him for money for shopping;
Don't frown when he acts like a bear;
Don't tell him too often, my deary,
That your head is aching with pain,
Lest he whispers, way down in his bosom,
"Oh, I wish I was single again!"

Don't tell him that Mary, the house-maid,
And Ann, the obstreperous cook,
Refuse to receive your suggestions
With even so much as a look;
Don't tell how very annoying
You so often found it to be
To be told to "get out of the kitchen,
And don't come a-botherin' of me!"

But always seem cheerful and happy,
And always look pleasant and gay;
Than a frown there is nothing more potent
In driving one's husband away.
And thus you must ever keep striving;
You'll find it an excellent plan;
But whatever you do, dear, remember
That your husband is only a man.

A gentleman in Essex called on a shoe-dealer a few days since, and purchased a pair of shoes for his boy. The shoe-dealer took the shoes for the purpose of rasping off the pegs inside, when the purchaser objected. "Because," said he, "if the pegs are cut off the boy runs all over town, and the shoes will not last him three weeks."

"HA! HA! THE WOOIN' O'T!"—Old Song.

YOUNG MISTRESS (gravely; she had seen an affectionate parting at the garden gate). "I see you've got a Young Man, Jane!"
JANE (apologetically). "Only walked out with him Once, Mum!"
MISTRESS. "Oh, but I thought I Saw—didn't you—didn't he—take a Kiss, Jane?"
JANE. "Oh, Mum, only as a Friend, Mum!"

"I wish I was a ghost; blamed if I don't," said a sweep, as he was soliloquizing in the cold, the other morning; "they goes wherever they please, toll free; they don't owe nobody nothin', and that's a comfort. Whoever heard tell of a man who had a bill against a ghost? Nobody. They never buy clothes and wittles, nor has to stand shivering in the cold till Sally lets 'em in."

Johnny was telling his ma how he was going to dress and show off when he was a man. His ma asked, "Johnny, what do you expect to do for a living when you get to be a man?" "Well, I'll get married, and lodge with my wife's pa."

At the sitting of a County Court the other day a plaintiff was told he was "nonsuited." At this he became nonplused; and the meaning being explained to him, he at last appeared to comprehend it, and thus expressed his translation of the term: "Oh! no go, you mean."

If a man gets up when the day breaks, can he be said to have the whole day before him?

A startling event recently took place in a church where the clergyman adopts rather a strange style of admonition. Speaking of the devil going about like a roaring lion, he said Satan was every where in the world—in the camp, in the court, in the theatre, in the private houses; and rising with his subject, he said, "He is in this church at this very moment;" upon which a sharp cry was raised by a little boy in a pew belonging to one of the leading families in the congregation. "Aunty, aunty," he shouted, "take me out, take me out! I want to get away." And aunty had to take him out, the boy rushing in terror from the church, not having the heart to stay any longer under the same roof with a personage of whom he had formed so terrible an idea.

SOME MUSICAL DEFINITIONS.

A theological student sent the following as his contribution to the festival of a church choir:

What is a slur?—Almost any remark that one singer makes about another.

What is a rest?—Going out of the choir for refreshments during the sermon time.

What is singing with an understanding?—Marking time on the floor with your foot.

What is a symphony?—Flirting with the soprano singer behind the organ.

What is a staccato movement?—Leaving the choir in a huff when one is dissatisfied with the organist.

What is a swell?—A professor of music who pretends to know all about the science while he can not conceal his ignorance.

What is a turn?—When one singer is discharged to make room for another.

How do you produce a discord?—By praising one lady's singing at the expense of a rival, who overhears you.

What is a pause?—When the organ-boy gets asleep when the choir is ready to sing.

What is a flat?—A singer who supposes himself or herself indispensable to the success of the choir.

NOT PARTICULAR.

One of our residents found something offensive in his last dozen eggs, and took the dealer to task.

"What is the matter with them?" asked that individual.

"They ain't good," was the reply.

"Well, that isn't to be wondered at," was the apologetic rejoinder. "Hens are so drove now they ain't expected to be as particular as usual!"

"I'll give you the slip," as the gardener said when he promised a friend a cutting.

A WOFUL TALE.

The man who was over head and ears in love, but who has had his nose put out of joint, is afraid to face the world because he thinks the eyes of Europe are upon him, and that society will browbeat him and cast it in his teeth. As the organ of a large and respectable portion of the body politic, we assure him that his misfortune is not in every body's mouth, and advise him to put a bold face on the matter—to be, in fact, a little cheeky—and he will soon find himself able to hold up his head again with the best of us with unblushing effrontery. If he has an eye to the future he must see that it would be a great oversight to take a short-sighted view of things, and retire from the public gaze.

The rising generation "age" rapidly. A mature specimen, eight years old, was hunting around the police station for a stray father the other night. "You see," he remarked, with filial exultation, "the guv'ner's a little wild yet, but he'll grow out of it!"

SYMPATHY.

AN angel who had never felt,
But often, pitying, heard of grief,
A weeping mortal once beheld,
And longed to give to him relief.
"Poor child of earth!" he gently said,
"The bliss I know I fain would share;
Come, leave this narrow, pilgrim path,
And soar with me through purer air;
We'll stay our flight where lilies bloom,
Unfading, by celestial springs."
"Oh, leave me! hence!" the mortal cried;
"Why mock me with my want of wings?"

Love's willing ministers, the pain
We seek to cure we first must feel;
And Sorrow's self must teach us how
The wounds that Sorrow gives to heal.

POLITENESS AT HOME.

THERE are many who seem to think that good manners are only for company, to be put on, like the best suit of clothes, when going out, and laid aside when at home. Newness is more or less essential to the elegance of a fine coat or a silk gown, and the less they are worn the more they may attract. Politeness, however, is adherent to the person, and daily wear is essential to its perfection. Its grace and ease, like the sleekness and flexibility of the skin, come from constant exercise. Stiffness and roughness are the sure results of inactivity.

Politeness can not be assumed at will. To be polite abroad we must be polite at home. And are not good manners, which are universally acknowledged to be essential to the pleasure and refinement of society, equally important to the grace and comfort of home?

Affection can do wonders, but with all its power it often fails to prevent those collisions of opposing opinions, tempers, and interests which result from the divergent dispositions of the members of most households. Contradictory as it may seem, it is a fact that the most affectionate families are often the most discordant. The warmth of temperament which engenders mutual intensity of love not seldom breaks forth into passionate ebullitions of a different kind. It must be acknowledged, however, that ardent as may be the original family affection, it is in great danger of being smothered by these not infrequent bursts of temper.

We do not wish to depreciate the influence of the various religious and moral checks, so persistently applied by pious and worthy people in their attempts to control domestic discord, but we would commend to them family politeness as a humble but serviceable aid.

A certain ceremoniousness is found to be essential to prevent familiarity of intercourse among men of the world from degenerating into contempt. The same, we think, would be no less useful in the daily and intimate contact of the members of the same family.

There is no reason that we know of that those formalities and ceremonies which are found so effective in making the polite men and women of society agreeable should not be adopted in the family with a like result. There is unquestionably a courtesy of the heart of more value than the outward forms, but these are essential as reminders of the obligations of that. The mere semblance of politeness, even without its reality, serves at least to establish a formal decorum which conduces to the comfort and grace of mutual intercourse, whether in society or the family, by checking every open demonstration of rudeness. The ill-tempered and malevolent are often prevented from disturbing the common harmony and kindliness of feeling by the restraints of ceremony; and the effect, we believe, would be no less good in the family than it has proved to be in society.

We would urge upon all a strict regard, at home as well as abroad, to the various forms and ceremonies by which polite people regulate their relations toward each other. Why should a gentleman, for example, who scorns to remain covered in the company of a stranger, whom he respects merely because she is a lady, keep on his hat in the presence of his wife, whom he knows and loves? Why should a woman who makes the most courteous acknowledgment of the slightest favor from one she hardly knows refuse to say a polite word in return for the kindness of her constant companion?

We would have wives and husbands in their ordinary intercourse as polite toward each other as are other gentlemen and ladies. It is, however, so far from being so in most cases that one of the surest indications of the marriage of a couple is their mutual disregard of the forms and ceremonies of politeness. There is a story told of a pair who had concealed their union successfully until the lady, having accidentally dropped her handkerchief, and the gentleman neglecting to pick it up, the company at once concluded, and justly, that they were married.

We believe that a more enduring affection between husband and wife, a greater reverence on the part of children to their parents, and forbearance toward each other, would be the result of more politeness at home.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Summer Friends.

MY DEAR PAUL,—I hope that you have been able to take a holiday in this early summer weather, and that you have had some delightful Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle to visit in the country, among the roses and the superbly blossoming shrubs. For I have been to pass a day or two with my Mrs. Margery, and I shall remember it as if it had been an entire summer. If you young fellows read Mrs. Browning's poetry, you will remember "Lady Geraldine's Courtship," and its musical descriptions of life at a fine country place in England. How hard it is to think that a generation has passed since that poem was written, and that Bertram and Lady Geraldine are already grandparents! They are, and they are not. For at Mrs. Margery's there was a handsome, shy youth, who used sometimes to read to us in the mornings as we sat in the shadow of the tulip-trees upon the lawn, the ladies working in pretty ways, the gentlemen stretched idly out—all breathing the fresh air that blew over the river; and although the young fellow did not directly look at her, I knew that he was thinking of Mrs. Margery's younger sister, and reading to her alone, and not to the rest of us.

One afternoon, when every body had gone to drive or to sail, I was sauntering in a retired part of the garden, and heard a voice reading. I recognized the voice and the words. It was our Bertram of the mornings, and he was reading "Lady Geraldine's Courtship" aloud. I suspected who his listener might be; but I stole softly away; and at tea, when every body was telling the tale of the afternoon, and some one asked the younger sister where she had been, she answered carelessly that she had only been loitering about the garden. I looked, without exciting attention, at Bertram; but that wily poet seemed to hear nothing, and to be as unconcerned as if he were alone in his chamber. Indeed, I think that I felt more guilty than any body, and I clumsily said, "Oh yes, and I've been in the garden too." I wonder if my tone or look expressed any thing? For the younger sister seemed to be very much less careless as she heard me, and Master Bertram immediately lost his unconcerned air.

The next morning, as we were sitting upon the lawn, Mrs. Margery observed that the blossoms of the weigela were falling, and said, ruefully, as a breeze shook a noble shrub and scattered the flowers, "Summer friends! summer friends!"

"Yes," said Silverly, "like the hummingbirds in the lilacs."

"Or the girls at Saratoga and Newport," added Balder. "They are the most evanescent summer friends; fair as the flowers, and as fleeting."

There was a chorus of laughter.

"Balder is confiding this morning," said Rita.

"Mere sympathy," he answered; "my withers are unwrung. But 'twas an old humor of mine to see the stricken deer go weep, the hart ungalled play, notwithstanding."

"What is a summer friend?" asked the younger sister.

"One who loves and leaves," replied Balder.

"When are you going down?" I asked Bertram, for I saw that they were all playing with fire.

"When I grant him leave of absence," said Mrs. Margery, quickly.

The younger sister's cheek flushed as if the fire were about to burst out in flame. But Bertram said, quietly.

"Summer friends are the best of all. We are surrounded by them now. The sky infinitely rosy and tender, those June clouds that are floating in it, that soft line of green hills far over the river, this perfect air, this beautiful lawn, the roses, the honeysuckles, the deutzias, the rhododendrons, the thick, clean-leaved tulip-trees, the singing-birds, those marvelous strawberries which John there is carrying in for lunch—these are but a few of that concourse of summer friends of which you lightly speak. Have you any better to show? Hark! there is Robert o' Lincoln rollicking in melody beyond the hedge. He poises a moment upon the very crest of perfect summer, trills his joy, and is gone. Ah! fickle and fleeting summer friend! And here comes a drift of down upon the air. It is only another of the evanescent company. But what is this? The down was a seed, do you say, which springs into that plant perpetually flowering? And the song is in memory a constant inspiration? Why, you flouters of summer friends, listen!" And the shy Bertram, who had amazed us all by this voluble discourse, opened the volume which he held, and read us Longfellow's little poem:

"I shot an arrow into the air,
It fell to earth, I knew not where;
For, so swiftly it flew, the sight
Could not follow it in its flight.

"I breathed a song into the air,
It fell to earth, I knew not where;
For who has sight so keen and strong
That it can follow the flight of song?

"Long, long afterward, in an oak,
I found the arrow still unbroke;
And the song, from beginning to end,
I found again in the heart of a friend."

Of course I, who had heard that afternoon reading in the retired part of the garden, and who, as an old man, am not suspected of seeing and hearing with shrewdness, casually glanced at the younger sister, as Bertram read this poem. By a curious coincidence, I saw that as he ended his eyes also took the same direction. But, by the most remarkable of coincidences, her eyes met his upon the way, and mine instantly withdrew. The party dispersed to re-assemble at dinner, and I strolled off to the woods by the river.

Have summer friends, then, been always so cruelly maligned by the proverb which makes them so fair but so fickle? A man, for instance, is born poor, and he struggles on among the backs and cold shoulders and sharp elbows of other people, until by mere chance he pulls up a little sapling by the road-side, which he had grasped to help him along, and lo! a silver mine, and he the owner. As to a magnet, the faces turn to it that would never turn toward him, and instead of elbows pushing him aside, he suddenly finds outstretched hands of homage before him. Such signs of respect, such vows of fidelity, such offers of aid, and murmurs of sympathy, he has never heard. The world is a new world. It is full of pleasant faces, of agreeable manners, of courteous consideration. He never suspected himself to be clever, but applause shows him that he has newly become witty. He was never eloquent, but he observes that people hang upon his words. Nobody ever cared for his opinion, but he is consulted upon all sides. His name was of no value, but it is now essential to every public appeal. Yet he is the very same man who lived among the backs and cold shoulders of his neighbors, and nothing has happened except that by no skill of his own he has found a silver mine.

Or it is Thersites, who is not honored, but who is resolved to write Honorable before his name. Early and late he is busily studying the weaknesses and interests of his neighbors. The wise smile, the lofty sneer; but Thersites bullies the caucus, buys the convention, and contracts for the district, and when the vote is counted it is the Honorable Thersites who leads the poll. There are feasts and honors of every kind. His name, too, is sought, and his tongue is discovered to be eloquent. He is mentioned among the most honorable. The newspapers praise him, and men and women who would have scorned his acquaintance bow before him in the splendor of his own house, and are chronicled as courtiers at his levee. Yet he, too, is the same narrow, ignorant, crafty man. Nothing is changed, except that he has bought an honor dishonorably.

This is only homage to success, you say, perhaps, my dear Paul; these are only illustrations of the results of chance or of design, and the friends who fawn upon good fortune are only summer wasps that light upon sugar. They are true summer friends. They are spawned by the heat, and they will die with the first frost. Butterflies flickering in the sun, they are but insects following the law of their little life. Yes, dear Paul; but I grudge the name. I think that the shy Bertram, who so suddenly found a voice, was right. If there were only wasps and butterflies in summer, then the parasites of mere good fortune or success should be called summer friends and welcome. But if the wasp sucks the fruit and stings and flies, here is the honey-bee. First the flower comes—an apple-blossom—odorous and beautiful, delighting the senses, inspiring the imagination, making me happy and better if it only bloomed. But I see its sure processes, its unfailing law, its perfect cycle—first the seed, then the plant, the tree, the flower, the fruit, the seed, and so perpetually. That very bough, the flower of a week, perfumes the air so that the orchard has a climate of its own. And if that were all, I say, enough; that is a summer friend. But, therefore, a friend all the year.

And here booms the bee, another summer friend. But while his busy buzzing is the very voice of summer, which ceases with its flowers, he is building a secret June in his hive, storing a golden tropic for me when the heats are passed. Yonder spins your wasp; but hark to my wood-thrush, to my oriole! Are they less summer friends? And as surely as the bee hives honey to outlast the year, so that song stores my mind with happy thoughts, immortal as I. The tender bloom of those distant hills, like the deep lustre of the grapes by-and-by, shall fade with the fading year; but does it pass as the parasites pass when good fortune goes? These are all my summer friends, and the robin and cat-bird. I shall not hear them with my ears when December comes. But I shall hear them with my heart all my life long. They are summer friends; but why should you call by their name the most trivial of human beings?

"You are right," I said to Bertram, as we all met at evening upon the moon-lighted piazza over the river; "you are right; and summer friends are the surest and most constant of all."

There was a laughing chorus again, for nothing had been said since the morning about our conversation. Bertram smiled, and said that he was glad of one convert. I looked at the younger sister, and thought that possibly there might be more than one. But nothing more was said, and presently she went to the piano; and while we sat upon the enchanted piazza, old and young, looking out over the river, and dreaming and hoping and remembering, she played gently and sang tender, moonlight songs—songs "full of old sadness that lives in my soul." The next morning I came away. Mrs. Margery was waiting in her pony wagon to carry me to the train, when I came out to say good-by to the pleasant circle. "Farewell, summer friends!" I said, laughing, as I went down the steps. But the younger sister left Bertram's side, by whom she was standing, and, putting her arm in mine, she whispered, "Good-by, dear Mr. Bachelor; but all summer friends don't love and leave."

"What!" said I, looking up to Bertram, who still stood upon the piazza; "are you going to stay?"

He nodded a smiling yes.

"God bless you, my dear May," I whispered to her in return. "Summer friends are the surest of all!"

And, my dear Paul, the more I think of it, the surer I am.

Your summer friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CHILD'S WALKING COAT AND GABRIELLE.

THE Gabrielle Dress and Walking Coat illustrated on our first page form the house and street dress of children from the time they are put into short clothes until they are three or four years of age, when there begins to be a difference between the dress of boys and girls. The walking coat is worn quite long, reaching to the ankles, by children of six months, but much shorter by older children; consequently it is not outgrown during its three or four years of use. For the present season it is made of piqué richly braided and embroidered; for the winter, cashmere, merino, and plaid flannels are lined warmly and braided. The shape is simply that of the old-time pelisse. The fronts of the waist are plain, the back is loose, and held by drawing-strings that tie beneath the front. The skirt has a sloped seam on the sides, with a plain breadth behind, very slightly fulled to the waist, as the drawing-strings gather the skirt sufficiently. The circular skirts once used for these coats are not worn now. The trimming extends around the skirt and up the fronts, the waist only being buttoned. The cape is round and deep enough to fall half the length of the skirt. Sleeves are coat-shaped. A small collar is used for boys, a larger one for girls. The rich braiding, inserted needle-work, and embroidered ruffles described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 25, Vol. IV., are used on these garments.

The Gabrielle dress is cut to fit almost smoothly over the under-clothes, and may be worn loose, or confined at the waist by a wide sash ribbon tied behind in a large looped bow with short ends. Piqué Gabrielles have Hamburg insertions let in the seams that pass over the shoulders, extending down the back and front, or else a vine of braiding follows these seams, ending with an ornamental figure half-way down the skirt. A rich border of braiding or two needle-worked ruffles then surround the skirt. French nansook Gabrielles have Valenciennes insertions and narrow pleated frills. Sometimes a little Pompadour square or a yoke is formed of the insertion in lengthwise bands, alternating with puffs or rows of tucks. Pure white is always prettiest for children's dresses, but many mothers use the striped linen—white, with bold black, brown, blue, or coral stripes for boys' Gabrielles, as they have a jaunty, boyish look. Bias bands of solid-colored percale and colored bindings are the trimmings. Serviceable Gabrielles for traveling and for nursery wear are made of brown undressed linen, strong and thick, yet cool. The skirts of these are faced two inches deep, and two rows of darker brown worsted braid—such as is used for binding dress skirts—are stitched straight around over the facing; a third row above these passes up the shoulder seams, back and front. Paler buff linens are embroidered with white, or trimmed with ruffles of white cambric needle-worked. The furnishing houses are stocked with colored linen Gabrielles braided by machinery. These are inexpensive, but the trimming is so showy and coarse-looking that few mothers like to see it on their little ones. $1 75 to $2 25 is charged for such Gabrielles.

Yoked slips with full skirts—the yoke high-necked, sleeves long, and the skirt straight—are also made for children just in short clothes. These are often the long robes first worn by the infant shortened to walking length. Low-necked and short-sleeved dresses are seldom seen on children except when arrayed for some grand occasion.

Mothers can fashion an excellent dress for growing girls by changing slightly the Princesse Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 25, Vol. IV. The waist is Gabrielle shape, made by cutting off the over dress pattern three inches below the taper, and omitting the postilion pleats. Cut the skirt by pattern furnished with the Princesse Suit, fasten to a belt, and button on to the Gabrielle waist, allowing the three added inches to be concealed beneath the skirt. Next season, when the child has grown taller, the waist is lengthened by means of these three inches. The Gabrielle is fitted so loosely about the shoulders that it will remain broad enough; and a cuff or ruffle will lengthen the sleeve. A little upper-skirt is worn with such dresses. The princesse over dress has lately been made up in pink or blue silk, low in the neck, and with shoulder-straps instead of sleeves, and worn over white muslin dresses. Silk ruches or ruffles are the trimmings.

A cunning little sun-hat of brown linen, starched, without rattans, is made for children to wear in the country. It consists of two circular pieces: the lower one, forming the brim, has a piece taken out of one side to make it scoop, and is buttoned together; the crown piece is a scalloped circle buttoned to the top of the brim. Strings tie it down at the sides in cottage fashion. It is very simple, coquettishly pretty, and as easily laundried as a pocket-handkerchief. $1 75 or $2 is the price.

Flowing hair slightly crimped, or waved, rather, with the front drawn straight back and hanging in a plaited tress down the centre, is the prettiest fashion for small children. All-white hats, either of Leghorn with white gros-grain ribbon and ostrich tips, or else of shirred Swiss muslin, are most in favor for dress. The sailor hat of white or brown straw is for ordinary occasions. Lovely little gypsy bonnets are of dotted Swiss muslin, edged with Valenciennes and lined with blue silk: $5 is the price.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Black cashmere round capes are destined to replace the cashmere sacques that have become too generally worn to be in favor with ladies of exclusive tastes. The handsomest model was sent over by Worth. It is a double talma of black cashmere. The lower cape falls a finger length below the waist; the upper is several inches shorter, and has a Watteau fold behind. Passementerie and fringe edge each cape and the collar. A cord with tassels ties it. The mantle hangs open from the throat. Gracefully worn on a cool morning over a black silk suit, this forms a most distinguished-looking garment. When paletots are worn as extra wraps, those of pale gray cashmere or drap d'été, richly braided and fringed, are preferred to black cashmere jackets. Black silk sacques are out of favor at present. Black lace sacques are very fashionable, and llama lace is worn, especially with black suits. All new lace sacques have flowing sleeves, and are of simple sailor shape, or else slightly fitted to fall in with the figure.

The outfits for the watering-places present some beautiful novelties. An elegant garment, destined for Long Branch, is a polonaise of white lustrous pongee, elaborately draped in the Marguerite fashion, trimmed with black Chantilly lace and many bows of black velvet ribbon. This is to be worn over a black silk or velvet skirt as a carriage costume. In the same wardrobe is a black grenadine with demi-trained skirt. The three front breadths have a tablier of many crescent-shaped folds of pale mauve silk. The back breadths have six gathered lapping flounces, bias, and widely bound with mauve silk. An over-skirt with three ruffles is in the back only, leaving the front breadths uncovered. The basque has a Louis Fourteenth vest of mauve silk, and a pleated postilion showing revers of mauve. A suit of nut brown silk has a polonaise with box-pleats arranged on the waist in a way very becoming to slender figures.

The first choice at present is to trim silks and other rich suit materials with themselves. The most undefined stripes and the pin-head checks that used to require black velvet and lace to give them character, as the modistes say, have now intricate pleatings and ruffles entirely of the self material. This is a reaction from the shaded trimmings that have become common, and are not pretty unless the shades are more nicely blended than those one sees daily.

In preparing outfits for the summer, modistes say that the dresses most often ordered are, first, a black grenadine with demi-train for the house; a grenadine suit for the street, a costume with nut brown silk skirt and polonaise of écru pongee or foulard; a striped silk that will serve for the house or carriage, and is usually black and white; a gray mohair with self trimmings for traveling; and white dresses suitable for morning, noon, and evening. Thus we see that black, écru, gray, and white are the prevailing colors.

An elegant and simple way of flouncing grenadines, mohairs, and the light wool fabrics is a single kilt pleating three-eighths of a yard deep, cut straight, hemmed top and bottom, and pressed—not sewed—in inch-wide pleats. A row of stitching an inch below the top fastens this to the skirt, and a second row of stitching fastens it again half-way between the first row and the edge of the flounce. That part of the flounce below the second stitching hangs loosely like a ruffle.

White lawn cravats and lace jabots arranged in shell-like curves are worn with Louis Fourteenth vests, copying closely the costume of le Grand Monarque.

A stylish material for summer suits is the new Tussore linen, a wiry goods, sheer yet strong, and as cool as the real India fabrics. It is in nut brown, the dark tea-color now in vogue, the popular absinthe, or greenish-gray, and the serviceable dust-color that does not soil easily. The buff tints are not found. Plain Tussore linen is 35 cents a yard; with a striped or fringed edge it is 37½ cents. Ladies are having suits of this made in the coolest way possible, viz., with pleated blouse-waist, simple long over-skirt, fringed or edged with a bias fold, and a kilt flounce like that described above.

CHILD'S GABRIELLE DRESS AND WALKING COAT.

WITH CUT PAPER PATTERN.

See Illustration on first page.

THIS pretty suit may be worn equally well by boys and girls from six months to four years old. It consists of a Gabrielle dress, which may be either high or low necked, and a walking coat, with a cape and collar that can be worn separately. Two illustrations show the walking coat made of white braided piqué, and worn by a boy three years old, and the Gabrielle dress, made of the same material, and worn by a girl two years old. The suit may be made of any kind of fabric, and is equally well adapted for summer and winter wear.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises two articles—Gabrielle dress and walking coat, and is graded in six sizes, to fit children from six months to four years old. The average sizes are, respectively, for six months, 16 inches; one year, 17 inches; eighteen months, 18 inches; two years, 19 inches; three years, 20 inches; and four years, 21 inches.

GABRIELLE DRESS.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, front gore, back, side gore for the back, and sleeve. The seams in the back and front side gores extend to the shoulder seam. The front and back should be laid on the fold of the cloth to prevent making a seam. Cut an opening in the back from the neck to about four inches below the waist line, and face it for the buttons and button-holes. Lap the left side over the right, and tack it firmly at the bottom of the opening. Place the longest seam of the sleeve at the notch in the armhole, and hold it toward you when sewing it in. Baste up and try on wrong side out before sewing; and if the garment needs alteration, take up more or less in the seams. Lengthen or shorten the skirt at the bottom, being careful to preserve the shape. The perforations show where to cut out for a low neck, if required. The parts are all notched to prevent mistakes in putting together. A quarter of an inch is allowed for seams, and an inch for a hem on the bottom.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child six months old, 1¾ yards.

Allow one-eighth of a yard more for each size to 18 inches, and a quarter of a yard for each of the larger sizes.

WALKING COAT WITH CAPE.—This pattern is in seven pieces—front and back of waist, front and back of skirt, sleeve, cape, and collar. The waist is whole in the back, and is fitted loosely. The skirt is cut without a seam in the back, and has bias seams at the side. It is gathered at the top in the back between the seams, and is sewed to the waist. The back of the waist is shirred at the waist line between the seams under the arm, and is tied in front under the waist. The front is closed the whole length with buttons and button-holes. The coat and cape are finished separately at the neck, and can be worn separately or together. The cape is finished at the neck with a small collar. A quarter of an inch is allowed for seams, and an inch for hems on the front and bottom.

Quantity of material, 27 inches wide, for child six months old, 2 yards.

Number of buttons, 8.

Allow a quarter of a yard more for each size to 18 inches, and three-eighths for each of the larger sizes.

Ladies' Summer Dresses.

Fig. 1.—ÉCRU MOHAIR DRESS, TRIMMED WITH BLACK VELVET BANDS AND BOWS. Over-skirt open in front, and cut in large pointed scallops. Basque-waist cut in points, and trimmed with velvet outlining a vest. Linen and guipure collar and under-sleeves.

Fig. 2.—Lilac silk under-skirt, trimmed with six rows of lilac velvet. White alpaca over-skirt, looped at the sides and in the middle of the back, and bordered with three bands of lilac silk. White alpaca half-fitting double-breasted sacque, slashed at the sides and in the back, with revers and collar of lilac silk and lilac silk buttons. Half-pagoda sleeves with mousquetaire cuffs. Rice-straw hat. White pongee parasol, lined with lilac.

Fig. 3.—Under-skirt of rose-colored silk. Over-skirt of white muslin in five pieces, the front forming a round tablier, and trimmed with a pleated flounce edged at the bottom with narrow lace and surmounted by insertion underlaid with rose-colored ribbon, and an upright frill of narrow lace. The sides of the skirt form deep points, and fall nearly plain; the back pieces also form deep points, and are bouffant and gathered up, the outer edges being fastened to the pieces at the sides. Postilion-basque of white muslin, with open sleeves, heart-shaped in front, and trimmed like the over-skirt. Rose-colored ribbon sash and bows. White chip hat, trimmed with lace, ostrich feathers, and flowers.

PERSONAL.

MR. ROBERT T. LINCOLN, eldest son of the late President, has won the esteem of the people of Illinois by his persistent refusal to accept political office, and his devotion to the practice of his profession as a lawyer. He is now about twenty-five years of age, and has the reputation in Chicago of being an excellent manager, a shrewd and capable lawyer, and systematic man of business. Those who know him best predict for him an eminent position at the bar.

—MR. WALTER GRINNELL, late admiral in the Japanese navy, but who retired and made a tour into Eastern Mantchuria and Corea, penetrating a country almost unknown, has recently delivered before the New York Geographical Society a very interesting address about that region. He says the population of Corea is about 6,000,000. It is an independent empire, but sends annual tribute to China. There are eight provinces, each with a separate government. The climate is magnificent.

—We citizens of the republic of the U. S. sometimes take occasion to state, in a mild way, that the subjects of the British crown have to pay somewhat dearly for the maintenance of scions of the royal house. But a gentleman who has bent a few of his intellectual forces to the subject says that every four years, at the Presidential election, not less than $2,000,000 is expended for party purposes, to say nothing of the enormous demands made upon politicians and office-holders to sustain party organizations. The British placeman has none of this swindle to submit to; hence boasteth he the superiority of British institutions.

—The Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND, of Washington, one of the recent Board of Examiners at West Point, preached the ante-graduating sermon to the cadets, in which, after some good advice and plain talk, he warned them "not to run away with the idea that they are the tremendous fellows their friends and themselves may think them to be." There was a little something in that.

—The friends of the exact sciences will feel a thrill of pleasure when they are told that Mr. JONATHAN MORGAN, of Portland, Maine, is about to deliver a series of lectures, in which he will utterly refute and smash the principles of Newtonian philosophy. He expresses the bold opinion that he has the ability to cut up Sir ISAAC as he would "a grub worm." The Mr. JONATHAN MORGAN who proposes to do this is now ninety-three years old (nearly par), and for eight and sixty years has bent his energies to the awful mysteries of Free and Accepted Masonry.

—BRIGHAM YOUNG, with hair nicely oiled, in ringlets, and falling around his heavy neck, hair and beard luxuriant, and but little turned in color, his manner all bland, soothes mankind with seignorial hospitality—at least that is the way a Chicago Tribune letter-writer puts it down.

—When Mr. SEWARD reached Alexandria he was received with almost royal honors by the representatives of the Khedive, and a palace provided for his use while he remains a visitor. He is going to take a little run to Palestine, and thence to Constantinople. There will be very high jinks when he gets to hobnobbing with the Sultan.

—Sir JOHN HERSCHEL, at the time of his death, was the oldest senior wrangler of the University of Cambridge, having attained that distinction in 1813. He is succeeded by Sir J. SHAW LEFEVRE, the clerk of the Parliaments, who became a senior wrangler in 1818.

—LOUIS NAPOLEON has purchased Hooton Hall, the late residence of R. C. NAYLOR, Esq. Some years ago, when Prince NAPOLEON, he was a guest at Hooton Hall, and before his departure expressed his appreciation of it, and intimated that he would like to reside there. Fortune, or misfortune, has favored his wishes.

—The salary of President ELLIOT, of Harvard College, is $3200; the cook at the Parker House receives $4000: which suggests, says the Boston Traveler, that there are more men fitted for the presidential chair of colleges than are capable of taking charge of the kitchen of a first-class hotel.

—Miss ALCOTT, during her recent visit in London, was tea-partied by Miss JEAN INGELOW, to which divers and sundry literary celebrities, Yankee and British, were invited. Miss A. has got home in peace and Concord.

—The writer of "Ginx's Baby," which has had so much success in England and here, is a young London lawyer, only thirty-two years old, named EDWARD JENKINS, son of a Presbyterian clergyman in Montreal.

—M. JULES FERRY, it is supposed, will be the embassador of the new French government to Washington.

—It is one of those odd little incidents of which "society" people take note, in London, and which affords a delightful topic of talk, that recently, when in town, the Marquis of Bute dined with DISRAELI; which indicates that his lordship does not feel particularly heart-broken at the manner in which he has been heroed as "Lothair."

—Commodore VANDERBILT, being pecuniarily able, is taking things comfortably, spending most of his time at home, or driving some of his fast horses on "the lane."

—Merit will win its way: Mr. E. E. STRAZNICKY has been appointed chief librarian of the Astor Library. For fourteen years he has been connected with the institution; and so perfect is his knowledge of its contents that he is said to know the name and position of every book in the library. Another gentleman of fine literary acquirements is among the assistant librarians, Mr. FREDERICK SAUNDERS, author of "Salad for the Social," "Salad for the Solitary," "Mosaics," and other dainty works. These gentlemen save a world of time to visitors—they tell you precisely what books you want, what they contain, and give you a good start in your work.

—M. FELIX PYAT, the Communist leader, is an educated man, of tall and imposing appearance, gentlemanly in manner, and a scholar in his literary work. Actors know him as a writer for the stage, and journalists are familiar with his exaggerated phrases and heated metaphors. For more than forty years he has written against monarchy and for democratic socialism. In England, where he lived so long, he scandalized every one by the audacity with which he defended the right to assassinate the Emperor. It was strange to look at that man, and remember his mildness in the field of literature. No one member of the Commune has done such mischief.

—The most determined people in the world are sometimes the most disappointed. There was JOHN BECRAFT, for instance, of South Bend, Indiana, where our Mr. COLFAX lives, who attempted to commit suicide by quaffing an ounce of laudanum. On being asked the reason for the act, he replied: "Business is business. I wish to meet General JACKSON by four o'clock this afternoon, and I am going to see him." A stomach-pump broke the engagement.

—On a recent Thursday, in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Dr. ALEXANDER NELSON, of Albany, and Miss ELIZABETH CLAPP were joined in holy wedlock. The bridal procession was headed by little children, who, during the service, formed in beautiful array around the pulpit, which was profusely adorned with flowers. Prior to the ceremony the groom coolly sent for a "todd"—Dr. TODD—famous Dr. TODD—to perform the marriage service.

—Father CLEVELAND, of Boston, touched ninety-nine on Tuesday, the 20th ult.—only one per cent. under par. On the Sunday following he preached, morning and evening, in the Seamen's Bethel.

—Like his Majesty of Monaco and certain German Grand Dukes, the Emperor of China makes a pretty thing of the licenses to gambling houses—Pekin paying him $200,000 per annum, and the other cities of the Central Flowery Kingdom not less than $3,000,000.

—Mr. E. A. SOTHERN, the famous "Lord Dundreary," has entered into an engagement with Messrs. JARRETT & PALMER to play at Niblo's, commencing next October.

—An imposing presence is not the "style" of the Count de Chambord. He is described as large, fleshy, and awkward, with a "diluted look in the eyes," a soft smile, and a full beard on his face. Of his wife we are told that "her luminous hair, high forehead, dreamy, thoughtful eyes, prominent nose, beautifully expressive mouth, and slenderness of person indicate a queenly, aspiring being."

—BYRON M. PICKETT, the sculptor of the MORSE statue, like HIRAM POWERS, E. D. PALMER, and HENRY KIRKE BROWNE, is a self-taught artist. He is a native of Jordan, Onondaga County, New York, and had "a hard road to travel" in the early years of his profession. The MORSE statue is in all respects a first-class production. Since its completion he is said to have received orders amounting to $50,000.

—The Library building on Fifth Avenue near Seventy-first street, for which New York is to be indebted to the munificent liberality of Mr. JAMES LENOX, will soon begin to rear its stately proportions. The foundation is already completed.

—Since Mrs. GAINES won her lawsuit, and thus became the richest woman in America, she has been fallen in love with in a very violent manner by a little army of swains. But she is sixty-four, and sixty-four does not gush at matrimony. In her opinion the departed General GAINES was the very best man that ever lived; never did an evil deed; never thought one. Lady GAINES is racy in conversation, tells anecdotes, and laughs as loud and as long as any woman of her years and income ought to laugh.

—Among other interesting announcements made at a meeting of the Geographical Society a few evenings since, Judge CHARLES P. DALY stated that there was a gentleman present, M. PAVVI, who intended to make an expedition to the north pole at his own expense. He would proceed from New York to San Francisco, and thence to Siberia. He proposes to go out in a boat of peculiar structure, and travel the ice with a hardy crew, and when he reaches open water to construct his boat, which is made of India rubber. It is capable of carrying a weight of 10,000 pounds, and can be stowed away in a barrel.

—The interviewer has captured General SHERIDAN, and pumped him thoroughly about what he saw and did during his campaign with the German army. He says that the Emperor WILLIAM is a fine old gentleman and a good general, possessing personal courage and bravery in an extraordinary degree. "At Gravelotte I saw him in the thickest of the fire." So far from being an instrument of BISMARCK'S, he has a firm will of his own, which he maintains in spite of the chancellor. BISMARCK is by far the greatest man in Europe, and a first-rate soldier. The Crown Prince is a true soldier, and always where he ought to be in battle.

—M. THIERS is not too popular with his literary brethren. MICHELET calls him a strong mediocrity, a superb commonplace. ALEXANDRE DUMAS says he thinks admirably, but executes horribly. GAUTIER says his rhetoric is as free from faults as his government is full of them. HOUSSAYE confesses, if his measures were as wise as his sentences are graceful, he would be one of the first statesmen of his time; and adds that in politics THIERS learns nothing, and forgets nothing.

—Mr. CYRUS W. FIELD has purchased, for fifty thousand dollars, one-third of the New York Evening Mail. Under the editorial management of Major BUNDY the Mail has become one of the brightest and most entertaining of our evening papers, and having passed safely through the infantile period of journalism, has entered fairly upon manhood, and with its unexceptionable habits, sound constitution, good by-laws, and excellent rules of order, bids fair to attain an enviable newspaper longevity.

—For first-class rotation in office commend us to Charleston, South Carolina. Since the United States became independent that city has had but three postmasters—THOMAS BACOT, appointed by WASHINGTON; ANDREW HUGER, appointed by JACKSON; and the present incumbent, appointed by GRANT.

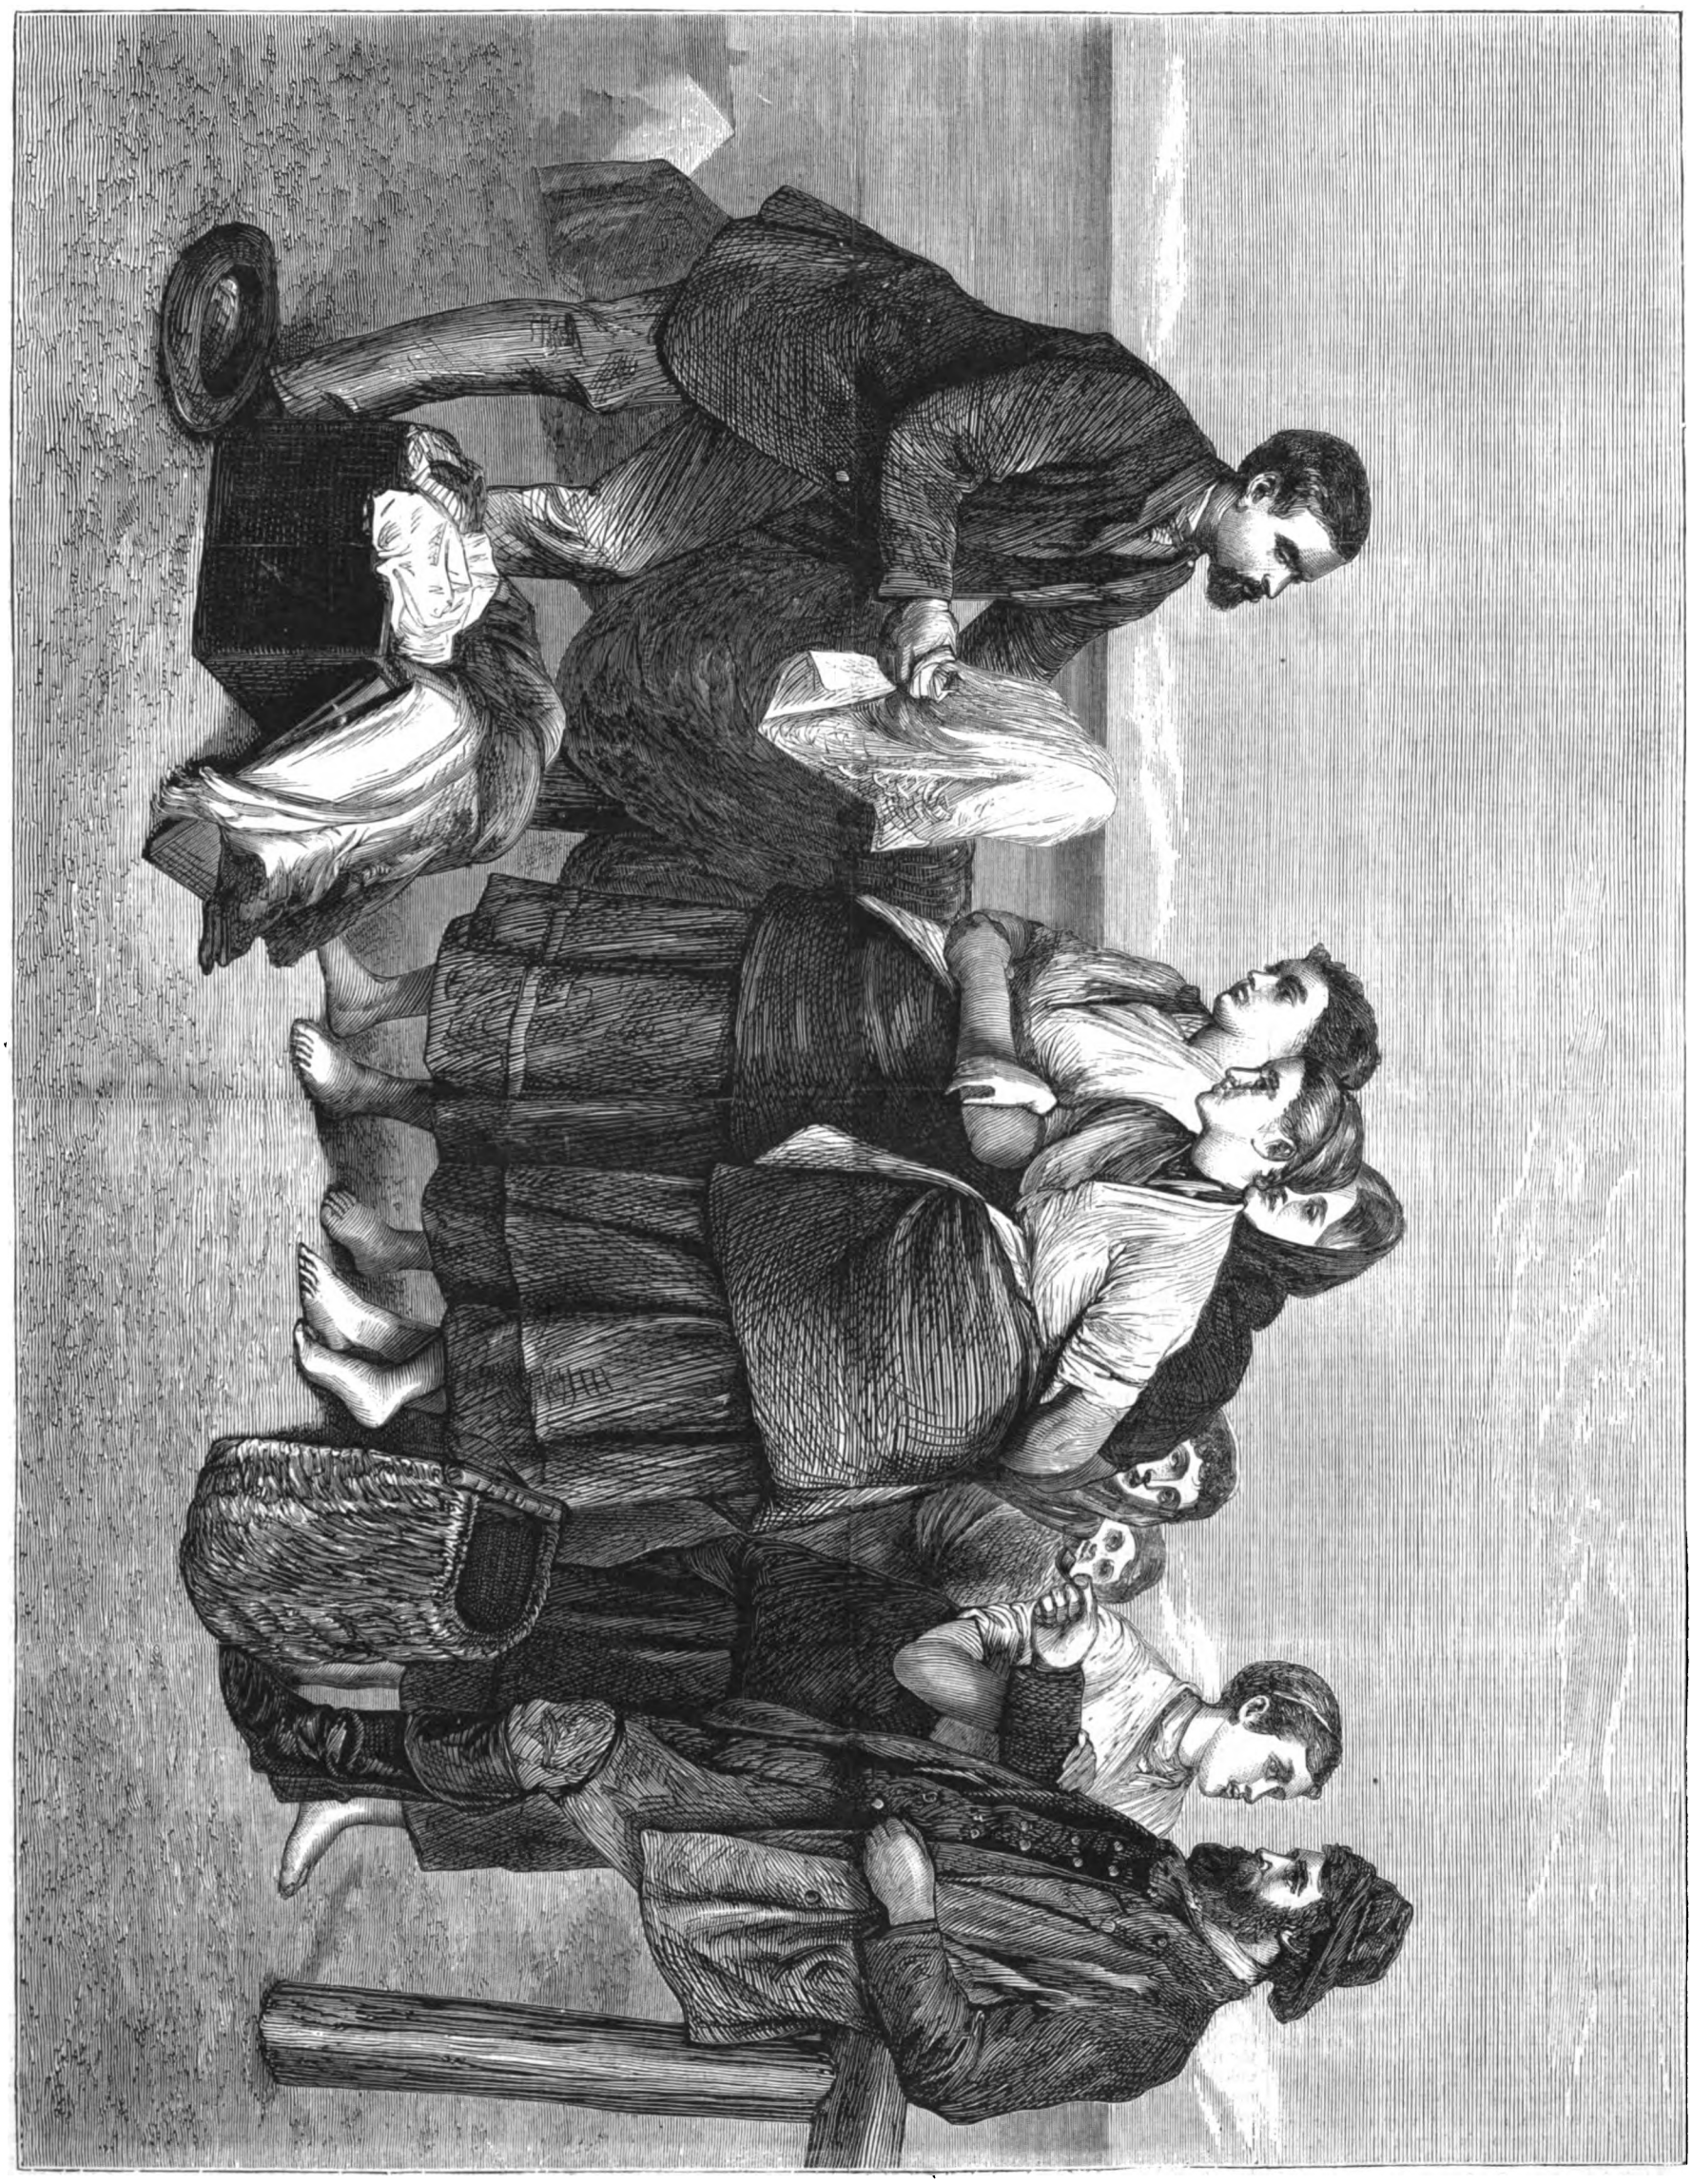
THE PEDDLER.

THE peddler here displaying his wares to the bonny English fish-wives is not of the conventional type—a rollicking, sly, unprincipled Autolycus, who will insinuate a shawl upon an unwilling customer with a joke or a fib, or find out a customer's weak places with flattery well laid on—but a quiet, sober, "douce, honest man," whose very appearance is against all imposition. He stands waiting, apparently in silence, as though the quality of his goods needed no encomiums from him, while the women inspect his haberdashery with all the deliberation which such a solemn proceeding requires, and mentally calculate how much they may expect to beat him down. The sturdy fisherman completes the composition and the story. He is the prototype of a town-bred husband suffering the martyrdom of shopping, as he stands patiently awaiting the end of the haggling.



THE PEDDLER.

BIRTHS IN HOLLAND.

WHEN a Dutch baby is born a notification of the fact is at once sent round to all friends, and even to tradesmen and dependents; in the case of people of wealth who can afford the luxury of men-servants, these are the messengers, wearing white gloves in honor of the auspicious event. Each day, for two or three weeks after the confinement, a paper bulletin is placed on the door-post, or inside of the glass above the door, to the effect that mevrouw and the baby are going on well. It is nevertheless considered proper, and indeed expected, that friends should call and make inquiries and leave cards, and that pretty constantly. But all these bulletins and inquiries cease when the mevrouw holds her kramvisiten, or boudoir reception, for married ladies only. On this occasion the baby, dressed in the height of prevailing fashion, and wearing a beautiful long white veil, is brought in by the monthly nurse, who expects to receive a gratuity from each visitor, a perquisite always considered in engaging her. And it may not be out of place to mention that it is only of late years that the ancient institution of midwives has begun to fail in favor of male accoucheurs, who formerly were and well-born, was almost in extremis; and then, whatever might be their theoretical knowledge, their services, from want of practical skill, were commonly of no great advantage. The fashion is changing now. The kramvisiters are presented with caudle, and a plate with cinnamon cake is handed round. It is customary during this period to send out to young lady friends little packets of caraway-seed comfits, which are sprinkled upon bread-and-butter, and thus eaten to the health of the new baby.

THE ROSE OF KENMARE.

A SONG BY SHIEL DHUV.

I've been soft in a small way
On the girleens of Galway,
And the Limerick lassies have made me feel quare;
But there's no use denyin'.
No girl I've set eye on
Could compate wid Rose Ryan of the town of Kinmare.

CHORUS.

Oh, where can her like be found?
Nowhere the counthry round
Spins at her wheel
Daughther as thrue,
Sets in the reel
Wid a slide of the shoe, a slinderer,
tinderer,
wittier,
purtier colleen than you,
Rose, aroo!

Her hair mocks the sunshine,
And the soft silver moonshine
Neck and arm of the colleen complately eclipse;
Whilst the nose of the jewel
Slants sthraight as Carn Tual,*
From the heaven in her eye to her heather-swate lips.
Oh, where, etc.

Did your eyes ever follow
The wings of the swallow
Here and there, light as air, o'er the meadow field glance?
For if not ye've no notion
Of the exquisite motion
Of her swate little feet as they dart in the dance.
Oh, where, etc.

If y' inquire why the nightingale
Still shuns the invitin' gale
That wafts every song-bird but her to the wesht,
Faix she knows, I suppose,
Ould Kinmare has a Rose
That would sing anny bulbul to sleep in her nesht.
Oh, where, etc.

Whin her voice gives the warnin'
For the milkin' in the mornin'
Ev'n the cow known for hornin' comes runnin' to her pail;
The lambs play about her,
And the small bonneenst snout her,
Whilsht their parints salute her wid a twisht of the tail.
Oh, where, etc.

Whin at noon from our labor
We draw neighbor wid neighbor
From the hate of the sun to the shilther of the tree,
Wid spudst fresh from the bilin'
And new milk you come smilin',
All the boys' hearts beguilin,' alanah machree!
Oh, where, etc.

But there's one swater hour
Whin the hot day is o'er
And we rest at the door wid the bright moon above,
And she sittin' in the middle,
Whin she's guessed Larry's riddle
Cries, "Now for your fiddle, Shiel Dhuv, Shiel Dhuv."
Oh, where, etc.

HUGH DAMER'S LAST LEGER.

BY MISS BRADDON,

Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," etc.

CHAPTER I.

"Tricks he hath had in him which gentlemen have."

I DON'T suppose there are many people nowadays who remember Hugh Damer. Not that I would imply that he existed at a period beyond the memory of middle-aged mankind. The time that I am writing of is barely fifteen years old. But the memories of men are short, and every decade sees the rise and fall of new heroes. The career of a man of the world is not much longer than the reign of those later Cæsars who were polished off so quickly in the days when Rome was going down hill and the Roman Empire a nice little lot to be put up to auction. Picture to yourself, says De Quincey, any man going home to dinner with that little lot in his pocket!

So I say, advisedly, that perhaps there are few nowadays who care to remember the brief summer-time of Hugh Damer's life; and yet he was a great man in his time—that is to say, great in certain circles—and made his mark after a certain fashion.

We were contemporaries at Oxford, but not of the same college. I was a Baliol man, Damer was at Christ-church; but we were fast friends notwithstanding. I think Hugh indulged freely in every kind of dissipation fashionable at that period; but he never got into any vulgar scrapes—no painting chapel doors a bright scarlet, or nailing up an obnoxious don's oak, or any thing of that kind; and in spite of wine parties without number, hunting all through the season, not a little high play late of nights "under the rose," and various other amusements of a somewhat uproarious order, Hugh contrived to distinguish himself in athletics, and to take his degree in a very creditable manner. When or how he read no one could ever discover, but it was said that he could do without sleep for a fortnight at a time, and that very often after shutting his door upon his friends at two A.M., he would tie a wet towel round his head and go in for divinity till early chapel, where he made his appearance fresh as a rose after his matutinal shower-bath.

He was blessed with a superb constitution, and a marvelous capacity for work or pleasure. He was, indeed, a man who could scarcely help living hard and fast—a man to whom any monotonous or sluggish form of existence would have been simply unendurable. In appearance he was a splendid fellow—tall, broad-shouldered, blue-eyed, and chestnut-haired, with a sunny look in his face that was, for most people, irresistible. He had the air of a man who must needs command fortune—win the race of life in a canter: indeed, it was almost impossible to associate the idea of trouble or sorrow of any kind with Hugh Damer.

After leaving Oxford I lost sight of my friend for some years. I went to the bar, and my own life was a great deal too busy for the perpetual frivolities of the fashionable world. I saw nothing of Hugh, but I heard of him—heard of him as one of the most distinguished among the gilded youth of that day. He was of a good old Yorkshire family, and had a large fortune, which, according to the report of his friends, had come to him unfettered at his majority. People told me that he was spending this royally, and, at the rate he was living, it could not be expected to hold out long.

"He's a fine, capital fellow—a first-rate fellow," one of these prudent observers said to me; "but there never was much stay in him. He does every thing too fast—runs away with the race for the first half mile, and comes in nowhere at the finish. People are afraid of him somehow. He might have doubled his fortune by a brilliant marriage more than once; but he lost his chance, dished himself by some mad folly that no man but he would have dreamed of. He's a dangerous fellow, and women feel it, and can't bring themselves to trust him."

Thus argued our common friend, with a serious countenance, and a deprecatory elevation of the shoulders. I was sorry to hear such an opinion of Damer, for I liked him with all my heart, and had hoped in a brilliant future for him.

It was not very long after this, just at the close of the London season, when I came across my old friend quite unexpectedly at a West End club, of which I was a member, but whose gorgeous saloons my shadow rarely darkened. I was a busy man and a prosperous withal, my prosperity entirely dependent upon unremitting industry.

A late August twilight was closing in, and the lamps were glimmering here and there in the shadowy streets. The fashionable quarter of the town had a dreary look, the great rooms of the club a palpable air of desolation.

I went into the reading-room; there was only one man there, and he rose from one of the luxurious arm-chairs and threw down a periodical with an audible groan as I entered. Suddenly he started, stared at me with all his might, and came striding across the room to me, and in the next moment both my hands were in the muscular grip of Hugh Damer.

"My dear Norris, my dear old friend," he cried, in his loud, hearty way, "I am so rejoiced to see you—so glad, upon my soul, now—I can't tell you how glad. I have been wishing to come across you for the last half dozen years."

"And yet you knew where to find me all the time, Hugh; and the Temple, if remote from the civilized regions of the West, is not a pilgrimage utterly beyond the capacity of friendship."

"Hit away, old chap. I deserve the reproach. But, you see, I knew you were always busy—heard of you from every one as devoted to your profession, a perfect slave to it, in fact, and I am such an idle beggar, what could I do but bore you if I came? And then one's life goes so fast somehow. I declare to you, Fred, I have seldom had an hour that I could call my own since I left Oxford. I seem to have existed in a whirlpool, an actual maelstrom spinning me round and round, and sucking me down in spite of myself. And now tell me all your news, dear boy; what you have been doing, and what you are going to do, and all the rest of it."

We sat down opposite each other at a little table in one of the windows, and by the faint gray light of the fading day I saw that my friend was not looking by any means as well as I should have wished to see him look. The handsome face was wan and haggard, and there were lines about the eyes and mouth that should scarcely have appeared in so young a countenance.

"I'm afraid you've been ill, Hugh," I said to him by-and-by. "You seem to have lost that perennial bloom for which you were renowned at Oxford."

"Ill! Oh no," he answered, carelessly. "I've not been ill—worried a little occasionally, that's all. But now listen to me, Fred, old fellow, and if you wish to preserve my regard you must fall into my way of thinking; and I assure you that regard of mine is a very deep feeling, though it's rather backward in showing itself. Now you own to having a clear fortnight before you after the last of this month, in which you may kick up your heels and dispose of yourself as it seems fit to you, without let or hinderance to your prospects of wearing silk by-and-by. And you talk of devoting your leisure to certain nameless cads of your acquaintance—of the genus swell, I suppose—who have got a moor down somewhere in the North, and want you to go and assist them in the murder of innocent grouse. Throw over the unknown cads, dear old boy, and come down to me. September is a great time for us Yorkshire men. I can give you no end of partridges; and my place is only fifteen miles from Doncaster. Come to Churleigh Wood, Fred, and spend your holiday with an old friend. I shall consider it an especial favor if you say 'Yes'—and—and it may be the last time I shall be able to ask you."

"What do you mean by that, Hugh?" I demanded, alarmed by the sudden gravity of his tone.

"Never mind what I mean, Fred. Life is full of changes. The present is all a man can call his own, and so, Carpe diem. Come, dear boy; is it to be yes or no?"

"I should be a churl if I said 'No,' when you flatter me by seeming really anxious to have me," I answered; "so the gentlemen unknown, who are really very good fellows in their way, shall go overboard, and I'll inflict my society upon you for the first fortnight in September. Shall you be alone at Churleigh?"

"Alone?" He laughed aloud at the absurdity of the notion, and I was very glad to hear the old frank laugh again. "Alone, Fred! Why, I have never been alone in my own house since I became master of it. We're sure of a houseful; some nice people, of course, and perhaps a few nasty ones; but you'll put up with the bores for the sake of friendship."

"I am not afraid of meeting bores at Churleigh," I answered. "There is not much affinity between you and that species, I think, Damer."

"There is one of my guests I fancy you will like," he said, musingly, and with a tender smile lighting up his haggard face.

"A lady, Hugh? Your face tells me that!"

"Yes, a lady; but I will say no more till you have seen her."

We parted soon after this, I promising to be with my friend on the 1st. He had occasion to go down to the old place some days earlier, in order to be ready for possible arrivals.

CHAPTER II.

"What's to be thought of him? Does the rumor hold for true that he's so full of gold?"

THE weather was lovely, the country looking very fair in the subdued glory of early autumn, as the express rattled me down to Doncaster. Here a dog-cart and fast-trotting roan waited to convey me to Churleigh, where I arrived just in time to hear the dressing-bell ring out cheerily from an open bell tower, after an hour and a half's spin through a rich pastoral country.

The house was an old one, a sombre, red-brick pile of masonry of the Tudor period, with a wide moat, where carp and dace flashed through the deep, dusky water, under the shadow of great yews; a rare, old-fashioned place, with noble gardens set in a wide expanse of level meadow land, that might have been fairly called a park. Within, the dark oak paneling and ponderous furniture, quaint old cabinets and bureaus, buffets and chests of carved ebony and chestnut wood, oak, and walnut, had a delightful old-world aspect. There were rare old tapestries, too, silk-embroidered hangings, chairs and sofas in ancient worsted-work, which testified to the industry of past generations of feminine Damers. Every thing bore the fashion of an age that was gone, and there was a sombre charm about the place which was, to my mind, perfect in its way. I told Hugh how much I liked his birth-place, and praised the taste which had preserved its original character. He sighed heavily as he answered me. "Yes," he said, moodily, "it's a dear old place, and I am weak enough to love it. I can remember sitting at my mother's feet in some of these old rooms, or on her knees, with her arms round me, many a quiet twilight when my father was away in London. There was a great love between us two, and nothing that she cared for has been touched since she died. Her favorite flowers still grow in the garden—homely, old-fashioned flowers, that my gardeners would like to do away with—though it is fifteen years since her hand gathered one of them. Yes, I have need to love Churleigh, Fred. God forgive me!"

His tone alarmed me. There was such a depth of bitterness and self-reproach in his utterance of those last words.

"Hugh," I said, eagerly, "there is something wrong with you. I am sure of it. I saw the change in your face that night we met at the club. Why won't you trust me, dear boy? You call me your friend. Tell me the worst, Hugh. What is it that has gone wrong?"

"Every thing," he answered, with a groan. "It's the old story, Fred—the old story of the rake's progress. Only a modern version, you know, with a little less vice than there is in Hogarth's renowned panorama, but every whit as much folly. Yes, Fred, congratulate me upon my fair old home—the roof-tree that has sheltered my race for a dozen generations, the house my mother loved. Give me joy of a birth-place which an English gentleman may be fairly proud to call his own. The man who sweeps the crossing at the corner of Pall Mall has about as much right to call himself master of Churleigh as I have. It is all a miserable simulacrum, Fred; a mockery and a delusion. I don't say that the footmen and grooms are bailiffs in disguise, but they might just as well be that. It would make the case no worse."

"Then you are ruined, Hugh?"

"Irretrievably."

"In Heaven's name, how has it all gone—your fortune? It was a large one, wasn't it?"

"A very fair inheritance, though my father was somewhat wild in his day, and spent a good deal. How has it gone, Fred? Who knows? I the least of all mortal men. It has gone—somehow. I have lived much too fast to count the cost of life. I don't think there has been much wasted on actual vice, unless you call gambling vicious; but it has all gone. I drove a four-in-hand for two or three seasons, and that kind of thing leads to a good deal of outlay in the way of Richmond dinners and diamond bracelets—there are some people you can hardly ask to dinner without introducing a diamond bracelet as an element of the dessert—and I have had a weakness for steam-yachts; but those are minor details. I have enjoyed a curious sequence of ill luck upon the turf for the last two years. That may have something to do with it."

"I should think it rather likely," I answered, hopelessly. "But is there no chance of redemption, Hugh? A rich marriage, for instance?"

"No, Fred, I am not base enough for that. I couldn't offer my ruined fortunes to a rich woman. I couldn't sink to the position of a dependent on my wife. If I were in love with a penniless girl I wouldn't mind asking her to share my poverty. There is always something that a man can do. I might emigrate, and devote my energies to cattle-breeding far away in the bush. Unhappily, the only woman I care for is burdened with a large fortune—a fortune that must needs make an impassable barrier between herself and me."

"But, my dear boy, this is Quixotic folly. If the lady cares for you, why should you not redeem your fortunes by means of her wealth? It is a woman's proudest privilege to make that kind of sacrifice."

"And a man's deepest degradation to accept it. No, Fred, it can't be done. Beyond which, even were I sordid enough to desire such a thing, the lady is not her own mistress. She has a father, who would never forgive her for an imprudent marriage. No, Fred, I am done for—bar one remote contingency."

"And what is that?" I asked, anxiously.

"The success of my book for the Leger week. I stand to win something enormous—something that would set me on my legs again—give me a fresh start in life, in short. With that sum at my command I could pay off my most pressing engagements, clear this place of its mortgages, and, with a few years of retirement and economy, drift back into a very comfortable income. In that case I should not fear to ask Laura Dashwood to be my wife."

"Laura Dashwood! A very charming name."

"Yes, and a still more charming girl. However, you will see her to-morrow. She is only a manufacturer's daughter, I must tell you. George Dashwood is a self-made man—one of the richest men in Yorkshire, and a trifle pompous on the score of his money or his success. But he is not a bad fellow, by any means. And Laura is the dearest girl in England, to my mind."

"Of course. An only daughter, I presume?"

"An only child. I wish with all my heart she had half a score of brothers and sisters. But I suppose we'd better get back to the others now, old fellow."

It was late on the evening of my arrival. Lights were shining from a score of open windows, and the mingled sounds of music and laughter rang out upon the tranquil September night. Damer and I had wandered away from the house when the men left the dining-room, and had enjoyed this confidential talk as we strolled with our cigars on the broad gravel-walk by the side of the moat.

The house was almost full already. There was a Belgravian matron, with two pretty, stylish-looking daughters, a stately husband, who was a baronet and a member of Parliament, devoted to the conservative interests, and seldom opening his mouth in a conversational way except to talk politics; there were a good many young men, all more or less of the turf, turfy; and there was a county matron, with three rosy-cheeked daughters devoted to croquet. There were a clergyman and his wife, from the neighborhood—very pleasant people, with nothing stilted or unduly professional about them, both vicar and vicar's wife past masters of loose croquet, the vicar playing a severely mathematical game; and there was a young squire, of sporting tendencies, whose estate lay some forty miles off, and whose income was said to be something like fifteen thousand a year; a frank, blue-eyed young man, with a predilection for gorgeous neckties, and a loud, jolly laugh.

The Dashwoods were to arrive early next day. I heard the county people speak of them once or twice in the course of the evening with that languid tone of indulgence with which it is the fashion to talk of those who are received into a world which fancies itself above them.

"The Dashwoods visit a great deal," Mrs. Melton, the county matron, said to me. "They are received every where, though I believe he began life quite as a working-man. And people really like them. Mr. Dashwood is very fond of society, and entertains people at his own place in a most sumptuous manner. I have never been there myself, but some people like that kind of thing. Rather a florid style of hospitality, you know. These newly rich people are apt to err in that direction."

CHAPTER III.

"Fair as a star, when only one
Is shining in the sky."

I WAS curious to see Miss Dashwood, after what Hugh had told me, and was really concerned about my friend's difficulties. The book for the Leger did not inspire me with much hope, for I had a rooted abhorrence of the turf. But I did hope something from Damer's attachment to Miss Dashwood, and I thought my friend's fortunes might be mended by such a marriage without derogation to his honor. If the lady had wealth, Hugh had at least a good old name wherewith to endow her, and a position in the county which must needs be a considerable elevation for the manufacturer's daughter. It did not seem to me that the alliance would be an unequal one.

I was on the terrace, in front of the house, when the Dashwoods arrived at noon next day, and I saw the young lady alight from her carriage. She was very pretty, very graceful, and elegant too, manufacturer's daughter though she was. She was fair, with a radiant bloom and the loveliest blue eyes I ever beheld; not gray, or any one of those numerous vague tints which pass for blue, but a real azure—the perfect blue of a summer sky or a forget-me-not blossom. Nor was their color the greatest charm of Miss Dashwood's eyes. That lay in their expression —the innocent, girlish trustfulness, the sunny brightness of eyes that had never tried to hide or simulate an emotion. She was very young—eighteen, I should say, at most—and had a bewitching youthfulness and freshness of manner. I did not wonder that Hugh Damer loved her.

They came along the terrace, Miss Dashwood leaning on her father's arm, Hugh walking by her side. It was their first visit to Churleigh, and the manufacturer was eager to explore the house and grounds. Hugh lost no time in presenting me to his friends, and I accompanied them round the blooming gardens, where all the bright early autumn flowers grew luxuriantly, and through the ancient paneled rooms, and corridors and galleries lined with dingy old pictures.

Mr. Dashwood appeared delighted with every thing he saw, and exhibited no small amount of intelligence and good taste.

"Now this is the kind of thing I like," he said, heartily; "this is something like a house. A man can fancy this a home. That's the worst of a new place—let a man spend what money he will upon it, it looks only so much bricks and timber. Money won't buy the home look, and no architect knows how to give it. Now there's my house at Dedham—a very fine house in its way, I dare say; and so it ought to be, considering what it has cost me; but at its best it looks like a public institution; and I've no doubt strangers who see it from the train put it down for an asylum for idiots or lunatics, or something of that kind. It's cold and stony and cheerless, somehow, though it's warmed with hot-water pipes from garret to cellar, and there isn't a modern invention in the way of comfort or luxury that has been omitted. Yet the place gives me the shivers whenever Laura and I happen to be alone there; and I am never comfortable unless we've got a houseful of people. Now I could live in a corner of this place and feel myself snug and cozy. There's that cedar-wood parlor, for instance, with the blue-tiled fire-place—a man might spend his life there."

"You really like Churleigh, then, Mr. Dashwood?" said Hugh, smiling a little at the manufacturer's enthusiasm, but not with a joyous smile.

"Like it! I should think I do, indeed. If there were only such a place as this in the market, Dedham Park would soon be to let on lease."

"You may have Churleigh itself if you like," Hugh said, with an indifferent air. "A place nearer London would suit me much better. I should scarcely care to sell the old house to a stranger, but to a friend it's a different thing."

"What, Mr. Damer!" Laura Dashwood exclaimed, wonderingly; "you would really sell a house that has been in your family so long?"

"Why not, Miss Dashwood, if this particular member of my family doesn't happen to want it?"

"Are you in earnest, Mr. Damer?" asked George Dashwood.

"Entirely so."

"And you will sell the place as it stands—pictures and old oak cabinets, tapestries and hangings complete?"

"As it stands—with every stick and every rag."

He sighed, and his face darkened for a moment. Perhaps he was thinking that among those "rags" there were draperies which his mother's hands had embellished.

"Well, Sir," said the manufacturer, with an air of undisguised elation, "I can only say that when you have quite made up your mind to sell you have but to name your price, and George Dashwood is your purchaser. I don't think there'll be much bargaining between us."

I asked Hugh afterward what made him talk of selling Churleigh.

"Why, you see, dear boy, if things go against me in the Leger week, I should have to part with the old place, and to do it quickly, in order to meet my engagements; so I thought it would be wise to take advantage of Dashwood's fancy. Besides, if Churleigh must go, I would rather sell it to him than to any one else. There'd be a kind of mournful pleasure in fancying Laura happy in the home of my childhood—happy with a husband, perhaps, and a brood of children. I can fancy her walking in the dear old gardens, or sitting under the cedar, yonder, with the little ones at her knees—while I am a lonely, battered exile, fighting the battle of life somewhere beyond the sea. It's hard, isn't it, Fred? But it isn't inevitable yet. Who knows that the Leger won't bring me a small fortune? No man's ill luck can go on forever, and I've been losing steadily for the last two years."

"I wish you had something better than the turf to trust to for your deliverance, Hugh," I said. "I wish you would confide in Miss Dashwood's love and her father's generosity. He seems to be a man capable of taking a liberal view of things."

He shook his head gloomily.

"No, Fred; it isn't possible for a Damer to become a dependent upon his wife."

After this I heard no more of my friend's troubles. He gave himself up utterly to the delight of Laura Dashwood's society, and seemed to enjoy life with a reckless, boisterous kind of happiness in that brief ten days of bright autumnal weather—a season in which there still remained much of the warmth and glory of summer.

Churleigh was a very pleasant house to stay in—the servants numerous and well trained, the cool, shadowy gardens delicious at all times, the billiard and smoking rooms the perfection of comfort, and the old-world air of the place a perpetual soothing influence, which gave a vague, indescribable charm to every thing. But for me there was a sadness brooding over all things, and I could not but remember how speedily this fair heritage might pass into the keeping of a stranger.

Many times during those gay, idle days, for every one of which some new pleasure was devised by the master of Churleigh, I saw a cloud upon Hugh Damer's brow; but it was only a transient shadow; and however gloomy his thoughts may have been in those fitful moments of care, Laura Dashwood had the power to chase the dark shadow from the face I knew so well. Hugh's high spirits were noticed and admired by every one. It was impossible not to enjoy life in his company, people said; his gayety was infectious.

"That fellow can never have known a care in his life," one of his friends remarked to me; "and yet I never knew a man drop his money more persistently than he did last year. But then, you see, the fellow is so confoundedly rich."

We had picnics and water parties; carpet dances night after night in the long, low drawing-room, with the six French windows set wide open, and the scent of the flowers, and all the cool, dewy odors of the night wafted in upon us as we danced. We had moonlit waltzes on the lawn sometimes, when it was very pleasant to see Miss Dashwood's aerial form revolving in the strong grasp of Hugh Damer's powerful arm, and to hear her musical laughter ring out upon the still night air. What a delicious life, if it could have gone on forever!

"Yes, Fred, if it could only go on forever," Hugh said to me on the night before the first race day, as we stood together on the deserted lawn, where we had been dancing till after midnight, while the servants were extinguishing the lights in the drawing-room one by one. "But to-morrow will see the beginning of the end, I dare say, unless my luck changes. There was a time when I thought it must change—that fortune must take a sudden turn in my favor. But, somehow, as the hour draws near, I have a feeling that my fate is fixed; that there is no such thing as a turn of the tide for me; that the river of life can only drift me one way—steadily down to the dark sea of ruin!"

"That's all nonsense, old fellow," I answered, cheerily. "Mind you, I am the last of men to hope much from the fortune of the turf; but still there is no reason why you should not be a winner for once in a way."

"No reason, perhaps, Fred; but I have a rooted conviction that my ill luck will pursue me to the last. I have been too happy in that sweet girl's society—madly, recklessly happy. O God! old friend, where shall I be in a week's time?"

His tone went to my heart. I could see his face in the moonlight, deadly pale, and the lips working convulsively.

"Let the worst come to the worst, Hugh, you will face misfortune like a man. I am sure of that."

"Face it like a man! That means to drag on the remnant of one's days somehow; to turn adventurer and live by one's wits, or to descend to gentlemanly beggary and live upon one's friends. Of course it is unmanly to blow out one's brains and make a clean finish of it; and yet that's the most convenient end for one's self and society."

"For God's sake, Hugh Damer, don't let me hear you talk like that!"

"It is wicked, I suppose. But then, you see, the whole course of my life has been wicked. If my mother could have known what that life was to be when she nursed me through my childish illnesses, and prayed all night long for the passing of the danger, don't you think that she would rather I had died in her arms a child, innocent, untarnished, than that I should live to be what I am?"

"It is never too late to mend, Hugh. With such a wife as Miss Dashwood you might become as good a man as your mother ever hoped you might be in her fondest dreams of your future."

"I might—I might, with such a wife. Yes, Fred; but that is too bright a fate for me. I had my chance, and lost it. If I had known Laura Dashwood sooner, perhaps. But it's the idlest folly to talk of what might have been; and to-morrow 'makes me or unmakes me quite.' Come, light up another regalia, Fred, and we'll have no more of this dreary talk."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

A MOST touching incident is told in connection with one of the victims of the Pittston coal-mine disaster. He was a Welshman, and had been in this country about seven months. On the morning of the day of that dreadful catastrophe he had taken his breakfast as usual, and his wife prepared his dinner, and set the pail by his side. For some time he sat wrapped in thought, his arms folded, and a deep melancholy apparently brooding over him. He was aroused from his reverie by his wife telling him that his dinner was ready, and that he would be late, as the bell had rung. He started to his feet, and, gazing upon her for a moment with a look full of tenderness, said, "If I should not come back alive, would you be in such a hurry getting me out?" The wife answered "No," but remarked that "if he was going at all, it was time he was gone." He lifted his pail without saying a word, and, after kissing his wife, kissed the four little children, who were playing on the doorstep. When he had gone about fifty yards from his home he returned, and again kissed his wife and children. His wife noticed that he was the victim of the gloomiest forebodings, and was about to entreat him not to go to work if he apprehended any danger. But hope and courage and the pressing necessities of their family overcame her intention. She stood in the door, however, and watched him on his way to the fatal pit. When at the point where he turned out of her sight he paused, and, seeing his wife, waved with his hand a last adieu, and immediately disappeared. He had parted with his loved ones forever. When, later in the day, the alarm of fire was sounded, the wife remembered her husband's gloomy demeanor in the morning, and, looking out toward the flames, she exclaimed, "The West Pittston breaker is on fire, and my husband is lost!" She rushed immediately to the scene of disaster, and waited in dreadful expectancy until her husband was brought up—alive. Hope revived in her breast. But, alas! in vain were all the care and tenderness she and others could bestow. She was soon a widow, and her children fatherless.

In addition to the new and handsome railroad dépôt which has been erected at Saratoga, another improvement will be noticed at that fashionable summer resort. The public drives have been made really attractive—that to the race-course and Moon's Lake having been extended in width to one hundred and sixty feet, with double track, with three rows of trees, one being in the middle. This will doubtless be one of the most beautiful drives in the country, and will be known as the Union Avenue, or Saratoga Boulevard. A supply of pure water has also been brought into town from Excelsior Lake, a few miles distant.

There is in Maryland a manufacturing establishment which is prepared to make six thousand peach baskets a day. This indicates the expectation of plenty of peaches. Every spring the peach crop is "ruined," according to report, but about midsummer the ruins are seen in a fine state of preservation.

In connection with the new Fine Art School of University College, London, there are to be six scholarships for proficiency in drawing, painting, and sculpture; and these scholarships are open to be competed for by women. The scholarships are of the annual value of £50, and are tenable for three years. In competition the young women will be on an equal footing with the young men, and if successful will be expected to continue their studies regularly and enthusiastically.

The brother of the great Beethoven desired to distinguish himself from his lawless relative, and with some self-gratulation signed his name, on one occasion, "—— von Beethoven, Land-owner." The immortal composer retorted with, "Ludwig von Beethoven, Brain-owner."

It is estimated that the opium trade in India will net $40,000,000 next year.

The employment, with favorable results, of the new remedy for cancer—cundurango—in the case of a lady relative of one of our most distinguished and popular public men has drawn both professional and public attention strongly to the specific. It consists in a drink made by boiling the wood of a South American tree, known as the cundurango, and the circumstances of the discovery are thus narrated: An Indian laborer had suffered terribly from the insidious steps of an internal cancer, and his wife, feeling that his cure was impossible, and desiring to relieve his great agony, determined to mix a decoction of the fruit of the cundurango—which is said to be an active poison—with his food; but not having the fruit, she administered a 'ecoction of the wood itself, and to her surprise her husband began to rally. She continued the lotion from day to day, in increasing quantities, and his entire recovery was the result. Dr. Bliss, of Washington, who has given special attention to the subject, is understood to have become convinced of the valuable properties of the remedy. Other physicians are of a contrary opinion; have claimed that if it be thoroughly tried, under proper guards against illusion, its worthlessness will be demonstrated. The Interior Department has designated a ward in Columbia Hospital for the purpose of testing the new cure, while the Medical Society of the District of Columbia has appointed a commission of five physicians to apply the test. Surely all will unite in hoping that the results of the investigation may give mankind an available cure for this most terrible complaint.

One of the curiosities of nature is a wonderful cave in Decorah, Iowa, formed by a vertical fissure in the face of the cliff of limestone that is part of the bank of the Upper Iowa River. It is about one hundred feet deep, from two to eight feet wide, and varies a good deal in height. In the winter the cave is free from ice, but upon the approach of hot weather the ice begins to accumulate, and solid, hard, and dry cakes incrust the sides and bottom of the cave. When the weather is hottest the cave is most abundantly stored with ice. Such a cave would be popular in every town, and would quite monopolize the business of the ice-dealers.

The excessive mortality in all large cities of children under five years of age indicates general ignorance concerning proper nourishment, pure air, and suitable clothing for the little ones. It is one of the most important questions of the age how there can be a more universal understanding and application of the first principles of hygiene in the bringing up of the young in all classes of society. The building of spacious and well-arranged tenement-houses in salubrious localities would sensibly diminish infant mortality. Damp, close, sunless rooms sap the life from youthful veins.

One hundred keno players were arrested the other night in St. Louis. The city authorities seem determined to break up the business.

A distressing scene is reported to have occurred at a wedding in Iowa recently. After the ceremony had been solemnized the guests, about two hundred in number, partook of elegantly served refreshments. Before the close of the evening festivities the visitors, one after another, betrayed illness, until the strong suspicion arose that the company had been poisoned. The bride and groom became ill, and were taken to their room. Every physician in the city was summoned, but as many of these were at the feast, they were also ill, and unable to even properly attend to themselves. What was a few minutes before a scene of joy was changed to one of almost death-like despair. The victims were removed to their homes, and groans and moaning were heard in almost every household. The pain and sickness were almost beyond description. Within the two days following the assemblage 147 persons had undergone agonies worse almost than death, and a number of others were becoming ill. Investigation indicated that the cause of the illness was in the ingredients of the ice-cream. In freezing it the confectioner used a copper refrigerator lined with tin. When the refrigerator was afterward examined a greasy substance was found on the sides—undoubtedly verdigris. The confectioner had no idea, however, that the refrigerator had not been properly cleansed, for he partook of the ice-cream himself, and was among those who were rendered sick.

Willard's Hotel, in Washington, is to be dismantled, and the national metropolis will thereby lose one of its most noted establishments for popular accommodation. There are few hotels in the country which have a history like this one. For the last ten years it has been closely connected with the history of the country; and if its old walls and corridors would only tell one-half of what they have heard and witnessed, the volume would be indeed an interesting one. During the war it was the head-quarters of the army not in the field, and of generous contractors willing and anxious to serve their country. Pope's dispatches and orders, headed "Head-quarters in the Saddle," were written in a quiet parlor in Willard's overlooking the avenue. M'Clellan, too, cut a magnificent dash there for some time. His body-guard was the most splendid array that American general ever had. Fifty or a hundred men, mounted on coal-black horses, composed it while he was in Washington; and the sight of them, drawn up around the hotel, with flashing swords, formed a scene not easily forgotten. An enormous fortune was made at Willard's during the war by the gentlemen by whom it was conducted; but lately, as the lease under which it was held drew to a close, it has fallen into an inferior condition, and into consequent unpopularity.

One of the most successful agents for the preservation of meat is paraffine. It melts at the low temperature of 110° Fahr., and hence articles of food can be immersed in a bath of the melted paraffine, and thus covered with a coating impervious to air and nearly all re-agents. Pure paraffine resembles spermaceti, is free from odor and taste, and is one of the most stable substances known.

The Parisians consider it an important and significant fact that "Punch and Judy" has reappeared in their city.

The police officers of Versailles have received a most curious album. It is the complete series of the photographic portraits of the members of the Commune, and of all the leaders of the revolt. Each portrait is accompanied by a most detailed signalement. It is asserted that a copy of this album has been sent to all the commissaries of police round Paris, and to the officers detached with the staffs by the "Grand Provost."

What will come next? The "best imitation" of real hair is said to be now made from linen thread. It appears that hair can be made from almost any thing.

Prussia is avowedly the country where regular revaccination is most generally practiced, the law making the precaution obligatory on every person, and the authorities conscientiously watching over its performance. As a natural result, cases of small-pox are very rare. It has, however, been objected there, as here, that lymph is scarce. To make the most of such lymph as there is, government has tried its application mixed with glycerine, and the result has been so successful as to lead to a public recommendation of the mixture to official vaccinating surgeons.

While every trade in Paris has been almost annihilated during the war, that of spurious autographs seems, on the contrary, to have considerably increased, and a regular commerce is being carried on in "original" letters purporting to be in the handwriting of the Emperor Napoleon, or of the Empress Eugénie, or Prince Napoleon. These are distributed all over Germany, and eagerly bought up by collectors to serve as illustrations of French history previous to the war. A large bundle of these letters and documents, which had found their way to Brussels, has been intrusted for examination as to their authenticity to the Abbé Michon, the greatest connoisseur in handwriting now in existence.

Taking for a text, "He never spoke an unkind word to his wife," an exchange remarks: Do the doctors know that half the wives in the world die of negative kindness? "He never spoke an unkind word to his wife." Yes, but did he remember, now and then, to speak a kind one? Did he have any sympathy for her bodily or mental ails? Or was he blind and deaf to both, treating them with that cutting indifference which in time chills the most loving heart, and silences its throbs forever?

It is not often that wild beasts fall into the hands of dentists. But an unfortunate lion has just had a troublesome tooth extracted by a professional man of Glasgow. We should think, however, that the dentist to whom such a task was assigned was the more unfortunate creature of the two. In this case the patient was well lassoed. When he was somewhat exhausted by struggles to free himself, the doctor mounted on a tub in front of the cage. A piece of wood was placed to the lion's mouth, and at once the beast made a snap. Then a pitchfork was held up, and, placed in the mouth, kept it open, while the inside was thoroughly washed. Afterward the doctor, pushing his arm between the bars into the lion's mouth, and running his hand over the teeth, found the loose grinder. A terrible struggle ensued. The lion plunged more vigorously and howled more frightfully than ever, tossing his head from side to side, and at times forcing his hinder as well as his front paws against the bars. But ultimately the doctor triumphed over all difficulties and dangers, and by means of powerful forceps extracted the loose tooth, which was found broken and diseased near the root. When the task had been completed the lion sank down completely exhausted, and while he lay steady and quiet the doctor cut the flesh over the jaw, and found the bone severely injured, if not broken. It was, however, deemed inexpedient to subject the beast to another operation.

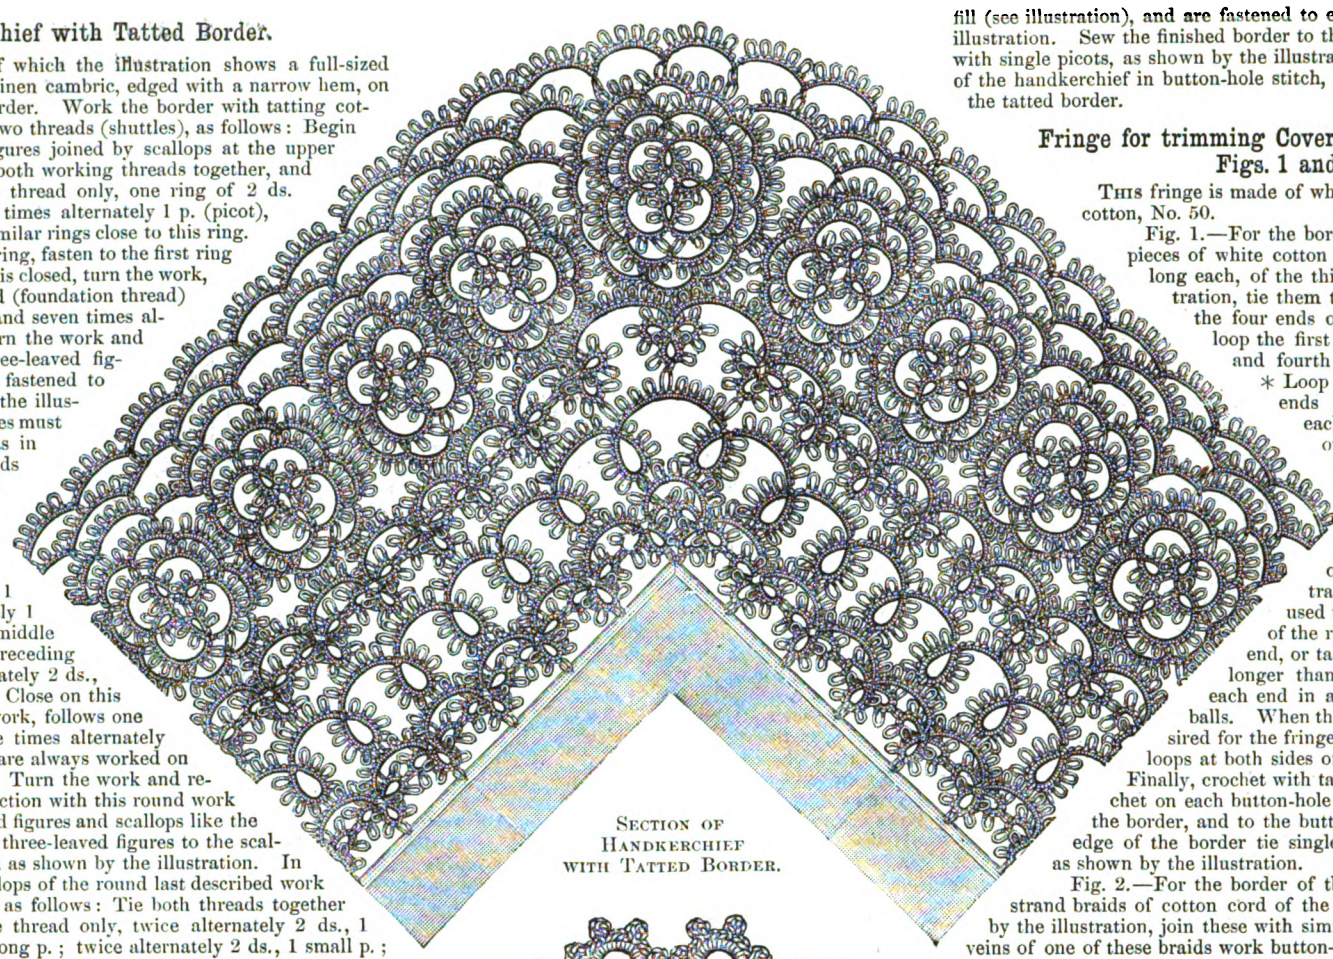
Handkerchief with Tatted Border.

THIS handkerchief, of which the illustration shows a full-sized section, is made of fine linen cambric, edged with a narrow hem, on which is set a tatted border. Work the border with tatting cotton, No. 120, and with two threads (shuttles), as follows: Begin with the three-leaved figures joined by scallops at the upper edge of the border, tie both working threads together, and work, first, ∗ with one thread only, one ring of 2 ds. (double stitch), and five times alternately 1 p. (picot), 2 ds.; work two more similar rings close to this ring. After working the third ring, fasten to the first ring where its row of stitches is closed, turn the work, and on the second thread (foundation thread) work a scallop of 2 ds. and seven times alternately 1 p., 2 ds.; turn the work and repeat from ∗; the three-leaved figures, however, must be fastened to each other as shown by the illustration. The corner figures must also be formed in this, as in each of the following rounds of the border, as shown by the illustration. To do this, tie both working threads together, ∗ work, first, with one thread only, one ring of 1 ds., four times alternately 1 p., 2 ds.; fasten to the middle p. of a scallop of the preceding round, four times alternately 2 ds., 1 p.; then one more ds. Close on this ring, after turning the work, follows one scallop of 2 ds. and five times alternately 1 p., 2 ds. (the scallops are always worked on the foundation thread). Turn the work and repeat from ∗. In connection with this round work one round of three-leaved figures and scallops like the first round. Fasten the three-leaved figures to the scallops of the second round as shown by the illustration. In connection with the scallops of the round last described work a row of single rosettes as follows: Tie both threads together and first work, with one thread only, twice alternately 2 ds., 1 small p., then 2 ds., 1 long p.; twice alternately 2 ds., 1 small p.; fill (see illustration), and are fastened to each other as shown by the illustration. Sew the finished border to the hem of the handkerchief with single picots, as shown by the illustration, or else work the edge of the handkerchief in button-hole stitch, at the same time fastening the tatted border.



SECTION OF HANDKERCHIEF WITH TATTED BORDER.

Fringe for trimming Coverlets, Curtains, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS fringe is made of white cotton cord and tatting cotton, No. 50.

Fig. 1.—For the border of this fringe take two pieces of white cotton cord two yards and a half long each, of the thickness shown by the illustration, tie them together in the middle, lay the four ends of cord flatly together, and loop the first and third and the second and fourth ends around each other. ∗ Loop one (the middle) of the two ends previously wound around each other around the outer of the other two ends, then loop the other two ends also around each other, and repeat from ∗. The two middle cords must always cross each other as shown by the illustration. When the cord is used up, sew a new piece of cord of the requisite length to each cord end, or take two pieces of cord much longer than those described, wind up each end in a ball, and work with these balls. When the border is of the length desired for the fringe, work a row of button-hole loops at both sides of the border with the cord. Finally, crochet with tatting cotton one single crochet on each button-hole loop on the upper edge of the border, and to the button-hole loops at the under edge of the border tie single strands of tatting cotton as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—For the border of this fringe make two three-strand braids of cotton cord of the requisite length, as shown by the illustration, join these with similar cord, and on the outer veins of one of these braids work button-hole loops of cord. Then finally, 2 ds. Close these stitches in a ring, turn the work, and make on the foundation thread one scallop of 2 ds., and seven times alternately 1 p., 2 ds.; close to this three times more alternately one ring, one scallop, as before. In working each ring, however, instead of forming the long p., fasten to the long p. of the first ring. After working the fourth scallop, fasten the working threads to the first ring at the place where the row of stitches is closed, tie them together and cut them off. Now tie both threads together again, and fasten to the middle p. of the nearest of the scallops just worked; then work one scallop with both threads of 1 ds., four times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then 1 more p., 1 ds.; ∗ fasten the working threads to the last p. of the scallop of the preceding round before referred to, and at the same time to the first p. of the following scallop, so that both p. are held together (see illustration). Work a scallop as before, fasten to the middle p. of the scallop of the preceding round last referred to, work another scallop, and repeat from ∗. At the end of the round fasten the working threads to the same p. as at the beginning of the round, tie them together and cut them off. In working the last round of each rosette, fasten the latter to each other as shown by the illustration, and to the scallops of the third round of the border. Finally, work in connection with the rosettes three rounds more of alternated scallops as shown by the illustration; these scallops count more or less double knots and p., according to the intervals which they are to crochet with tatting cotton on each outer vein of the upper braid (upper edge of the border) three single crochet, and to each button-hole loop at the under edge of the border tie a strand of tatting cotton (see illustration).

Crochet Rosette for Covers, Lingerie, etc.

THIS rosette may be used for trimming lingerie or for setting covers together, according to the size of the cotton used in working it. The original is crocheted with tatting cotton, No. 60. Begin the rosette at the middle with a foundation of 3 st. (stitches), close this in a ring with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and on it work three rounds of sc. (single crochet), widening in such a manner that the crochet part neither fulls up nor puckers. At the end of the third round work 1 sl.; this round must count 24 stitches including the sl. referred to. 4th round.—1 dc. (double crochet) on each st. of the preceding round (instead of the first dc., work three chain stitches), after each dc. 1 ch. (chain stitch) follows. At the end of the round work 1 sl. on the third of the 3 ch., which counted as first dc. 5th round.—1 sc. on the first ch. of the preceding round, 21 ch. (the first four of the latter count as short treble crochet), 3 sl. on the 7th, 6th, and 5th of the 21 ch. (counting from the beginning), this forms a ch. loop. Then work ∗ 2 ch., 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the next ch. of the preceding round, 2 ch., 1 stc. on the following ch., 17 ch., and, going backward, 3 sl. on the first three of the 17 ch., so that a ch. loop is again formed. Repeat from . Finally, fasten to the fourth of the 21 ch. worked at the beginning of the round with 1 sl. 6th round.— 3 sc. on the first 3 ch. of the next loop (these are the same 3 ch. on which the 3 sl. have previously been worked), 18 sc. on the following 14 ch., but after working the 3d, 6th, 9th, 12th, and 15th sc., work one picot of 4 ch. and 1 sl. on the last worked sc.; besides this, after working the 16th sc., work 1 stc. on the 7th ch. of the following loop (the first 3 ch. of the loop on which the 3 sl. have been crocheted are also counted). After working the 18th sc., work 3 sc. on the next 3 sl. of the preceding round, then 3 sc. on each of the next two ch. scallops. Repeat from *. At the end of the round fasten to the first st. of the same round with 1 sl.; fasten the thread and cut it off. If the rosettes are to be joined, work smaller square-like rosettes to fill the free spaces between the rosettes sewed together, as follows: 6 ch., one picot of 4 ch. and 1 sl. in the first of the 4 ch., 2 ch., 1 dc. on the first of the 6 ch., then again twice alternately one scallop of 2 ch., 1 p., and 2 ch., 1 dc. on the first of the 6 ch.; now one scallop again as before, 1 sl. on the fourth of the 6 ch. worked at the beginning of the rosette (counting from the beginning). 2d round.—3 ch., which count as 1 dc., three times alternately one scallop of 9 ch., 1 dc. on the following dc. of the preceding round; finally, 9 ch., and fasten to the third of the 3 ch. worked at the beginning of the round with 1 sl. 3d round.—12 sc. on each scallop of 9 ch.; after the 3d, 6th, and 9th sc. of each scallop always 1 p. of 4 ch. and 1 sl. on the sc. previously worked. This completes the rosette. The rosettes may be set together for tidies.

AND FEATHERS. The front hair is arranged over crêpes; it is combed upward at the middle of the front, while at the sides it rests on the forehead, as shown by the illustration. The chignon is formed of puffs, curls pinned on, and three-strand braids (see Fig. 2). The head-dress is made of wide red velvet ribbon, white ostrich feathers, and coarse gold cord. Tortoise-shell side-combs.

Figs. 3 and 4.—BRAIDED CHIGNON. The front hair is partly combed upward over crêpes at the sides, and partly tied in a knot as shown by the illustration; this knot rests on a crimped strand of hair, which is set on like a diadem. Chignon of three-strand braids, arranged as shown by Fig. 4.

Fig. 5.—CRIMPED CHIGNON WITH CURLS. The crimped back hair is combed up over crêpes. Several short curls fall on the forehead. The crimped back hair is arranged in a chignon, over which fall a bunch of curls of different lengths. One long curl falls at the left side.

Fig. 6.—PUFFED CHIGNON WITH CURLS. The crimped front hair is parted in the middle and falls over the forehead. The ends are arranged with the back hair in puffs and a knot. Several curls fall at the left side.

Fig. 7.—CHIGNON IN PUFFS AND BOWS. The chignon consists of several bows of hair arranged over crêpes. The crimped front hair is combed upward as shown by the illustration; at the middle of the front several short puffs are pinned on, which are edged by a longer puff set on crosswise (see illustration).

Figs. 8 and 9.—ROPED CHIGNON. The crimped front hair is arranged over crêpes, and falls over the forehead at the front, while at the sides it is combed back. The back hair is parted in the middle; each half is parted, together with the ends of the front hair, in two strands of equal thickness, which are then wound loosely around each other. These roped strands are crossed at the middle of the back, and wound around the head like a wreath, so as to fall loosely on the neck, as shown by Fig. 9. They also cover the place where a chignon is pinned on. This chignon consists of a bandeau of crimped hair passed through a tortoise-shell comb, as seen by the illustration.

Medallions for Cigar-Cases, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 424.

THESE medallions, in application, satin, point Russe, and knotted stitch, are worked on a foundation of silk, satin, velvet, or leather, with coarse or fine silk of various colors. The illustrations show the manner of executing the embroidery.

Cover for Prayer-Books, Bibles, etc.

See illustration on page 424.

THIS cover is made of violet gros grain and velvet, and is ornamented in silver and satin stitch embroidery with violet saddler's silk. If the embroidery is desired for the cover of a larger book, enlarge the foundation all around. The embroidery may be worked either on both or one cover. Cut both parts of the cover and the back in one piece of violet gros grain of the requisite size, paste the velvet on this part with gum arabic, as shown by the illustration (the velvet is cut for both parts of the cover in one piece, and extends along the back of the book), and transfer the design to the foundation. The leaves, stems, and vines are worked in satin and half-polka stitch with silver thread, the blossoms partly with silver bullion and partly with silver thread in satin stitch, half-polka stitch, and point Russe. The darker point Russe stitches which surround the corolla of the blossoms are worked with violet saddler's silk, as are also the darker leaves and stems of the middle design figure. Instead of silver thread and silver bullion, gold thread and gold bullion may be used. Directions for gold and silver embroidery are given in Harper's Bazar, No. 29, Vol. II.

WHERE THERE'S A WILL THERE'S A WAY.

ON a tour round the northwest coast of Ireland, through districts unknown to me, and where I was unknown, I met with a striking instance of the double readiness often found in the poorer peasantry—readiness of will, and ingenious readiness to find a way to carry out that will when means seem to be wanting.

The following amusing adventure occurred to me in another part of Ireland. A car was hired to carry four passengers, one of whom was a very large, heavy man. The driver, on helping him up on the side of the Irish car, said, "Sir, plase to sit aisy on this side, for she has a tinder spring." Every thing that has wheels is "she"—a mill, a watch, a carriage, etc.

But to return to our tour. In a wild, mountainous part one of our springs suddenly gave way, which, indeed, did not imply any tinderness in the said member of our vehicle, for the occasion fully justified the breach. But this was little comfort to a party, chiefly ladies, miles from a forge or from any place where one could hope for means to repair.

A close inspection of the mountain-sides revealed at last a cabin built of turf, roofed with heather, about a quarter of a mile off.

Little as I could hope to find there, I had no better way than to trudge across the intervening bog to this habitation. There was no one there except a young woman and three or four little children. On hearing of our misfortune she sympathized heartily in the hopelessness of our condition. "For," said she, "what would we have here that would help the likes?" I said if we had a cord and a piece of wood we could tie up the spring, so as to get on to our journey's end. "But," she said, "for bits of wood, sure there's not a scarcer article in this place. There's not a bush, let alone a tree, for miles, and not a cord I have in the world." Looking up as she said this, her eye glistened joyfully, and she cried out, "And why would I tell a lie? Sure enough I have a cord for you;" and suiting her action to her word, she seized a knife, and with a spring cut a line that stretched across the cabin, which was hung with two or three articles of dress drying.

"There now," said she, "there's half the work; maybe we'll make off the rest too." So, encouraged by her success, she cast her eyes about, saying, "A bit of wood; oh, a bit of wood?" Suddenly she shouted, "Ay!" and turning up the one chair in the house, she with her naked heel thrust out the crazy wooden seat, and held up one of the little boards of which it was made, shouting, "There it's."

At this moment a man came in, and looking with bewilderment at his wife, cried, "Jinny, woman, is it mad ye are, dear? What are ye at, woman, tearing and smashing?"

"No, dear, I am n't mad, but just getting the gentleman a bit of wood to mend his carriage."

I explained; and he said, "Ogh, Jinny, you're a foolish woman; sure that bit of old dale wood wouldn't hold over the first big jog on the road. It's oak it 'll take to hold it."

"And where would I get oak wood?" replied she. "Sure if I had it I'd give it with all the joy in life."

"Where would you get it," said he, "but where it's to be had?" and before I could stop him he had taken hold of a little barrel, half full of butter, and he tore a stave out of the side. It was exactly the thing, but I could not but be sorry to see the little vessel they were filling for market thus broken. The wife cried out, "Oh!" which he echoed before I could speak, adding, "Oh, Jinny, sure Tim the cooper will be here to-morrow to make some tubs for the wee still-house" (where illicit whisky is made), "and he'll clap in a stave in no time at all. Come, your honor, and we'll see what we can do."

I staid behind to give the woman some money, but she drew back and said, "What's that for?" and on my representing to her what I meant, she exclaimed, "What! wouldn't you give that much help to a creature in such black need without you'd be paid for it? No, thank you, Sir."

It was said with dignity, and I could only heartily thank her.

The man handily helped to bind up the broken spring, which carried us two days' rough traveling. He was as steady as the wife in repulsing any gift more than hearty thanks.

ANACREONTIC.

OH, if my love offended me,
And we had words together,
To show her I would master be,
I'd whip her with a feather!

If then she, like a naughty girl,
Would tyranny declare it,
I'd give my love a cross of pearl,
And make her always bear it!

If still she tried to sulk and sigh,
And threw away my posies,
I'd catch my darling on the sly,
And smother her with roses!

But should she clinch her dimpled fists,
Or contradict her betters,
I'd manacle her tiny wrists
With dainty golden fetters!

And if she dared her lips to pout,
Like many pert young misses,
I'd wind my arm her waist about,
And punish her with kisses!

A VERY NATURAL FLOWER.

WHEN Marian Kane asked me to go to St. Bo's with her, and spend a day at her sister's house, I said, "Yes, with all my heart." And then it came over me, with a kind of mental shiver, that I had nothing to wear under the eyes of a person so intensely fashionable as Mrs. Ayr.

"Oh, I know that look," said Marian; "it means old clothes. I've seen it before on your face. Julian Ayr saw you in church, and said you had the head of the Queen of Sheba; so you ought to be satisfied, and not hanker after her dresses too."

"There's no comfort in looking like a queen if one can not have the purple and fine linen. You will have to go without me," I said, hopelessly, as the difficulties began to heap themselves more and more in my way as I thought of them.

"But you accepted my invitation."

"The spirit is willing enough, but the gloves and boots and hat are weak."

"Never mind; you could not pay my sister a greater compliment than to dress your plainest, and let her look prettier than you do."

Then Marian took her elbows off the gate, where she had been arguing the matter, and went her way.

When I went in mother was poring over one of my father's old sermons. She says there are none like them preached in these days. When I told her my troubles she said the sermon just fitted my case. The text was Agur's petition, "Give me neither poverty nor riches," and the application was very hard on unreasonable desires.

"I know it has been the fashion in all ages to admire that prayer in theory," I said, desperately; "but I can sympathize better with that poor creature who prayed 'for food and raiment—and pretty good clothes.' I really think that two-thirds of my waking thoughts have been given to my clothes since I can remember. I never could sit or walk naturally for fear of exposing a patch or a darn, or a breadth that was upside down."

Seeing my reckless state of mind, mother came speedily down from the heights to which the sermon had raised her, and began to calculate ways and means for accomplishing my journey to St. Bo's. She has amazing "faculty"—which means a talent for making something out of nothing.

"There's that black silk that the parish gave me while your dear father was alive. I've always meant you to have it." I went up stairs to get it, and the clouds began to show a silver lining directly.

It was a black silk of the deadest sort, and proved none the worse for its long imprisonment in a dark closet. Mother is "a fine figure of a woman," as Joe Gargery would have said, and a complete suit was soon educed from its many breadths. We trimmed it with folds made from a black satin bonnet (of the era when a bonnet was worthy of the name) nearly as good as new, and a vest of the same material that my father wore at his wedding. The two matched so well that it was almost a special providence. How that bonnet did hold out—the widow's cruse of oil was nothing to it!—and the vest, too; only the pockets rather interfered.

If one is doomed to a single gown, by all means let it be black silk; it satisfies attention, but does not challenge it. Mine was very pretty when it was done, albeit no dress-maker had touched it. So far as the dress was concerned, my soul had rest.

My summer hat had been a sort of sundown, bought for use, without more than half an eye to ornament. Clearly it would not do for St. Bo's; so mother bought a frame, and retired with it into the best room. I had no misgivings, and sat on the front-door step reading "Lothair" (I like to read about fearfully rich people, who have no use for "faculty") till she should come out again.

"Will it do?" said mother, holding up the hat, which she had fashioned out of inspiration and a bit of Swiss muslin.

"It's lovely as far as it goes," I said, as gratefully as I could.

"How much farther would you like it to go?"

"Oh, I don't know. Perhaps as far as a bunch of moss-rose buds that I saw in Miss Stiffen's window; but you certainly were a milliner in some previous state of existence. I wonder if there was much to choose between that and being a poor minister's wife in this."

"Speaking of the flower," said mother (and shutting me up with a tender smile that she kept for my father's memory), "it is probably too dear for us, and the hat will look better absolutely plain than with a cheap flower."

"Oh dear, yes; they will think I am a Quakeress, or a Sister of Charity; but what am I to do for gloves? I have only the white cotton ones that have been washed twice."

Mother went to her china cupboard (it was too small to be called a closet), and reaching far into it, took a dingy-looking bill out of the tea-pot.

"You haven't found Captain Kidd's treasure, have you, mother?"

"No, it's a little money that I have been saving for a rainy day."

"But this will be spending it on a fair day."

"Never mind; a lady's gloves are her centre of dress. You had better buy pearl-color."

I went out later and bought the gloves, and they fitted so perfectly that I became almost reconciled to the severe simplicity of the hat; but it certainly did look more like an old lady's morning cap than any thing else. I picked a few cinnamon roses and stuck them in for a minute, and even that was better than nothing; but cinnamon roses soon fade, and the least little wilt about the edges would betray them. In the small hours of the night it occurred to me to use a spray of lilies of the valley, which Marian Kane had given me when she learned to make wax-flowers; and so soothing was this bright idea that I knew nothing more till mother waked me in time for the early train.

Marian Kane looked lovely in a dark blue silk suit, and a blue hat with a long feather that matched it perfectly, and brought out the shining gold-color of a great bunch of curls on the back of her head. When she told me the price of those curls it almost took my breath away: it would have clothed me from head to foot for half a year at least. I had only two big braids of brown hair that went round my head twice; but, such as they were, they had never grown on any head but my own. I had been very proud of them before the fashion came about of wearing such heaps of false hair; and then, of course, my glory was tarnished, because every one seemed to share it.

Marian's looked as if it were cut out of whole cloth, with plenty left; indeed, her father had so much money that he scarcely knew what to do with it; while mother and I lived on a property so small that the interest of it was scarcely visible to the naked eye.

"Mother," I whispered at the last minute, "do I look skimped, after all? Do you see old bonnet and vest written all over me? If you 'make believe very much,' perhaps you could pass a disinterested judgment on me for once—that is, see me as others do."

"I love you too much for that," said mother. "Here is your hat."

"Oh, how perfect! where did you get it?"

"Look close," said mother, under her breath. Shaded a little by a fold of lace there lay on the front of the hat a glorious japonica half bloomed out, with its red heart plainly seen, and bedded on two broad satiny-green leaves.

Mother had cut it off, the only one on her plant; and she had even taken the precaution to put a wire through the brittle stem, as the florists do.

She had watched that bud as if it had been a baby, and now to sacrifice it to my vanity! Why did not Sancho Panza bless the man that invented mothers!

I made a rush at her, but she evaded me. "Remember that you have on your best gown, and it is old-fashioned to be demonstrative."

"What are you thinking of?" said Marian, as mother looked from her to me with an amused smile.

"Only this: Ethel and I have been working hard for a week to make ready for one day. I hope when she comes home to-night the day will have paid her for it. Her father always quoted a bit of Latin at such times; it meant, in English, 'The mountain travailed and brought forth—a mouse.'"

"It may be the great day of my life," I said, as we shut the gate. "I am going to seek my fortune."

Mother sent after me some sort of a "God-speed," but I was too far off to hear it.

"You do look wonderfully nice," said Marian, in her warm-hearted way. "And where under the canopy did your mother find that splendid flower? I would give half my kingdom if I could wear scarlet things; but I can only range from indigo to violet."

She bent over the hat for half a second, and I thought she would read the flower's secret; but happily the lace deluded her. The day was intensely warm; but nothing can dry the dew of youth. I had been in St. Bo's before on shopping raids; but now there were no bundles to look after, and no reiterated disappointments because the prettiest things always cost the most.

Now I was to spend a whole day in a brown-stone house, on a broad street, with a grassy little park and fountain in it. Mrs. Ayr was to me rather an awful person, who wore her hair always crimped and curled and braided as if life were a perpetual party to her, and all her dresses were best dresses. She came down to us when we had been shown into a parlor subdued to a "dim religious light" with three sets of curtains. She wore a white piqué wrapper ("braided to death," Marian said), and a Roman sash that to me would have been a joy forever. She was much less formidable in her own house, or possibly my own consciousness of being well dressed upheld me; but her little girl was too fearfully and wonderfully arrayed to be rashly spoken to; her long wavy hair and the dozen infinitesimal ruffles on her tiny skirt removed her out of the pale of childhood.

"Don't climb into that chair, Natalie," said Mrs. Ayr, sharply.

"It's a new one, isn't it?" asked Marian.

"Yes; Mr. Ayr bought two of them at an auction of famous old furniture. That one and the one Miss Ethel is in came out of the boudoir of Marie Antoinette, a queen of—of France, I think. I don't exactly remember what she was famous for. I haven't had time to look it up in the history."

I started up as if I had been sitting on an altar without knowing it. If I saw "only this and nothing more," it was worth coming to St. Bo's for. The very chair on which the loveliest and most ill-used of women may have thrown herself to collect her thoughts, and brace her courage for the imprisonment which was to end in a shameful death!

"You are quite pale," said Mrs. Ayr. "I assure you her ghost has not appeared to us yet. Perhaps you can tell me her story: I have so little time to look into books."

I told her the history as well as I could, and she thanked me gracefully, and forgot it within five minutes, I have no doubt.

Then it was time for luncheon, and I knew at once why Mrs. Ayr had no time to read. I could not but fall in love with the amber-colored cloth, the creamy chocolate, the dainty perfection of the food, and the silent deftness of the girl who waited. Mrs. Ayr was a perfect housekeeper. Almost all that chapter about the virtuous woman, expounded to the prophet Lemuel by his mother, would apply to her. Doubtless her husband's heart rested in her, and every button was in its right place when he sat in the gates; but, after all, what was the use of buying chairs out of Marie Antoinette's boudoir for a wife who never found time to learn what she was famous for?

Of course I did not say these ungrateful things to my hostess, nor even to Marian. I only pondered them in my heart.

In the afternoon Mrs. Ayr took us to drive in her barouche, and I sat on the back seat with her, because I was the greater stranger. Her multitudinous ruffles hid my skirts entirely, but I was willing to be only a bust for the time. Once she frightened me by putting on her eye-glass to look at my japonica (but I fancied she could see better without the glass). She said it must have come from Paris, it was so perfect. I could not be too thankful that I had not put in the wax-flowers, for the heat was intense, and would certainly have melted the lilies and leaves into one greenish lump. When we returned it was nearly time for our train, if we were to go home that night. We went in to say last words, and at the same moment Natalie Ayr leaned too far over the stair-rail to welcome us, and fell sheer down a good many feet, striking the lowest stair with a terrible thud. The poor little thing was stunned for an instant, and hung limp on Marian's arm. "She's dead," screamed Mrs. Ayr, and fainted away; for which absurdity I could have beaten her, and I fear I did pour on water very much as if she were a house on fire.

Natalie came to consciousness before her mother, and told us where to go for the family physician.

When I came back with him Mrs. Ayr begged me piteously to go for her husband. It was a hard thing to ask of a girl utterly strange to the city streets. If she had prefaced it by the slightest apology, I could not have had courage enough to go, but she was perfectly certain that no necessity could be like hers. Marian must hold the child while she bemoaned herself; and I was to take a horse-car which would take me nearly to No. 13 Babel Street, where was Mr. Ayr's office. It was all plain sailing till I found myself in a big building, with long corridors and many doors, and the doors stood open, so that it was often difficult to read the names without being stared at unmercifully. At last it was "J. & J. Ayr," and I went in, full of courage.

A young man sat at a desk writing, and was not at all in a hurry to look up. "Is Mr. Ayr in?" I asked, meekly, for my courage, like Bob Acres's, had oozed out of my fingers' ends before I had crossed the room.

"Yes."

"Can I see him?" still more meekly.

Then he looked at me for the first time, and offered his chair with a politeness that was more overwhelming than his neglect.

"I am Mr. Ayr," he said, with a bow so graceful that I felt myself growing more countrified every minute.

"But you can not be Mr. John Ayr. I want to see him."

"Why not?"

"Because he is married, and—"

"How can you tell that I am not married, unless you have second-sight?"

He was the handsomest man I had ever seen. I could have stood there talking nonsense to him forever, but this was not my errand.

"Mr. Ayr's little girl has had a dreadful fall, and he is very much wanted at home."

"Poor little Natalie! What an unlucky baby she is! Her father is gone out of town for the afternoon. If you will take a seat here for half an hour I will go back with you to my brother's house. The way is rather blind."

"Oh no, thank you; I won't trouble you;" and I went out quickly. I must have turned the wrong way at the very door, for I came round to the same building after a long detour, and was covered with confusion to meet Mr. Ayr just coming out.

"So you came back, after all. I knew you would get lost. You have the look of being easily bewildered in a crowd, and you would not dare for your life to ask any stranger to direct you."

"You are mistaken, because I asked two people to show me the way."

"One, I've no doubt, was a blind man holding out shoe-strings, and the other a child as innocent as yourself. You have a rare capacity for getting lost. I see it in your face."

"Just as I saw that you were not married."

"But are you certain you did see it? Remember, I have not confirmed your guess. There may be, this minute, a little woman sitting in her bay-window straining her eyes for my coming."

"I can not imagine her."

"I have imagined her often. But how these people knock you about! Take my arm, and you will get on much more easily."

It was very smooth sailing after that, and the walk grew delightful.

"Are you in a hurry?" he said, as we paused before the window of a picture-shop. "Mrs. Ayr must have reached the comfortable stage of her hysterics by this time, and Marian will manage her better without you. Let us go in and see the pictures."

"If you are sure that the 'little woman in the bay-window' will not be angry."

"I will answer for her. Whatever other qualities she has, I have always imagined her with a saintly temper."

And so we strolled from picture to picture, and a wonderfully short half hour was gone before I knew it.

"Oh, I am sure we ought to go on our way now," I said.

"I am very willing to go on our way," said Mr. Ayr, with a lingering glance, that the "little woman in the bay-window," if she had existed in the flesh, would certainly have resented.

It was wonderful how fast we got on toward friendship in that long summer afternoon. As we sat together in the horse-car, still in a crowd, I ventured to look sideways at him once or twice, to read what manner of man he was.

"Well," he said, turning sharp round in the midst of my scrutiny, "what do you make of it?"

I felt myself blush vividly.

"You have no idea what a brilliant reflection is cast on your cheek by the flower in your hat," he went on.

When I stepped off the car it started too soon, and I fell forward on the hand that he put out to assist me; but it was a strong hand, and easily kept me from falling further. As I recovered myself two petals of the japonica fell on his sleeve. He looked at them curiously, and rubbed them between thumb and finger.

"That is the most natural flower I ever saw worn," he said, with a comical glance at my disturbed face. I knew I must make a clean breast of it now, for my secret was betrayed at last.

"Oh, Mr. Ayr, please don't tell any one. Marian and her sister both think it is artificial. The hat was so plain, you know; and when Marian asked me to come here with her I had no time to buy a flower—I mean I could not afford one—and so mother put on the japonica and shaded it with the lace, just for one day."

"You did not propose to delude any body, only you wanted to look pretty for one day?"

"Yes. I know it was silly, but don't ridicule it before Mrs. Ayr."

"Not for worlds; your secret is safe with me. The flower is not more natural than the little girl who wears it."

He said this as we were going up the steps, and Mrs. Ayr received us with effusion. The doctor had been there and gone, and Natalie's hurt was trifling. I could not see Mrs. Ayr with her brother-in-law and Marian five minutes without perceiving that she had it strongly in mind to bring about a match between them. I must have been very tired and excited by the day's adventures, for her efforts to interest them in each other exasperated me to the last degree. Marian herself was not in the plot. Her manner to Mr. Ayr was perfectly easy and genial.

"Julian, did you ever see so becoming a suit as Marian's?" said Mrs. Ayr when Marian was out of the room for a moment.

"Not more than one or two, I think;" and he gave a mere suspicion of a glance at me. "But, do you know, Marian somehow reminded me of one of those little books bound in blue and gold that Brummell & Hunt used to publish; the blue suit for the covers, and the golden curls for the gilt scroll-work on the back."

"I am not sure that you mean to be complimentary," said Mrs. Ayr.

"Neither am I, but Marian will give me the benefit of the doubt."

"We are to stay here all night, and go home in the morning," said Marian, coming into the room.

"I shall be very happy," I said, trying to be simply polite, with a thrill of delight at the idea of seeing more of Mr. Ayr.

Then my eyes fell on that unlucky hat. If two petals had fallen out of the japonica already, what would be left of it in the morning? My vanity would find me out at last, and how utterly disgusted Mrs. Ayr would look, after committing herself to its Parisian origin!

"I'm afraid my mother will expect me," I stammered. "If there is a night train I believe I ought to go home."

"Don't let her go, I beg," said Mr. Ayr. "If you do, the consequences will never cease to haunt you. She has been lost once already this afternoon."

I took up my hat, with the least little beseeching look at Mr. Ayr not to oppose my going. He answered it with a smile that might mean a dozen things, but not one in favor of my departure.

He went away in a few minutes, promising to come again in the evening.

"Don't fail to come," urged Mrs. Ayr; "'tis so seldom we have Marian with us."

He smiled again, with a little lift in his eyebrows; and then Marian took me up to the exquisite room in which we were to sleep.

Mrs. Ayr was certainly a wonderful housekeeper, but I fancied that Mr. Julian Ayr would prefer a wife whose soul sometimes rose above the embroidery on her pillow-shams.

"How do you like him?" said Marian, eagerly.

"Pretty well," I said, stooping to unbutton my boots.

"Only pretty well! I thought he would be precisely the man that you would rave over."

"Did you?"

"Indeed I did. I meant you should meet him some time at our house. I wonder what would suit you if he is not handsome and good enough?"

"Mrs. Ayr seems anxious that he should suit you."

"Oh, I know. One can always read her like an open book. But Julian and I have talked it all over; and when I run away with my true-love—as I believe I shall be forced to do, sooner or later—she will disinherit me for a year at least."

This was a blessed relief to my foolish heart, and I looked twenty questions at least at Marian.

"Your face is just the shape of an interrogation point," she said; "but Julian Ayr is not the answer to it. If you hadn't said 'pretty well' with such pretense of indifference when I asked you how you liked him, you should have had my secret."

Then she went down stairs, and left me to dream a little dream by myself. Mr. Ayr came again soon after the tedious dinner had dragged itself away, and brightened us all with his light-hearted way of making talk.

Late in the evening he declared that the moonlight was irresistible, and Marian and I must walk out with him, if only for a few blocks.

Mrs. Ayr favored the idea warmly, only asking me, with solicitude, if I were not too tired by my afternoon adventure. Tired! On the contrary, I felt as if wings had suddenly sprouted out of my heels, like the little statue of Mercury on the centre-table.

Not that the moonlight was quite what Mr. Ayr's fancy had pictured it; in fact, I don't think we saw the moon at all. We walked up and down, talking a little, but oftener silent, and once or twice I am sure Mr. Ayr gave the hand that rested in his arm the faintest possible pressure.

When we came back Marian ran up the steps, and pretended to fumble at the night-latch with an imaginary key, while Mr. Ayr paused at the foot, and gave me a small paper box.

"Are you sure it is for me?"

"Quite."

"Thank you."

"You are thanking me in the dark. Wait till you see what it is, and thank me when you see me again."

"That may be a long time, perhaps."

"I hope it will seem long to you. Good-night now; I will not come in."

He moved away slowly as his brother opened the hall door, and Marian and I passed from the dewy darkness into the too-bright hall.

"How brilliant your cheeks are!" said Mrs. Ayr, with a tone implying that I should make a nice, rosy milkmaid. "The country air gives such a color."

"Was it country air or Julian Ayr?" whispered Marian.

I made my escape up stairs in a few minutes to examine my treasure. It was a small flat box, and inside, wrapped in wet cotton, was another red japonica on two satin-green leaves, the exact image of the one on my hat, which was growing brown along the edges.

The thoughtfulness that had prompted this gift put a halo around Mr. Ayr's head at once. I could think of nothing else, sleeping or waking, and was so absent-minded in my leave-taking next morning that Mrs. Ayr's eyebrows went up at least half an inch.

She had not more than half approved of me from the first. A bird of the air must have carried my treason.

"How very fresh the japonica looks!" was mother's first greeting. "Did you take it off and put it in water overnight?"

"No. Mr. Ayr found it out by chance, and gave me another. I mean Mr. Julian Ayr. Did you ever see him?"

"Once, at Mr. Kane's. I thought him rather supercilious and disposed to treat people who live in the country as if they were mullen stalks."

"Oh no; you must be thinking of some other. He is the most delightful man I ever met, the handsomest, the kindest, the—" I came to a sudden stand-still under mother's surprised eyes, and the eulogy was not resumed till long after.

In just a week Mr. Ayr found some business to call him to our village, and came to call on me with Marian. When Marian had enticed mother into the garden to look at an extraordinary lily, Mr. Ayr began to walk up and down the room, and came close to me.

"Was it long?" he said, with a sober sort of smile. It flashed upon me that he meant the time since I had seen him in St. Bo's.

"Not very, because my life is so smooth that my day in the city made a big ripple for me to think of."

"I know girls, whose ideas are as artificial as their flowers, who would have made me a different answer. If I come here again next week, will any one be glad to see me?"

"Oh yes, indeed, I shall be very glad."

"Then I will come;" and he covered my hand with his own ever so lightly, and drew it away suddenly as if he had put it down by mistake. He was sitting listlessly in his former place when the others came back, and soon went away with Marian.

"Do you suppose they are engaged?" said mother.

"No, ma'am."

"Why not? It would be an excellent match, and suit every body."

I thought I knew one, and perhaps two, whom it would not suit at all.

"Well, that's one reason against it. These matches which are excellent in every body's eyes never come about. If Adam and Eve had had any bride-maids, one would have said, 'How could she marry him!' and the other, 'How could he marry her!'"

"We shall see," said mother, oracularly.

"I am so happy!" I said, after a pause.

"How long since?" said mother.

"Half an hour or so. You were in the garden when the fit came on."

I wanted her to ask questions, but she only looked wistfully at me, and said, as she got up to make her nightly round of fastening doors and windows,

"You must remember that when you are happy you are on the top of a hill; you can't move either way without going down."

"Before you were a milliner you must certainly have been the oracle at Delphi, and said wise things sitting on a three-legged stool. But, speaking of hills, there's now and then one with a big table-land on the top, where one can walk a long time without going down."

"May yours be one of that sort!" said mother.

"Amen," said I.

Mr. Ayr, or Julian, as I soon learned to call him, came again the next week, and the next, all through the glowing summer.

We were walking up and down our little garden (and a very little one it was, so that the turn came often, but he did not seem to mind it) one night, lit only with stars.

"This must be my last visit for several weeks. The early train is to be taken off, and our busy time is coming on just now," said Julian.

I caught my breath. How could I live so long without him when his visits were become like my daily bread! But I had nothing to say.

"Will you not say you are sorry?"

I am not the crying sort of woman, as a rule; but this had come too suddenly, and before I knew it the tears rolled down my face and fell on his hand.

"You have said it, little one. You can never take back such an answer as that. Now promise me that you will spend these weeks not in making tucks and ruffles, and growing pale with fine stitching; but keep out of doors, and lay up a store of health for city living, so that when I come again—"

"Are you quite sure where that long sentence is going to lead you?"

I interrupted him, I think, only to prolong that blessed minute.

"Where did it leave off?"

"You said when you came again—"

"Oh yes! When I come again you must be ready to go with me to the pleasantest house I can find, with a bay-window in it, and sit there every afternoon looking for me. Will that be a hard life?"

"Not if you come home early."

I did not tell my mother any more than this of our walk in the garden, and she was quite satisfied.

Of course I promised every thing that Julian asked; but I made a mental reservation about the ruffles and tucks. He had to be argued out of another idea on which he had set his masculine heart—that I should wear red japonicas at my wedding. Such an innovation would have shocked Mrs. John Ayr too much.

CHAT FROM THE CAPITAL

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

WASHINGTON, June, 1871.

DEAR BAZAR,—Our friends, the special correspondents, before they left, at the close of the session in which they triumphed over the "privileges" of the Senate, announced that, as every body who was any body was about to go away for the summer, the metropolis would be virtually dead until next December. Never was there a greater mistake; and it is only now, relieved from the artificial excitement caused by the political effervescence of Congress, that Washington City really appears to advantage.

It was Jules Janin, I think, who described Paris in the summer as a fête by daylight. Certainly Washington, so dreary and often so dusty during the winter, is now charming. The luxuriant shade trees shelter the straight streets with their benevolent shadows, partially conceal the many insignificant houses, and make all pedestrians grateful to Jefferson, who first planted them. Then there are the public grounds and gardens, filled with foliage and rare flowers, and musical with the falling waters of fountains. Nor must I forget the hundreds of private gardens, especially rich in roses, which flourish admirably well here, as if it were their native soil.

The immediate environs of Washington are even more delightful in the summer than the city itself. There are the grounds of the Soldiers' Home, with miles of winding carriage roads, shrubbery, flower beds, and rustic work, which the old veterans keep in exquisite order, and thereby keep themselves from rusting out. The drive along the banks of Rock Creek is equal to the most picturesque park in Europe, not excepting Fontainebleau, and Mr. Corcoran's estate surpasses the Petit Trianon. The grounds of the Jesuits' College at Georgetown are pleasantly pathed, and Great Britain has no estate more favored by nature than "Kalorama," where Joel Barlow wrote poetry, while his protégé, Robert Fulton, made models of steamboats, and tested them in the neighboring mill-pond. And then there is "Arlington," which overlooks the whole city, as if its sleeping army of those who died that the republic might live were ready at a signal to spring to arms again, if necessary, to defend the capital. The flower garden, which was the pride of Mrs. Lee when her husband was loyal to the flag under which he had been educated, is now fringed with the white head-stones of Union officers who fell in battle.

Then there is the broad Potomac—the "River of Swans," as the Indians called it—which is alive every pleasant evening with the barges of the boat clubs, trim yachts which never float in salt-water, and tiny steam-cutters from the navy-yard. Steamboats, with bands of music, convey pleasure-parties to the dancing pavilions erected on different points of land, where it is cool enough to dance "till broad daylight;" and every morning there is a cargo of patriotic pilgrims taken to Mount Vernon, which the ladies of America now own, and which they are fast restoring to its pristine condition, when Washington superintended its management.

Up the river are the Falls of the Potomac, not wanting in picturesque grandeur, but especially attractive to anglers. Mr. Webster used not only to frequently catch fish there, but he enjoyed cooking them, although he used to sigh because it was impossible to concoct a chowder with shad or rock-fish or black bass. But a freshly caught shad, split open and nailed flat on a seasoned bit of oak board, can be deliciously cooked—like a johnny-cake—before a large wood fire. "Planked shad," they call it on the Potomac.

But while there is a deal of rational al fresco enjoyment hereabout during the summer, there is also a vast amount of steady pen-work performed. The labors of the department clerks, often interrupted by Congressional calls for information during the winter, are now unceasing, and the accounts of Uncle Sam are posted up, his letters are filed, and full reports are made of what all in his service are about.

How the public service is changing! Ten years ago, when the exigencies of the war made it necessary for the government to issue "postage currency," as it was then called, a few ladies were employed in the Treasury Department to cut apart the printed sheets of paper change. In a year or more, men being wanted in the field, a few women were employed in the same department as copyists. Governor Andrew, that most tender-hearted yet lion-like of State chief magistrates, visiting the agency which he had established here that the brave boys from the Bay State might be cared for when sick or wounded, conceived the idea of employing a female clerk to write to their mothers, or wives, or children, or sweethearts; and Mrs. Thomas for seven years faithfully discharged that duty with rare discretion. No man could have written such letters as she wrote, filled with the little details about loved ones so desired at lonely homes, and encouraging hopes of recovery, or gently conveying the saddest tidings. And in due time female clerks found their way every where, except into the State Department (where treaties are not kept secret) and into the clerical rooms of Congress. In the Congressional Library a lady is one of the best of the excellent and obliging clerical force.

Now there must be five hundred or more ladies in Washington who are in the public service, and many of them do more work than any of the men in the bureaus in which they toil. But the "lords of creation" have, until recently, drawn on an average double the pay given their female co-laborers. This wrong is to be remedied under an act of Congress, which permits the promotion of women as well as men, provided they can pass satisfactory examinations. Already have four of the ladies in the Bureau of Internal Revenue been before the examining board of the Treasury Department, and passed satisfactory examinations; and it is recorded of one of them (Mrs. Little, originally from Massachusetts) that she answered correctly every question asked her, which is more than has ever been said of any man examined by this board. Henceforth let it be hoped that a woman who writes thirty pages a day will receive as much, if not more, than a man who only writes eight or ten.

As for our beau monde, they have migrated to fashionable watering-places, either to enjoy seabathing or to drink mineral water, but in either case to display wonderful attire. Lady Thornton sails for England on the 24th, with her boy and two girls, but will return in the fall, and hopes to pass the summer of '72 at the quiet retreat near Newburyport where she was last summer. Madame De Catacazy no longer dazzles us with her blonde beauty, as there is a coldness, if not a rupture, between the Russian legation and the Department of State, which will sadly interfere with the pleasures of the prince during his coming visit, if not reconciled. Madame Gerolt will soon leave us, as her husband has been recalled by Bismarck, after having represented Prussia here a quarter of a century. One of the Misses Gerolt was married not long ago to the chargé d'affaires of Greece, and the other, who displays a strong desire for monastic life, will remain here as a pensionnaire in a convent. Madame De Treilhard, the accomplished American wife of the French minister, is nursing him devotedly, and hopes that his reason may soon be restored, with his health. And as for the other ladies of the diplomatic corps, you will find them chronicled in the reports of society at fashionable resorts.

Although our haute noblesse is away, the cheery matrons and blooming misses s'amuse, nevertheless. In addition to the water excursions above mentioned, there are private theatricals, fruit festivals, and garden concerts, with a deal of quiet promenading and sitting on porches—in the old Knickerbocker style—until late in the night. All of which is very enjoyable.

RACONTEUR.

USEFUL RECIPES.

VEAL HASH.—This makes a most delightful supper dish. Choose a shin of veal with about three pounds of meat on it. Boil it in as small a quantity of water as you well can, so that when done there shall be nearly one quart left. It should be boiled the day before it is wanted, so that it may become perfectly cold. When the meat seems entirely done, take it out, laying it away from the air, but not wrapping it in a cloth; save all the liquor in a separate dish. The next day cut the meat off, make it very fine, but not quite so fine as mince-meat; about half an hour before you wish to send it to table put it over the fire in a covered stew-pan with the liquor; have ready about half a pint of drawn butter (hot), and eight or ten hard-boiled eggs; remove the shells; save out two; mince the rest, and add to the meat, etc. Take off the fire at once, season with salt, Cayenne pepper, and a small quantity of black pepper, and, if desired, a very little wine. Cut in slices the two eggs, and, after the meat has been placed in the dish for table, garnish with them. It should be sent hot to table.

In making pastry the flour should be well sifted, and the butter carefully washed, so as to free it from salt. For very rich crust a pound of butter to the same quantity of flour is the rule. No pie-crust, no matter how carefully prepared and nice the ingredients, will be as light as it should be if mixed in a warm room. A nice, large, smooth piece of zinc, securely fastened to a board, makes an excellent "pie-crust board." It is easier cleaned than marble, and not liable to be broken. As little time should elapse between mixing and baking the crust as possible; and after baking set it in a cool, dry place—never in a cellar. Use ice-water for mixing, and be careful not to get too much in. Mix the salt, flour, and water well together with a knife, until it will adhere, but not stick, to the board. Knead it well with the hands until it seems free from lumps, and well mixed; then make a cake of it, and just in the middle put the butter, which should be in a round ball; bring the dough up all around it, and let it cover the butter on top too; then with the rolling-pin roll from you until you have a long, narrow roll; take the end farthest from you, and lay it over on the roll about the length of your finger; then take hold of this fold and make another, not by turning it over toward you, but drawing the whole roll along until it folds under the same length as the one on top. When it is all folded roll it out again, not being discouraged if the butter sticks to the pin; scrape it off. Roll this way four or five times, or until the paste seems flaky, and the butter not in lumps, but rather in layers. One great secret is to roll from you, never toward you; and do not slam your pin on the crust, but work it gently, and you will soon find practice will give you just the right touch for it. Many persons use lard and butter mixed; some contend that lard alone makes a richer, lighter crust. We prefer butter alone. Do not put it into an oven too hot, or the crust will be blackened, and will not rise; and if not hot enough it will be sodden. It is always best to try a small piece before you put in the whole. When the outside of the pastry is done, and it does not seem done all through, put a piece of writing-paper on top, which will prevent burning. In fruit pies, that are apt to boil over, when the bottom crust is in the pie-dish, and just before you put on the second, moisten the edge of the former with cold water, or flour and water mixed; then pinch the edges of the two crusts well together, make plenty of air-holes, and there will be no further trouble.

A very nice way of using preserved plums, or preserves of any kind, is to line the pie-dish with paste, put the upper crust on directly, set it in the oven, and when nearly done take it out; with a sharp knife take off the upper crust, put in the fruit, replace the crust, and return it to the oven for about ten minutes, or until the crust is done.

THE EMPRESS AUGUSTA.

THE fine portrait from which the accompanying picture was engraved was painted by Bernhard Plockhorst, and sent by the Empress of Germany to Versailles as a Christmas gift to her husband last winter, when he was installed there in the palace of Louis the Great.

The Empress Augusta was born at Weimar, September 30, 1811, and was the daughter of Duke Charles of Saxony, the friend and protector of Goethe, Schiller, and many other of Germany's greatest men. In 1829 she married Prince William of Prussia, the second son of King Frederick William III. In 1861, on the death of Frederick William IV., she ascended the throne of Prussia with her husband, for whom ten years have sufficed to restore the German Empire. Queen Augusta is greatly beloved by her subjects; and is famed for her talents, benevolence, and piety. For a detailed account of her romantic marriage and subsequent career we refer our readers to the interesting sketch published in Harper's Bazar, No. 12, Vol. II.

INVALIDISM.

THERE is nothing so well calculated to impress us, or perhaps, more truly, depress us, with a sense of our personal insignificance and utter imbecility, both physical and mental, as a severe attack of illness. In a moment, and often without warning, the constitution, at all times rather a shaky structure, is sapped, mined, and exploded to the very foundations; the muscles relax and wither up like elastic bands, and become for all wonted purposes useless; the face loses its glow and the limbs their color, while the blood scarcely manages to trickle round its long daily course; the eyes shrivel up into little dead beads, or stare unmeaningly from the sockets; while, keeping pace with this rapid decay of the outward bulwarks, the inner defenses soon admit of a breach being effected, and the mind aches and suffers, throbs and groans, with scarcely less vehemence than the body. In fact, to combat illness successfully is a far more difficult thing than to face death. In his encounters with death man is frequently well matched: if a soldier, he marches out in all the fullness and pride of his strength, with his drums beating, colors flying, loins girded, and all the senses excited to a sufficient pitch to enable him, if called upon, to grapple the devil himself by the beard; if a sailor, his previous life, which is always a compound of risk, wreck, and hardship, puts him in a still better position to face the great enemy of mankind; if his avocation be naturally a peaceful one—if, for instance, he is a philosopher or statesman, or candidate for the Humane Society's medal, he still has a motive strong enough to induce him to wish to die with distinction. And hence we have many fine death-bed speeches, or, at any rate, speeches which were intended to be such. People felt up to the occasion; they saw that nothing in life would now so well become them as the leaving of it; death had to be faced once and for all—then let him be met, as he should be by all true men, "sans peur et sans reproche." If the man be a martyr, no torture will have been so sweet to him as the coup de grâce of his enemies, which settles him just as he has pronounced his blessing; if a statesman, no short-lived triumph over the honorable gentleman opposite, no brilliant after-dinner oration, will have equaled in its soothing qualities this last effort at effect to which he braces himself.

Yes, in the case of death this is all very well, and to make a celebrated death-bed speech may be worth dying for; but who ever did or said any thing remarkable when suffering from the mumps or lumbago? Imagine Marcus Tullius with a cold, or Mark Antony with a bilious attack! What an absence of romance and impossibility of scenic effect! How worthless under any of the above-mentioned circumstances do all human motives and inducements at once become! Not absolutely powerless, perhaps—for then the world would never have reached its present state of existence, since we are never without such ailments—but still so entirely trimmed and shorn of their adornments, trappings, and finery that they produce such a sensation in the human victim as one might conceive would be caused by a Christmas-tree without its presents, or fire-works let off by daylight, rather than that glow of zeal and spontaneous enthusiasm which necessarily belongs to and supports all men of action and heroes.

It is then that all high-sounding names, such as fame, glory, patriotism, are bereft of their talismanic charms, and become mere dwarfs in our estimation, while the pettinesses and minor incidents of life are exaggerated out of all proportion by the fog of our distempers. Philosophy either deserts us altogether, or plays Judas for the enemy in disguise; whispering in our ear that we are but mortal; that the greatest effort of man is but as a drop in the ocean; that we may sow, but shall not reap, and so on, till we eagerly listen to the arguments we have often refuted, and surrender ourselves with an easy conscience to the doctors and an easy-chair. Imagination confines itself to the distorted pictures of our misery, and sensation conveys to us pain instead of pleasure, or strange and unwelcome feelings hitherto unknown to us. We know that we are being gradually transformed into something our nature shrinks from; but there we lie, helpless as in a hideous nightmare, overwhelmed by a fate whose steady approach we are distinctly conscious of, but utterly unable to avert.

And then comes the crisis—the turning-point which decides whether we are to be men or dummies. Most men have passed through such a crisis, and know its horrors and its hopes, its excitement, its terrible uncertainty. One way or the other the matter settles itself—we either join "the regulars," the distinguished army of invalids, certificated by a courteous and affable M.D., or else "in native worth and honor clad, with beauty, courage, strength adorned," we leave our sofas and our medicine-bottles, our salts and our slippers, and wake, as it were, from a long and inexplicable sleep. We revel in our cold tub and our pipe, and wonder what could have persuaded us ever to leave them off. A feeling of insolent bravado is apt to possess us as we gaze on what we are and what we were. And how we loathe our philosophy, which misled us in our hour of weakness, and now with brazen face returns in the hour of triumph to trumpet in our ear the old watch-words of fame, honor, and success, and to assure us that she had never forsaken us! We well know that she did, and that she is as fickle as Fortune and false as Torquata; but being in good-humor with all the world, we can afford to forgive her, and flatter her accordingly.

Then, too, we are warmly greeted by the friends who come to visit us in our troubles, and still more warmly by the numerous portion who did not. Once more we meet our doctor without remembering even that we have a pulse, and pass the chemist's window without a shudder; once more we seem to breathe the air of freedom. True, our satisfaction is not altogether unalloyed with a dash of bitterness—for Jones has been promoted over our head in the service, or Robinson has obtained the appointment which had been promised to ourselves; and we feel, moreover, that we are not humored and petted at home as we were, and are again regarded rather as an incumbrance than an ornament of the family circle. But these are matters which do not affect us keenly; there is stuff in us which our friends do not yet appreciate; aware of our own virtues, we wrap ourselves in them as in a cloak, and determine that before long the world shall know us in our true colors. And so, brimming over partly with a sense of superiority and partly with the consciousness of revived energies, we bid farewell to invalidism, and again take up our position in the great battle of life.

A DELICATE QUESTION.

NOTABLE SLEEPERS.

SLEEP is nearly as great a puzzle as ever it was. Much has been discovered concerning the bodily peculiarities manifested during this portion of our existence; but all whose opinions are best worth listening to admit that they are only on the threshold of the subject yet. Why, for instance, can some men maintain their bodily and mental vigor with so small an amount of sleep as falls to their share? Lord Brougham and many other great statesmen and lawyers are known to have been content with a marvelously small quantity of sleep. Frederick the Great is said to have allowed himself only five hours; John Hunter, five hours; General Elliot, the hero of Gibraltar, four hours; while Wellington, during the Peninsular war, had still less.

How, on the other hand, to account for the cormorant sleepers? De Moivre, the mathematician, could (though it is to be hoped he did not) sleep twenty hours out of the twenty-four. Quin, the actor, sometimes slept for twenty-four hours at a stretch. Doctor Reid, the metaphysician, could so manage that one potent meal, followed by one long and sound sleep, would last him for two days. Old Parr slept away his later days almost entirely. In the middle of the last century a young Frenchwoman, at Toulouse, had, for half a year, fits of lengthened sleep, varying from three to thirteen days each. About the same time a girl at Newcastle-on-Tyne slept fourteen weeks without waking, and the waking process occupied three days to complete.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SHOE-MAKER.—"Heels as high as possible" are not worn either in-doors or out by sensible and tasteful women. French heels are scarcely ever seen now. An inch and a quarter or a half heel is now worn. We can not promise positively that we will illustrate shoes soon, though we may do so.

A YOUNG MATRON.—The caps worn by French nurses are suitable for waitresses.

KATHRINA.—Make a solid lavender silk vest to your striped silk basque, and trim the skirt and over-skirt with lavender ruffles. A Swiss muslin polonaise will be pretty with your striped silk, or else a basque and over-skirt. We have cut paper patterns suitable for either.

MRS. J. A. C.—Use pattern of short-sacque with basque back already sent you for cutting your China crape paletot. Line throughout with thin lining silk, either black, white, or lavender. Kilt pleats are flat pleats all turned one way.

CONSTANCE.—It is a matter of taste whether a lady of forty years should wear her hair in natural hanging curls. You say it is becoming; but would it not be even more becoming if dressed somewhat in accordance with the fashion of the day—with a small chatelaine, and her curls falling over it, the front in short fluffy curls?

MRS. M. B. B.—A black grenadine over silk would be suitable for second mourning. Read directions in New York Fashions of present number.

BESSIE.—Make your Hernani by hints given for grenadine suits in New York Fashions. Trim your black and white poplin with bias silk bands.—We can not advise you what to do with moth patches and moles, except to let them alone.

MABEL.—It is very difficult to obtain a situation as copyist, and we believe the remuneration is poor.

S. T.—We do not give away cut paper patterns. An advertisement in the Bazar will explain to you that they are sold for twenty-five cents a suit pattern.

EDNA K.—Your sample of chalé is pretty and stylish. Kilt pleats are all folded one way, and are sometimes fastened at the top and bottom, though not always. A parasol with white lining is suitable for light mourning, but those for deep mourning are lined with black. Many ladies still wear round hats, and they will continue to be worn, but are no longer dressy-looking.

MADEMOISELLE.—Light mohairs and poplins striped with white are used for summer balmorals. White suits will be worn to church and on the street. They do not need a colored skirt of silk. Make blue sacque by the sacque pattern with Short-Sacque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 17, Vol. IV.—Throw a bouquet and a card of thanks to serenaders when you can not invite them in.

GENEVA.—Ten or twelve yards of narrow summer silk are required for a polonaise.—There are French scourers here who clean silk beautifully.

MRS. L. R. A.—Make a single skirt and polonaise by the Apron-Polonaise illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV. You will have to trim with bias bands or passementerie and lace, as you have but fourteen yards.

LOIS.—A gored demi-train and postilion-basque is the best you can do with your brown silk, unless you buy lighter silk for a polonaise. Can you not match your piqué, and make a new over-skirt in the present style?

MRS. B. F. S.—We can not give you addresses here. Any one of the furnishing houses quoted in our columns will furnish the white dress. What do you mean by "knowing the seams?"

K.—Your plaid sample will look well made by the pattern sent you, and trimmed with black braid.

MRS. B. C.—The furnishing houses will not give patterns of clothing.—The infant's baskets advertised for $5 have probably nothing but pockets and cushions in them. The best advice we can give you about purchasing is to send at once to the houses that we quote in the New York Fashions. We believe them to be reliable, though we do not hold ourselves responsible for them.

CONSTANCE.—Polonaises and basques with long over-skirts are both worn. Short over-skirts are the fashion abroad. Side-pleatings are held down by a row of stitching, or else a tiny narrow band stitched on an inch below the top. Each edge is hemmed. The back breadths of dress skirts are gathered.

MRS. A. C. M'A.—The pattern of Peasant-Basque Costume was sent you. We have no cut paper pattern of trained over-skirt.

FOREST MAIDS.—A young lady should, of course, pay a gentleman visitor the attentions you suggest, such as offering him the best chair, and taking his hat when there is no hat-rack. He should precede her when entering church, and find her a seat.

LOUISE W.—Bias bands of the material stitched down the front and around the skirt above the hem are pretty on calico wrappers. Bias ruffles on striped calicoes are pretty.

E. A. K.—We have said repeatedly that we can not reply by mail.—Your long net veil should be five-eighths or three-fourths of a yard wide and about a yard long. Get a brown straw gypsy bonnet, or round hat trimmed with two shades of brown ribbon.

MRS. M. G.—Soak your colored cambric for fifteen minutes, before washing, in a pail of water in which a tea-spoonful of sugar of lead has been dissolved.—Make the girl's suits by cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 23, Vol. IV. Make a bishop's lawn sacque and over-skirt to wear over your striped dress.

CARRIE L.—Trim your Japanese silk with bias bands of black silk and fringe.

WHEN you are depressed by the gaunt, sickly feeling of a disordered system, which needs to be cleansed and stimulated into healthy action, take a dose or two of AYER'S PILLS, and see how quick you can be restored for a shilling.—[Com.]

HALL'S Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer prevents the hair from falling off. Use it.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA will cure CONSUMPTION. Try it!—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

WHY WALTHAM WATCHES

ARE THE BEST AND CHEAPEST.

Because, being made of the best materials, and every part being finished in the most perfect manner, they will run with great precision, and will not stop or run irregular, as is the case with other Watches.

We desire to increase the sale of these reliable timepieces, and have reduced the prices much lower than formerly.

Silver Hunting Watches, - - - - - - - - $15
Gold Hunting Watches (18-carat cases), $75
Gold Hunting Watches (Ladies' size), - $60

We send single Watches to any place by express, with the bill to collect on delivery, and we give the purchaser the privilege of opening the package and examining the Watch before paying, and if, after it is taken and paid for, it should not prove satisfactory, we will exchange it or Refund the Money.

We have sent thousands of these Watches by express, and to every section of the country, and by our improved method of packing they will go safely to any distance. Persons living in the distant States and Territories can save from 50 to 100 per cent. by buying from us.

Do not order a Watch till you have sent for our Descriptive PRICE-LIST. It explains the different kinds, gives weight and quality of the Cases, with prices of each.

When you write for a price-list please state that you saw this in HARPER'S BAZAR. Address, in full,

DIAMOND D MOHAIRS

It is true and not strange that the prominent brands of alpacas which have appeared of late years have lost all their temporary popularity. The reasons are evident: first, the importers relied on a name or ticket to sell the goods, without regard to intrinsic worth; and, second, the various brands (whose name is legion) were wanting in all the qualities that go to make the Diamond (D) Mohair, the only alpaca of which any lady should make a dress. The Diamond (D) Mohairs are made of pure lustre yarns, and always retain their brilliancy and color. They do not crease or wrinkle as common alpacas do, and are to be had of the leading retailers in the United States.

PURIFY THE BLOOD AND BEAUTIFY THE COMPLEXION BY USING
HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and
HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

Prescriptions accurately compounded. French, German, and Spanish spoken. Stores open all night.
P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

THE EASIEST WAY IS BEST.

To send fire and sword through the bowels of the land would be scarcely more cruel than it is to tear and wreck the delicate and sensitive membranes and tissues of the discharging organs with a convulsing purgative. No medicinal preparation at present known so completely, permanently, and painlessly relieves constipation as and as it simultaneously invigorates the digestion, regulates the action of the liver, and refreshes the debilitated system, it is justly esteemed both by medical men and the public at large as an indispensable specific in dyspepsia, bilious attacks, sick headache, physical prostration, and all complaints affecting the secretive, assimilating, and discharging organs.

FACETIÆ.

A NERVOUS person said that he hated being called upon to make a speech at a public dinner, because "getting on his legs always sent him off his head."

"Bob, Harry Smith has one of the greatest curiosities you ever saw."

"Don't say so—what is it?"

"A tree that never sprouts, and becomes smaller the older it grows."

"Well, that is a curiosity. Where did he get it?"

"From California."

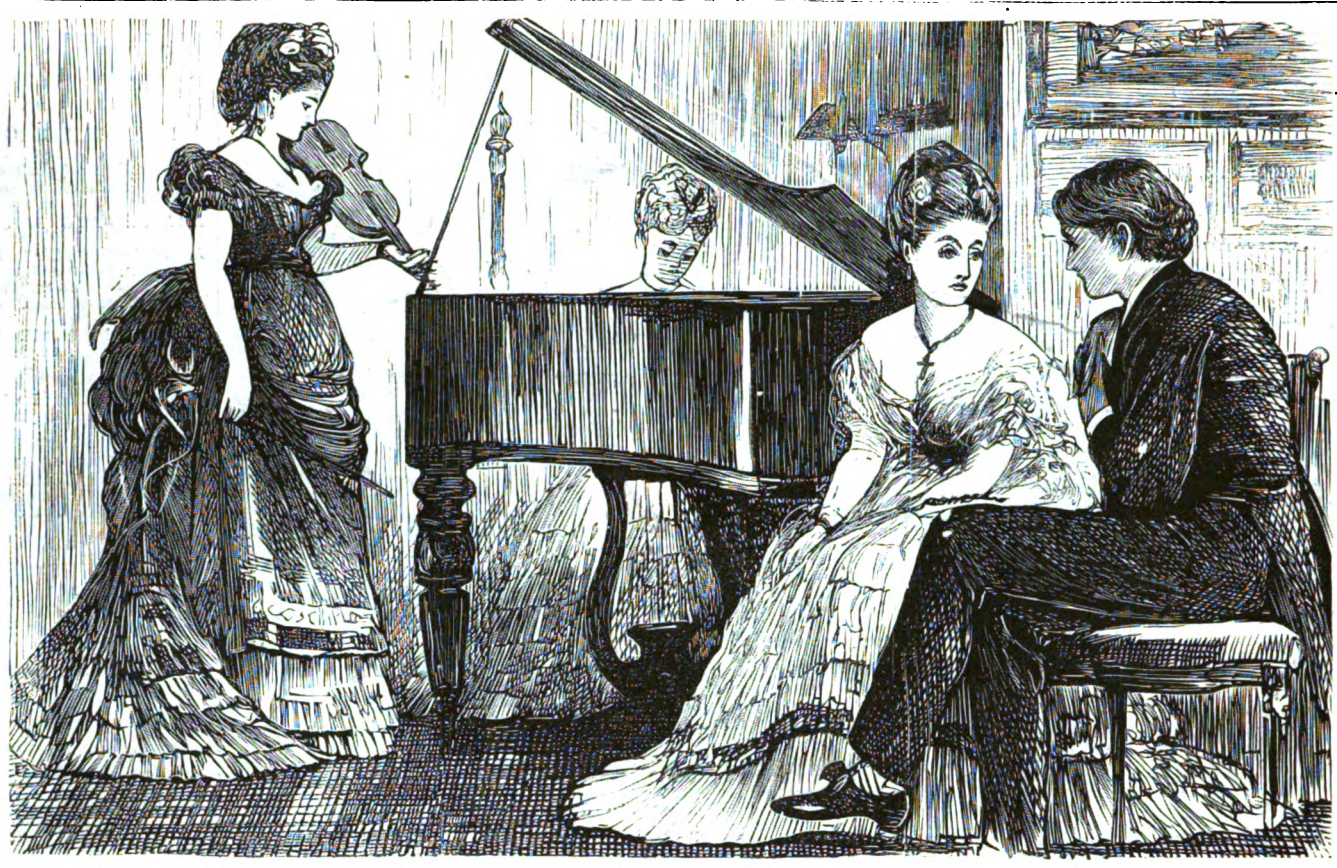
"What is the name of it?"

"Axle-tree—it once belonged to a California omnibus."

AN AWAKENER.—The Rev. J. H. K—— was, several years since, pastor of a church in the country. During his sermon on a hot summer Sunday morning Brother Austin, one of the official members of the church, fell fast asleep. Mr. K—— suddenly paused, and called out, "Brother Austin, will you please open the window there a little? Physicians say it is very unhealthy to sleep in a close room."

A female lecturer says: "Get married, young men, and be quick about it. Don't wait for the millennium, for the girls to become angels. You'd look well beside an angel, wouldn't you, you blockheads?"

SISTERLY AFFECTION.—With big tears in her eyes, a sweet little girl of five summers asked, "Will dear little brother Johnny die to-night, mother?" And when she was assured the doctor thought not, she continued, while sobs choked her utterance, "Poor Johnny, I hoped he would, 'cause then I could have his little white-handled knife and fork."



PLAYING ON FEELINGS.

ENTHUSIASTIC MAIDEN. "Oh, Mr. Lovell, I'd sooner be a Violinist than any thing in the world. Wouldn't You?"
MODEST YOUTH. "Well. If You were the Violinist, I think I'd—a—sooner be the Violin."

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION—THE CONSCIENCE CLAUSE.

TEMPERATE PARENT (introducing his son to the district schoolmaster). "Oh, Mr. Tompkins, Sir—please Sir—I would partic'larly request you to abstain from teaching my little Jonadab here to work sums in ale or beer or spirit measures, as he's been brought up a stric' teetotaler, and j'ined the band of 'ope."

THE SWEETS OF COUNTRY LIFE.

(Depicted by a Man of Feeling.)

'Tis sweet at summer eve to rove
When brightly shines each twinkling star,
And, strolling through the silent grove,
Calmly to smoke a good cigar.

'Tis sweet upon the flowery mead
To see the tender lambkins play,
With pensive eye to watch them feed,
And note how plump to roast are they.

'Tis sweet the fallow deer to view,
Couched 'mid the fern in tranquil group;
'Tis sweet to hear the turtle's coo,
And meditate on turtle soup.

'Tis sweet, from cares domestic free,
While wandering by the streamlet's side,
The speckled trout or perch to see,
And think how nice they would be, fried.

'Tis sweet to mark the plover's flight,
Lone on the moor, its nest despoiled,
And with prospective mental sight
To contemplate its eggs hard boiled.

'Tis sweet, beside the murmuring rill,
The scented violet to smell;
Yet may a perfume sweeter still
Attend the welcome dinner-bell.

WHAT HE DID NOT WANT.

A kind-hearted little spouse, bonneted and shawled, very recently appeared at the door of a room where her good-natured liege lord was about to indulge in a comfortable snooze.

"My dear, I am going shopping. What shall I bring to comfort you?"

"I don't think of any thing I want particularly just now. Come and kiss me. I will tell you, however, what I don't want you to bring me."

"What is it, pray?"

"Pray don't bring me in debt."

ECONOMY.—A writer mentions certain fuel-saving inventions as follows: "I have seen a boiler advertised which saves forty-three per cent. of fuel, a valve which saves twenty-five per cent., a governor which saves fifteen per cent., a grate which saves twelve per cent., and a lubricator which saves six per cent. Total, 101 per cent. Combining all these improvements, an engine would run itself, and produce a balance of fuel for culinary purposes."

What effect do flouring-mills have upon a town?—Make it flour-ish.

Some men will pump you to any extent if you only give them a handle.

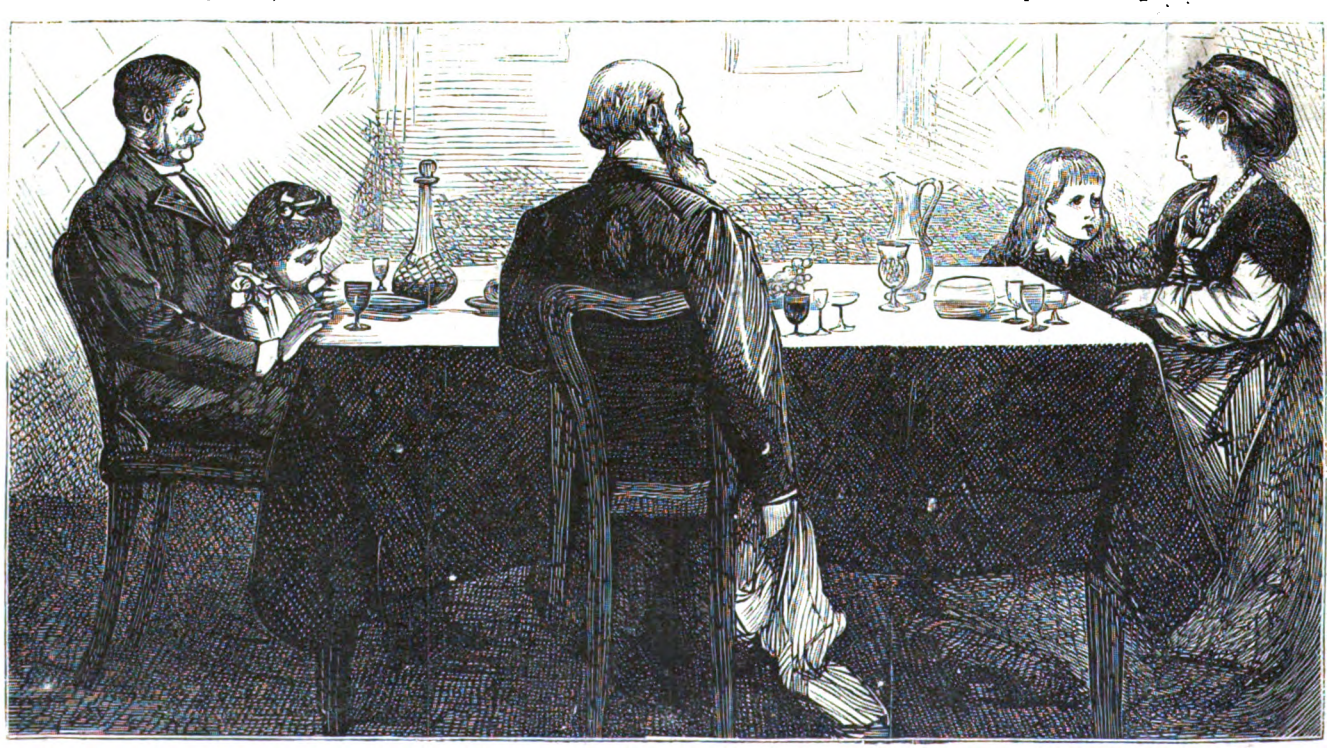
A little girl joyfully assured her mother the other day that she had found out where they made horses. She had seen a man in a shop just finishing one of them, for he was nailing on his last foot.

A sign in a Western city announces, "Boots Blacked Inside."

WANTS.—Wanted, a boot for the foot of the stairs, a handkerchief for the nose of a pair of bellows, a key to undo a box on the ears, some water to wash the face of the earth in, a hat to fit the head of the class, table-covers for the railway time-tables, a spectacle for the eyes of the potato, a stocking for a leg of mutton, and a pair of legs for the breeches of promise.

COMPLIMENTARY.

PORTER (about the dog). "Yes, Sir, aw got him in Brooklyn, yonder. An', Doctor, aw's goin' t' ax ye hev y' ony objection tiv us Namin' him efther Ye?"
YOUNG MEDICAL MAN (rather pleased). "Oh dear, no, by all means. Don't know about the Compliment, though; he's not a Beauty to look at."
PORTER. "Mebbees not, Doctor. But—Smash!—mun, He's a Beggar to Kill!"



DROP THAT!

BERTIE. "Give me a Little Drop of Wine, Mamma."
MAMMA. "My dear, it is taking Little Drops, as Children, that makes People take too much when they are Grown Up."
BERTIE (logically). "Well, then, give me a Big Drop. I like it."

COINING A WORD.—A correspondent wants to know of what metal "hush-money" is made. Need we remind him that "silence is golden?"

An attendant at Mount Vernon, not long since, found a lady weeping most bitterly and audibly, with her handkerchief at her eyes. He stepped up to her and said,

"Are you in trouble, madam?"

"No, Sir!" she sobbed.

"I saw you weeping."

"Ah!" said she, "how can one help weeping at the grave of the Father of his Country?"

"Oh, indeed, madam," said he, "that's it! The tomb's over yonder. This is the ice-house."

"What do you do for a living?" asked a farmer of a sturdy vagabond who came begging at his house.

"Well, nothing much, except traveling around," said the fellow.

"You look as though you are good at that," responded the farmer.

"Well, yes, I'm pretty good at traveling."

"Then," said the farmer, opening the door, "let's see you travel."

Good potatoes and corn have their eyes and ears about them.

A young man in Connecticut who has recently become engaged is in great dismay because it has occurred to him that contracts made on Sunday are not binding.

What is the difference between an auction and seasickness?—One is the sale. And why do physicians have a greater horror of the sea than any body else?—Because they are more liable to see sickness.

Why should new levies go to war early in the year?—Because all green things begin to shoot in the spring.

WICKEDNESS.—The bachelor looks out for No. 1; the married man for No. 2.

TO YOUNG LADIES.—If you open your heart to your lover, ten to one a kiss will be the first prisoner to fly out.

All tailors are not cowards. There is one we know of who has many a time faced a dozen regimental coats without flinching.

HINTS TO EMIGRANTS.

An acquaintance of a certain Scotch bailie made a grievous complaint to him one day on the hard times, and the impossibility of scraping together a livelihood in that wretched country. The bailie's own experience ran directly counter to these croakings, for his industry had realized a handsome competence; but he knew too much of the world to attempt proving to the complainer that his ill success might be partly his own fault. He contented himself with remarking that it was surely possible for a tradesman to draw together a tolerable business.

"Not in this country," his friend repeated.

"Weel, then," said the bailie, "what say ye to emigration? I have heard that some push their way weel in Australia."

"Yes," replied his desponding townsman, "that might be the case ance in a day, but if there is business there, mae folk are there than can get a share o't."

"Weel, it may be true what you say," rejoined the bailie, "but ye might gang further; ye might gang up into the interior."

"There's nae body there," said the grumbler, "but kangaroos."

The worthy magistrate, concluding that kangaroos were a tribe of native savages among whom a careful peddler might make indifferent good bargains, replied,

"Weel-a-weel, and isna a kangaroo's siller as guid as anither man's?"

ENEMIES.

"Whisky is your greatest enemy."

"But," said Mr. Jones, "don't the Bible say, Mr. Preacher, that we are to love our enemies?"

"Oh yes, Jones, but it don't say we are to swallow them."

THE BEST HE COULD.

White Cashmere Summer Hood.

THE edge of this hood is trimmed with black lace three-quarters of an inch wide, and with a bias strip of white cashmere of the same width. A pleated piece is sewed on at the middle of the top of the hood; this pleating is made of a strip of cashmere three inches and three-quarters wide, edged on one side with lace and a bias strip, arranged in side pleats at the other side and sloped off from the middle toward both ends to a width of two inches and a half. To make the hood, cut of cashmere one piece from Fig. 6, Supplement, after joining on the piece turned down. Pleat the front edge of this piece, bringing × on ●, and sew the trimming on the edge of the hood, at the same time fastening down the edge of the material. Sew the pleated piece on the hood along the middle line given from the front edge of the hood to ×; the edges of the pleating which meet are covered with a bias strip. Set a cashmere bow on the middle of the front as shown by the illustration; a similar bow with ends covers the end of the pleating at the back. The ends of the bow are trimmed with lace.

Embroidered Swiss Muslin Fichu, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS fichu is made of white pleated Swiss muslin. White lace two inches and three-quarters of an inch wide and needle-work Swiss muslin insertion three-quarters of an inch wide form the trimming. To make the fichu, cut of Swiss muslin two pieces from Fig. 18, Supplement, having previously joined on the piece turned down in the Supplement, and one piece from Fig. 19. Join the back and fronts according to the corresponding figures; sew the pleated Swiss muslin on the foundation; trim the fichu as shown by the illustration and partly indicated on the pattern; and cut away the material under the needle-work and under the pleated Swiss muslin. In adjusting the fichu, cross the fronts and tie the ends at the back, as shown by the illustration. Black velvet ribbon with medallion, tied around the neck, with long ends behind.

Swiss Muslin Fichu with Ribbon Trimming.

THIS white pleated Swiss muslin fichu is trimmed with a side-pleated frill of the material, black velvet ribbon, and a black velvet bow. To make the fichu, cut two pieces of Swiss muslin from Fig. 20, Supplement; cover these pieces with pleated Swiss muslin, join them at the middle of the back from 28 to 29, edge the fichu with the frill, and cover the seam made by doing this with velvet ribbon. A bow finishes the front of the fichu. Finally, cut away the Swiss muslin foundation under the pleated Swiss muslin.

HOW THE UTOPIANS DISCOUNTENANCED LUXURY.

THE Utopians, Sir Thomas More tells us, were resolved to destroy the taste for gold, silver, jewels, luxury, and fashion; to do away with all the lingering traits of barbarism. They made their commonest vessels and utensils of gold and silver, and used glass or earthenware on their tables; the precious metals were seen only in kitchens and outhouses. They made heavy chains of them to bind their convicts, and when they wished to mark out any member of the community as infamous and unfit to associate with his fellows, they hung great rings of gold in his ears, rings of gold on his fingers, rich chains of gold about his neck, a band of gold about his head, and possibly a diamond breastpin on his tunic. He was then set to work on the public roads. "And thus," says the accurate chronicler, "those metals for which all other nations labor, suffer, and sin, were looked upon as worthless and contemptible by the wise Utopians."

Diamonds and pearls they gathered sometimes by chance, and cut and polished them. They then used them to deck their young children, and to serve them for playthings. The young Utopians were at first delighted with the glittering stones. But when they came to years of discretion, and saw that none but children or convicts wore such cheap ornaments, they threw aside their diamonds with their other toys, and would no more wear them than play with marbles or puppets. Only the infamous who had plundered the public treasury or defrauded their neighbors were condemned to glitter in precious stones, and to be marked out by their profusion of worthless decorations.

Once the embassadors from a distant land came to Utopia. They were barbarians, unacquainted with the simple habits of civilization, and they hoped to dazzle and overawe the plain republicans by their gay clothing and gorgeous robes. The poor, silly Utopians, they believed, would be filled with natural admiration. So the three embassadors from Amaurote, followed by one hundred servants all clad in silks of various colors, made a triumphal entry into the quiet city, amidst an immense throng of spectators. Never was there a more agreeable comedy. The embassadors, each a great noble in his own land, wore robes of cloth of gold, with great chains of gold hanging from their necks and ears; with brooches, and a tiara of gold upon their caps, set with countless pearls and diamonds; and had, in fact, put on the very livery to which the Utopians condemned their convicts. It would have done a man's heart good, says our narrator, to have seen how proudly they displayed their peacock's feathers, and how lofty became their carriage when they compared their own gallant apparel with the poor raiment of the Utopians.

All the people had swarmed into the streets. They at once took the embassadors for convicts or slaves, and saluted only the plainly dressed servants of the train. They wondered why Amaurote should have sent a deputation of madmen or idiots to confer with them upon important business. Even the children were amused at their folly. "Loke, mother," said one acute young Utopian, "how great a lubber doth yet wear peerles and precious stoones, as though he were a litel child stil. But the mother—yea, and that also in good earnest—Peace, sone, saithe she, I thinke he be some of the ambassadours' fooles." It does not seem, however, that the Utopian ideas had much influence upon their contemporaries, and the courts of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth persisted in wearing the most costly attire.

MERIDIANS.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

WHEN, on the breast of the mysterious rivers
That die upon the desert, the first ray,
Stealing across long levels, smites and quivers
Upon a folded lotus, far away,
As the still stream slides, like an under day,
Thousands flash open, scattering perfumes rare,
And waxen white with worshipful display
Strike statue-stiff the sudden traveler there,
Enchantment on the tide and magic in the air—

Then, in remoter regions of the west,
Noon soaring o'er the other countries, still
The great rivers lapse in grayness, rest
Swathes the ancient forest, swathes the hill;
The wild flower sleeps whose silent dews distill
Upon the long, slow wind that every where Sweeps through the shadow of great darkness, till
Some dreaming cloud high up in heaven grows fair,
And blooms and flames, and all the splendid day is there!

CHANGE OF PLACE.

THE American is the most migratory of all the varieties of the human animal. The very fact of his coming from remote regions, across a wide ocean, to this new land, proves him to have possessed a disposition to wander singularly distinguished from the more sedentary habits of the race from which he sprung. With this inclination to rove he reached a continent of almost boundless extent and variety, and finding unchecked freedom of movement, and ceaseless provocatives to curiosity and enterprise, his early bias was so strengthened that his tendency seems to have become permanently migratory.

In the earlier periods of our country a people with a restless desire for change of place might have served an essential part in the economy of this new world. They were necessary perhaps with their habits of shifting about to prepare the land for quiet occupation. As they moved on and on they cut down forests, dried up morasses, drove savage beasts from their lairs, and still more savage men from their hiding-places, and thus, pushing further and further away the dangers to health and life, gave increased security and happiness to the fixed homes of civilized communities. Some have doubted, however, and among them no less a personage than the philosophic MILL, whether this eagerness of our people to diffuse themselves over the whole breadth of the American continent has been favorable to their civilization. Extensiveness of dominion and immensity of wealth are not essential to the highest welfare of a nation. The United States especially, as it has no dangerous neighbors to fear, does not need to hasten the development of its resources of riches and material power. A gradual growth, during which each part has opportunity to unfold itself to its full extent without being encroached upon by the excessive spreading of another, is more favorable not only to beauty, but vigor. This is equally true of the plant, the individual, and the nation.

The disposition to migrate of the early American seems to have impressed upon his descendants a hereditary tendency in the same direction. The instinct, as with some lower animals, remains, while the object has ceased to exist. There is nothing so characteristic of our countrymen as their frequent change of place, with no other motive than the love of change. It is seldom that an American continues to live in the house of his father, however it may be associated with the endearments of family affection and the happiness of his childhood and youth. He does not, in fact, long remain in his own house, though it may be in every respect adapted to his comfort, convenience, and means. He flits on every May-day to a new residence, and, to give variety even to change, occasionally makes in the course of the year a complete circuit of the hotels. This constant movement is, in many respects, much more injurious to the interests of a family than is generally supposed. The attachment to home, which has so powerful an influence upon the character of the young, is greatly weakened by a perpetual shifting of the objects associated with their early habits and affections. The old house and the familiar furniture are inseparably bound up in the memory of the child with his recollections of domestic love, reverence, and happiness. They are the mnemonics of the heart, with which it is not safe to dispense.

The love of change makes the American a great traveler, and traveling has certainly its advantages. Most of our countrymen, however, from their impatience of rest, lose much of the benefit of travel. They go with all the available speed of the steamship and railway across seas and continents, with no other object apparently than to return at an equally rapid rate of movement. Their first inquiry on getting to a place is how to get out of it, and no object in a foreign country seems to interest them so much as the finger-post. This kind of traveling may serve as a distraction to the listless idler, wearied with ennui, or to the self-tormenting hypochondriac, absorbed with his own fancied ailments; but it is useless for any other purpose. It is not the travel which Lord BACON says "in the younger sort is a part of education, in the elder a part of experience."

This quick change of place, so characteristic of our traveling fellow-citizens, is not only profitless to the old, but harmful to the young. If parents are disposed to make whirligigs of themselves, and keep spinning all over the surface of the globe, and find the motion agreeable, there is no reason why they should not be permitted to indulge in it to their own satisfaction and the amusement of the world. The caprice is costly, but cost is nothing to the American; and it so blinds the eyes that he does not see, but he is seen, which is every thing to him. Children, however, want more or less fixedness of position for that regularity of discipline essential to a healthy development of mind and body.

We can hardly conceive any thing more fatal to the best interests of children than the not uncommon practice of parents traveling constantly about with them. They are, no doubt, benefited, as their elders, by an occasional change of place. Their perceptive powers are awakened by new scenes and objects of interest; but it is seldom necessary greatly to widen the field of observation of an inexperienced child. His horizon need not extend much beyond the walls of the nursery and the fence of the garden, with an occasional stretch into the fields and country on a holiday excursion. Most young children, while dragged along by their fashionable parents over the grand routes of the world, are bored with "sights" of all kinds, and are amused with precisely the same objects as they would find at home. They will turn from Niagara to dabble in a puddle, and prefer the sight of a hay-cock, with a chance for a romp, to a vision of the Jungfrau in all its glory.

The ill effects of traveling upon children are, obviously, their necessary withdrawal from the steady discipline of the school, the excessive indulgence in the luxuries of the hotel tables, the association with the miscellaneous company of travelers of all kinds, the pampering of their worst appetites by servants and people of every sort, eager to ingratiate themselves with their parents, the excitements to which they are exposed, and the desultory habits which are the certain results of a constant change of place.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Improbing Pastures.

MY DEAR SOLON,—I met John Naps the other afternoon as I was walking up Broadway, and he asked me to pass the next Sunday with him at his house in the country. I gladly consented, although it is very easy to fancy a harder fate than that of passing the summer in my rooms, with thick walls and various bachelor comforts, and with my grounds of the Central Park not very far away, and with my band playing two or three times a week, while I sit in the shade, and the owners of fine carriages and fleet horses drive by me for my amusement. Indeed, I am often very grateful to rich strangers for the pains they take to entertain me. Yesterday I encountered Mr. Brummel, who had evidently been devoting a great deal of thought and anxiety to the shape of his coat and trowsers, and the color and fold of his scarf, and the hue and fit of his gloves, and to whom I am indebted for the prettiest and completest specimen of the coxcomb and fop that I have seen for a long time. Mr. Brummel had taken elaborate care to show me exactly how a gentleman ought not to be dressed, and the lesson was both entertaining and instructive.

There are other friends who spare no expense for my pleasure in yachts and horses. It is really touching to observe how freely they spend time and money to furnish me with a pretty spectacle of neat wagons flying along smooth roads, or of graceful vessels skimming the bay. Their self-sacrificing generosity puts me to the blush; for I know that they can not see how beautiful their boats are, and they are so engaged in driving their horses that they can think of nothing else. All the beauty of the spectacle is for me, who pay nothing, who have no care whatever, and who have only to sit comfortably in the shade and look. I have no anxiety about the health of my horses or the rigging of my vessel, because I own none. I am not torn with jealous fear lest my neighbor's Curlew should outsail my own Lapwing; for, whether Lapwing or Curlew be ahead, the scene is as fair to my eye, and my mind is at rest. I live in perpetual gratitude to my kind friends, most of them personally unknown to me, who provide this constant and delightful entertainment, and who spare me the slightest sense of responsibility, even of enjoyment, by not knowing whether I enjoy or not.

John Naps is not precisely one of this great multitude of benefactors, because he was evidently very anxious that I should enjoy his beautiful little place, and, indeed, who could help enjoying it? To a great many it is, of course, what the fast horses and fine carriages and yachts are to me; that is, it is a pleasure imparted without his consciousness. For I have no doubt there is many a passenger along the dusty road who has been, as it were, roughly thrust out by the high blank fences and dead-walls around many noble country places, and who comes upon the bordering shrubbery and pretty green and flowery glimpses of John Naps's place as to a warm personal welcome and a salutation of sympathy after a stern rebuff. And yet the glimpses which the place gives to every wayfarer do not destroy its seclusion. As with a person of urbane aspect, even strangers receive a pleasant impression; but it is only those who are admitted to his intimacy who know how good he is.

John Naps is not a rich man, and his place is small; but he says that a man who has an acre in the country may seem to be sole proprietor, and have all the advantage to the eye, of a boundless estate. His neighbor's line is very near him, and his own house is not far from the high-road. But when you have passed his gate and have advanced a few steps, and look around and behind, you seem to be already deep in the most sylvan retirement. He has so skillfully planted trees and shrubs, and so deftly turned his paths, that, favored a little by nature, which has given him two or three fine trees, the mass of foliage is toward the high-road, and a neat hedge is trimmed so as to open to his windows and piazza the spacious lawns and picturesque groves of his neighbor. By a jugglery as honest as it is cheap and beautiful the domain of John Naps is immense, while he pays taxes only upon an acre or two. Then, when you look more closely, you see that his own immediate grounds are laid out with such breadth that nothing irritates your eye or mind. They are not cut up, nor are they geometrically artificial. He has not great sweeps of lawn; but there is a long sloping piece of grass near the house, and that he mows and dresses so that it is the prettiest turf I know. There is not ground enough for a flower garden, so he has one or two borders with a few choice plants and superb shrubs in groups at the proper points. His place is his care. John Naps works at it a little every day. Before six in the morning I heard him with his hand-mower, and there are two or three hours of work in the evening. And when once you have such a little place in order, to keep it in order is not a great, if a constant, care.

After dinner I sat upon the piazza and enjoyed every sound and every sight. I told him how delightful every thing was. He smiled, and said that it was all due to training. "When I came here, twenty years ago," he continued, "this pretty place was a pasture, with those few trees. It was mere material. Nature had furnished earth, and a little variety of surface, and the trees, and if I were to have a pretty home I must furnish the rest. I learned here, as every where else, that nature only supplies the material; she does not work it up. This place of mine, which, of course, I think with you, is exceedingly pretty—indeed, I should be ashamed if it were not—is, therefore, only a pasture plus a man. Nature gives the crayon and the canvas; the man draws the picture. And I often think, Mr. Bachelor, that what is true of my little place is true every where—that the man is indispensable if you would transform a pasture into a place."

John Naps, you know, is often considered to be a whimsical man; but there is sometimes a great deal of sense in his whimsies. For as he said this, and then relapsed into smoking, with a meditative eye, brooding upon his grounds, I thought of his wife, who was unfortunately not at home. She is one of the most delightful persons you could see—full of sweetness and grace and thoughtfulness and knowledge. Yet she deals with all the imperfections that I am told every housekeeper encounters. Her "help" comes from the same offices with all other. The appliances of her kitchen and chambers are not different from those which are most familiar. But somehow the kitchen is peaceful. The most delightful dinners come out of it; not expensive nor in any way extravagant, but delicious, and in every sense most tasteful. And the same order reigns throughout this happy Warsaw. You look into one of the chambers, and you do not see ormolu nor curtains of costly lace, but you do see neatness, order, and exquisite taste; and, above all, that nameless grace which we call comme il faut—the essential, the as-it-should-be, according to some subtile spiritual perception of the fitness of things. Thus Mrs. John Naps's household is a pasture plus a woman. Nature furnishes her the ordinary material, but she elaborates it within the house as John does outside.

There is another lady's household which I could mention, and which is an illustration of nature untrained. I forbear to mention the name, because I presume your own consciousness may supply it. When you enter the house there is the fatal air of confusion and untidiness. Nothing is in its place, and very many things are exactly where they should not be. There are very costly and very shabby pieces of furniture cheek by jowl. The muslin curtains are a little dirty and very much tumbled. There is fringe partially detached. There are even shreds of cloth and paper scattered upon the carpet. The chairs are a little rickety upon their legs. They are all slight symptoms, but they are fatal. And when dinner comes the joint is too rare, or it is burned, the potatoes are watery, the cauliflower is hard, the spinach is stringy, the salt is a lump, there are spots upon the cloth; the whole feast is distasteful, although it is as costly as Mrs. Naps's, and composed of the same material, and served in quite as expensive a service; and the cook and the waiter are not upon lower wages. And this characteristic pervades the whole house. It is a musical instrument ajar, every where rattling and discordant, while one little turn of the screw would bring all into tone and harmony. It is the pasture overgrown with moss and brambles and twitch-grass. It is the mere material of nature—the pasture without the man.

I go on and find that the principle is universal. There are those who insist that nothing is necessary but what they call nature. Nothing, they contend, so bad as artificiality. True; but then nothing so indefinable as nature. For instance, learning is artificial. We don't know the alphabet nor addition by nature. We must be taught—that is, our faculties must be trained. Why not apply the same principle to manners? I hear the manners of Oriana censured as not being natural, yet I find them exceedingly charming. They are the result of training, indeed; but training has greatly improved, or, if you prefer, developed nature. Bruscha, on the contrary, is a child of nature. When I draw my chair near to hers, and we become interested in conversation, she does not hesitate—in her earnestness—to put her feet upon my chair, and to fling herself backward, roaring with laughter, when she is pleased. Her voice is loud. She contradicts me flatly; she puts her arms akimbo; she scratches her head; she thrusts out her foot. These are purely natural manners; but do you not think that they would be improved by a little training? If they were more artificial, as we call it, would they not be more truly delightful? Is not a lady who has carefully trained herself to speak low, to govern her movements gracefully, to dress with a thoughtful regard to taste and beauty, a hundredfold more pleasing than the excellent daughter of nature whom I have described? She, indeed, is the mere material that nature offers; she is the pasture wholly unimproved.

Nor do I admit, my dear Solon, that the wild pasture which John Naps bought twenty years ago is more truly nature than the beautiful place which his taste and skill have made of it. His wife is not only natural, but natural in an infinitely pleasanter way than the hoyden or the wild woman of whom I spoke. The diamond burnished and set is not less a natural product than the diamond in the mine. Training clears away the refuse, the dross, the blur, and leaves the essence purified. Cultivation develops a higher nature. It is the art which transforms the block of marble into the statue. The person who declines to cultivate pleasing manners because they are artificial might as wisely refuse to cultivate his mind because he would not interfere with nature. If John Naps had been of that opinion, that lovely home of his would be a pasture to-day. He might ask a cow to pass Sunday in it, but I don't see why he should ask me.

Yours, dear Solon,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CAMBRIC AND CALICO DRESSES.

HOW shall we make calico and cambric dresses prettily? is the inquiry of many correspondents. The answer is easily given, as some of the most tasteful costumes both for house and street are made of these simple fabrics, and are, withal, so plainly made that they are not a terror to the laundress. In the first place, much depends upon the goods selected. The preference is for American cambrics of the various brands sold for 25 cents a yard, and the finer soft-finished cambrics, said to be imported. After these are the linen lawns at 25 or 30 cents, prized by many for their sheerness, while others object to them for the same reason; and lastly, the ordinary prints at 15 cents a yard. In pattern the fancy just now is decidedly for stripes, and these, to make up effectively, must be distinct and uniform, not of irregular widths. Black lines on white grounds are most used; then blue or brown. Undressed cambrics with soft gray grounds make up well, and do not soil readily; green and lavender do not seem to be in favor. For ladies who think themselves too tall for stripes there are polka dots, dashes, diamonds, and Maltese crosses. These small figures look best when set at wide intervals. The cheapest prints are found this season in as good style as the finest cambrics.

The purchase made, the dress is fashioned into a costume that serves alike for the house, and for morning walks in town or country. The most prevalent style has a box-pleated blouse-waist, or shirt, as it is now called, an upper and a lower skirt. The shirt requires two and a half yards of wide cambric. Tear off a width for each front, and a third width for the back, making them a finger longer than a belted blouse would be, as a drawing-string is used instead of a belt, and the ends of the waist are concealed beneath the skirt. Three box-pleats, each an inch and a half wide, are laid perpendicularly on one front, two such pleats and a hem on the other. The box-pleat that forms the centre of the fronts is stitched on each edge like that on gentlemen's shirt fronts; the other pleats are merely sewed in the centre, and should be raised by the laundress after ironing. When pleated the shirt is cut out by a blouse-waist pattern, allowing it a trifle larger about the shoulders and armholes, as the shirt is more négligé than an ordinary blouse. The sleeves are ample, coat-shape, slightly gathered to a square cuff that is a finger deep, fastened on the outside of the wrist by three buttons. The collar is sailor shape, or else a standing band with pointed front. The buttons are of white linen, pearl, or else moulds covered with the material. The upper skirt is quite long, with an apron-front width slightly gored, a side gore, and one or two full back breadths, as the wearer prefers it more or less bouffant. A drawing-string the entire length of the second side seam draws it up high on the hips, and drapes it, with the assistance of a few pleats behind. The edge is bordered with a bias band two inches wide, or else is cut in Greek squares or points, and bound with percale the color of the stripe. The lower skirt has two such bands set above the hem.

A costume of this kind, worn by a young blonde, is of blue striped cambric, with the sailor collar, the cuffs, belt, and bias bands of solid blue cambric. A white straw sailor hat, with blue ribbon band and long streamers, was worn with it. Ladies who are too stout for full pleated waists cut a plain blouse, and stitch on bias bands to simulate pleats. Ruffles detract from these simple dresses, but a flat pleating on the lower skirts looks well when the stripes are very fine.

Ladies who have a nut brown silk skirt, or one of black silk, can vary their toilettes inexpensively by wearing over them pleated shirts of linen lawn, buff linen, batiste, or striped cambric. For instance, with a dark brown silk skirt with two gathered flounces we have seen an upper skirt and shirt of white linen lawn with fine lines of brown. The box-pleats of the shirt were bound with brown braid (finest alpaca braid), as were the cuffs and collar; a bias band around the upper skirt was piped with brown; large brown buttons looped the over-skirt and buttoned the shirt, and the belt was brown belt ribbon. The hat was white English straw trimmed with brown gros grain and ostrich tufts. A buff linen skirt and over-skirt, with under-skirt of brown silk, forms a pretty traveling dress. White Victoria lawn over dresses made in this way are worn over black silk, and the fancy for pleated waists is so great that fine grenadine is also gotten up after this plan. Shirts of white linen striped with black, such as is sold for 75 cents a yard, are worn with two skirts of black silk or of alpaca, and also with gray skirts. The neck-tie is a black lace barb or a sailor knot of black silk cut on the bias.

A regular polonaise costume is the next device for washing fabrics, but is rather elaborate. Both the polonaises found among our cut paper patterns are used as models for these suits, and also the Marguerite polonaise lately described. A stylish costume prepared for Newport is a Marguerite polonaise of white linen striped with black, worn either with a black silk skirt or with one of the linen trimmed with kilt pleating. The polonaise is exquisitely draped simply by a drawing-string in the seam that can be loosened when the garment is washed. The edge is vandyked and corded with black linen. The entire front is buttoned by large flat buttons of white linen with a black embroidered centre.

A novelty this season is the Yosemite cloth for polonaises. It is a sort of cretonne, with thickly twilled stripes as glossy as satin, is very durable, and is in white, buff, and gray. The polonaise is trimmed with fringe or lace of the color of the goods. It is looped on the sides with bows of black velvet, and worn over a brown or black silk skirt. Suits of heavy undressed linen, dark brown or gray, are made with a Marguerite polonaise and a skirt of the same. Broad kilt pleating extends up the skirt far enough to give the effect of a skirt made entirely of pleats.

At the Fordham races some leaders of fashion wore "Dolly Varden" costumes of the gay cretonnes lately described. One worn by a brunette was a buff ground, with large chintz figures of brilliant colors, made with a polonaise trimmed with écru lace and black velvet; others had black or white grounds, with gay-colored flowers and palm leaves. The polonaise had revers in front, was without drapery behind, and was trimmed with white duchesse lace and Swiss muslin pleatings. Wide-brimmed Leghorn hats were worn with cretonne suits.

For wrappers of wash goods there are several designs, the best of which is the slightly loose Gabrielle, worn with a belt or without it. Two or three narrow ruffles are used to trim these wrappers, instead of the wide Spanish flounce extending down from the knee. The cut paper pattern of a gored wrapper, illustrated in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV., may be used as a model for calico wrappers by omitting the fullness added in the back breadths. Watteau wrappers are still worn, but they are rather complicated for home manufacture, and are heavy-looking for summer fabrics.

REFRIGERANTS.

Among their very useful stock the furnishing houses show a variety of refrigerants most desirable at this season. First there is a cabinet refrigerator, called the Zero milk, wine, and water cooler. It is small enough to be portable, will hold fruits, butter, etc., and is most useful in sick-rooms, offices, the nursery, or for families who board. The cost is from $15 to $25. Still smaller than this is the Saratoga cooler, with a reservoir for ice at the bottom, and a shelf above for a bottle of wine: price $8 or $10. The Newport cooler is larger, with a provision chamber below and an ice tank above. The Niagara is the newest of the miniature refrigerators. It has a drawer behind for holding the ice. Another late improvement is the Congress cooler, round and high like an ordinary water cooler, but with a separate apartment for ice. This economizes the ice, and the water is free from its impurities, yet cold enough to be healthful. There is also a basin at the top for fruit or wine. There are five sizes of the Congress; the first, holding four gallons, costs $8; the largest contains twelve gallons, and is $24.

One of the best refrigerators for family use has also the suggestive name of Zero. This is constructed on an excellent plan. The ice is placed in the centre, separate from all the other chambers, that no hot air may reach it to thaw it; nor can it communicate to the provision apartments the moist air that promotes decay. A wine and water cooler is attached to this refrigerator. In grained oak these cost from $20 to $55. Very handsome ones in black-walnut are from $50 to $75.

Newly patented freezers do away with much of the apparatus and labor formerly required for making ice-cream. The simple freezer has a wooden pail for the ice and salt with an inner cylinder for cream. Turning a crank one way makes the cylinder revolve in the ice, while by turning it in the opposite direction the beater dashes the cream, and a scraper removes the frozen cream from the sides of the tin. Thus the cream is frozen far more rapidly and smoothly than if the cylinder were stationary.

PERSONAL.

MR. HIRAM SIBLEY, of Rochester, a gentleman who, at an early day, seeing the prospective value of the electric telegraph, invested liberally, and thereby became possessed of many shekels of gold, has given Cornell University $10,000 for the equipment of the department of civil mechanical engineering. Another gift of $30,000 to the college has just been made, from a source not yet announced.

—The Duke of Argyll has plunged into the autograph business—going so far as to pay $5000 to an intellectual Dutchman for a choice lot of people who made some stir in the world in the sixteenth century.

—The Princess SALM-SALM has offered 5000 francs for the body of her late husband, who was killed in a cavalry charge at the battle of Gravelotte. The Princess was originally a ballet-dancer in this country, but on entering the holy estate of wedlock became one of the best of wives, and contributed largely to her husband's prosperity. During our late "misunderstanding" the Prince was an officer in the brigade of General SICKLES.

—MARY ANN MORSE, who died in Natick, Massachusetts, nine years ago, left certain assets for a public library in that town. The amount realized and now available for that purpose is about $40,000.

—WESTON is a man of whom it may be rightly said he is "known by his walk rather than by his conversation." His recent feat of tramping 400 miles in less than five days, without resorting to the use of any stimulants whatever, is a point which the advocates of total abstinence can and ought to make special use of.

—In the Book Concern case Rev. Dr. CARLTON testified, the report says "very reluctantly," that he was a director in the Shoe and Leather Bank, in the Home Life-Insurance Company, and in an oil company, an alderman in Elizabeth City, trustee of a church in the same place, and trustee of the Genesee College. Judge REYNOLDS proposed to inquire further into his secular pursuits, but CARLTON declined to answer, as he did not want his private affairs "pried into." Nevertheless, doctor, the Methodist public will pry into them. They will ask whether, with such a multiplicity of occupations, you can give the necessary attention to the publishing interests of the Church?—Brooklyn Eagle.

—The editor of the Boston Post, one of the most fascinating of men, quotes as follows: "The newest charm is in the form of a compass, and about the size of a cent;" and adds the remark that "the oldest charm is in the form of an encompass, and about the sighs of assent."

—General SPINNER, Treasurer of the U. S., has gone abroad in quest of health, though it is hardly to be expected that he will ever get entirely over the effects of that signature of his. When in London, a few weeks ago, he called on the ROTHSCHILDS, and, after waiting an hour or more in the antechamber, took his 'at and left. He was soon overtaken by a clerk, who apologized in behalf of the firm, saying that they didn't know who he was, and that if he would return he would be at once ushered into the presence. The General declined, and remarked to the young man that the ROTHSCHILDS could go to—a place that is really quite low down—quite low.

—In gathering from journals published in every section of the country the material from which this department of the Bazar is prepared we are struck with the number of extremely aged persons living in the North, South, East, and West. No particular region seems to enjoy a pre-eminence for longevity. In Portland, Maine, resides Mrs. ANNA PLACE, who has attained to 102 years. She is the widow of a Revolutionary soldier who served throughout the war, and she now receives a pension from the government. Her mental and physical faculties are perfect. The strange thing about the old lady is that she does not believe in an existence beyond the grave.

—To say that the handwriting of Mr. GREELEY rivals in grace and elegance the lines of the engraver would be conspicuously inexact. It is not surprising, therefore, that in writing an allusion to "ANNA DICKINSON'S lecture on Joan of Arc," the compositor set it up, "Any Dutchman can't play a jew's-harp."

—Professor AGASSIZ proposes fresh explorations in the field of science. In company with Dr. HILL, the former president of Harvard College, he will go around Cape Horn in the new Coast Survey vessel just launched at Wilmington, and which is intended to make a detailed survey of the Pacific coast of the United States.

—LOUIS NAPOLEON has had in London, since the surrender of Sedan, a newspaper organ called La Situation. It approves the destruction of M. THIERS'S house by the Communists, who, by-the-way, to render more imposing the lesson involved in the fall of the Column of Vendôme, burned at the foot of the fallen monument M. THIERS'S "History of the Consulate and the Empire."

—Lord BROUGHAM'S second volume, soon to be published by the HARPERS, will be largely devoted to the affairs of Queen CAROLINE (wife of the Prince Regent) and her trial. His lordship was the principal counsel for the lady.

—Although every newspaper in the land has had more or less to say about the vast fortune of Mrs. General GAINES, none has stated the figures. It has finally been ascertained that that which she claims is assessed on the tax-books as being of the value of about $20,000,000.

—It did not use to be greatly the fashion for the nobility to fraternize socially with simple talent, but that sort of thing is coming in, judging from a cablegram, which says that on June 15 the Duke of Argyll, Marquis of Lorne, Princess LOUISE, Sir HENRY RAWLINSON, and others attended the reception of the American artist BRADFORD at the Langham Hotel.

—General CLUSERET, for whose existence the Versaillists deemed there was no further necessity, was not a Frenchman, after all, some say, but an Irishman, educated for a priest, and a bad Irishman at that. Being in Italy at the time of the Garibaldian expedition, he plunged into that. While in this country he was generally in some sort of debatable business, and was in the Fenian troubles in Ireland before he went over to join in with the Communists. He was always a turbulent style of man.

—Among the princesses of Europe the Empress of Russia and the Princess FREDERICK CHARLES are the best painters, the Princess of Wales the best pianist, the Queen of Holland the best poet and author, the Empress of Germany the best conversationalist, the Empress of Austria the best-looking, and the Queen of Denmark the best housewife.

—The fiancé of Miss NILSSON, M. ROUZAND, is a modest, manly, intelligent young gentleman, a broker in Paris before the war between France and Germany, and during the siege did duty on the ramparts of the city. With its fall and the rise of the Commune, the commercial marts of London attracted him thither; but there was another attraction here, and he came, and it is said will engage in business in New York. His other engagement with the charming cantatrice is a little matter which they talk over between themselves.

—MAZZINI says that when the ex-Emperor NAPOLEON permitted the "Marseillaise" to be sung at the breaking out of the war with Prussia, the fire of the words departed, and the spirit of the hymn was lost forever.

—When JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, the poet, was last in Rome a mendicant monk met him in the Corso one day, and asked for a contribution to repair a monastery. "You should not ask me for aid," remarked LOWELL, "for I am a heretic." "That makes no difference," replied the astute friar; "your money is orthodox." The poet appreciated the witticism, and donated.

—Sir THOMAS HARPER, a former Lord Mayor of London, "cast his bread upon the waters" in this wise: In his will he devised that the rental from two fields in Bloomsbury should be devoted to the education of poor boys in Bedfordshire. At the time of the bequest the value of the land was $200 a year. Now it is $400,000, and at the end of the present lease will be about $800,000.

—HENRI ROCHEFORT, by the recent death of his father, has become a marquis. The old gentleman was the exact opposite of his son in politics, and died in penury. The mother of the present marquis was a well-known pastry-cook, named MOREL. And of such is the nobility of France!

—Mrs. J. MEREDITH READ, wife of the United States consul-general at Paris, was in Paris during the recent bombardment, and was so frightened that she hid in a closet in the rear of her residence after the front part of the house had been shelled to pieces. (Mrs. READ was a Miss PUMPELLY, of Albany; and a very intelligent and charming lady she is.)

—The Duke of Edinburgh is to wed the Princess THYRA, the youngest daughter of the King of Denmark. He is not what may be called a first-class, estimable young man. On the contrary, he is said to accept valuable presents and make cheap ones, and to do various things quite too naughty to be printed in this column. He is heir-apparent to the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and it is understood that the S.-C.-G.'s have a poor opinion of the young man.

—Of Marshal M'MAHON, who is just now the object of so much interest in Paris, this is told: When a colonel he had an altercation, on parade, with an officer, whom he threatened. The latter drew a pistol, took deliberate aim, and fired. Fortunately the cap snapped. Without the least fear, the cool and impassible M'MAHON said, "Give that man fifteen days, salle de police, for having his arms out of order."

—Colonel HAMLEY, the author of the "Battle of Dorking," is a man who has written a few fairish novels, and who was a great friend of the South during our troubles. They tell this story of that officer and General FRANCIS C. BARLOW: The latter was in England after his brilliant campaign with GRANT in 1864, and was received with great attention by London society. Dining one day at the same table with Colonel HAMLEY, the Britisher chose to consider the young Yankee general who sat by his side as a parvenu, and did not recognize him. But not long after, at a great review at Aldershott, the astonished HAMLEY saw BARLOW sitting among British generals and ministers and even dukes, and treated with great respect; and the next time he met the young American at dinner he was more than civil—he was effusive, he was gushing. But BARLOW was as blind then as HAMLEY had been before; he looked over the poor Colonel, and on either side of him, but he did not see him.

—A correspondent of the Springfield (Massachusetts) Republican, writes as follows of what he has seen of Recorder HACKETT'S precision as a shot: "I was on board the yacht Dauntless on a late yachting cruise. Mr. BENNETT was in command, with four invited guests, among whom were Recorder HACKETT, of New York, and Mr. JOHN G. HECKSHER, of Newport. While at sea, and a heavy swell on, I saw Mr. HECKSHER take a clam-shell and hold it between his forefinger and thumb, and stand at twenty-two yards, or sixty-six feet, from the Recorder, who had in his hands a Ballard rifle; and I heard Mr. BENNETT give the word to the Recorder—one, two, three—who then fired, and I saw the clam-shell break in numberless pieces, fragments striking Mr. HECKSHER on the hand and neck, just drawing blood. I then saw Mr. BENNETT'S valet hold a cork-screw in his hand, and at the same distance, and at the word, saw the Recorder shoot it out of his hand. I also saw the Recorder kill a poke, flying, with his rifle, at seventy-one yards, nearly cutting his neck off, at Cobb's Island, Virginia, and afterward saw him shoot two gulls on the wing. These feats were witnessed by upward of twenty persons." Thus much for the correspondent. The writer of this has seen Judge HACKETT, after dinner, and by the light of a candle, shoot through the centre of an apple, held in the hand of a servant, at a distance of fifteen feet, and afterward has seen him snuff out the candle with a shot, at the same distance, without touching the lower half of the unburned wick or touching the spermaceti.

—The Duke of Brunswick has the unhappiness to own so many diamonds, and is so anxious for their safety, that he keeps them guarded day and night, and frequently starts from his sleep, dreaming he has been robbed. The possession of his precious stones is such a fearful responsibility that he has little rest and no peace. In his will he has bequeathed all his diamonds, estimated to be worth $2,000,000 or $3,000,000, to the late Prince Imperial.
